Delta, Northwest Bankruptcies Spark Fears About Pension Security. The Financial Times (9/16, Daniel) reports, "Concern about the impact of the bankruptcies of Delta and Northwest airlines on workers' pensions has led to urgent calls in Washington for immediate pension relief. Harry Reid, Senate minority leader, said: 'Congress has an immediate opportunity to pass legislation enabling both companies to keep pension plans for workers in place.' Johnny Isakson, senator from Georgia, where Delta is based, told the Financial Times on Thursday: 'We want to bring the bill to the floor as early as next week. The airlines stated they wanted to preserve their defined benefit plans and their ability to do that is tied to whether we can get pension reform passed.'" The Times adds, "The sense of urgency comes as the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, the federal agency that insures defined benefit pension plans, said it could assume liabilities of $8.4bn from Delta's pension plan if it was terminated. That would mark its biggest pension termination. Northwest's liabilities were smaller, at $2.8bn, the PBGC said on Thursday.'

Former Airline CEO Urges Revision Of Bankruptcy Laws. Robert Crandall, former chairman and CEO of American Airlines, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/16), "Delta and Northwest Airlines' bankruptcy filings are the latest consequences of the troubles afflicting the long-established, or 'legacy,' airlines. Inflexible work rules, above-market wage rates, under-funded fixed benefit pension plans, huge debt burdens, outdated business practices and high fuel costs burden the legacy carriers with enormous disadvantages relative to newer carriers who are flying by different rules. … Among the most egregious of these burdens are those imposed by the nation's bankruptcy statutes." Crandall adds, "Revising the bankruptcy laws would certainly cause hardship for the communities and employees most involved with failed airlines. On the other hand, revising the rules would offer expanded opportunities for new competitors and for legacy carriers whose managements, unions and employees are most willing to adapt to new realities. … To build a better airline industry we need bankruptcy laws designed to incentivize success and penalize failure. We need labor laws that better balance the power of unions and management. … Finally, we need administration and Congressional support for legislation to provide the FAA with the resources to build and operate an aviation infrastructure consistent with both U. S. aviation leadership and growing consumer demand."

WSJournal Urges Phasing Out Of PBGC Guarantees. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/16) says, "This week's bankruptcy filings raise the possibility that Delta and Northwest will join United Airlines and US Airways in dumping their pension obligations onto taxpayers. Members of Congress will howl, but it's time for the politicians to admit their own role in co-piloting the airline industry into Chapter 11." The "root of the problem for these 'legacy' carriers is the burden of pension costs. And one tantalizing option is to use bankruptcy to pass them off to the taxpayer via the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. (PBGC). Congress created this government-run insurance system in 1974, promising to 'protect workers' when companies failed. But as always with such government guarantees, Congress only created a future 'moral hazard' that is now coming due. … If the Members really wanted to help, they'd leave the airlines alone and find a way to phase out PBGC guarantees."

Unions Facing Harsh Challenges. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, A6, Maher) reports, "Union leaders expect the bankruptcy filings of Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines to increase pressure on other carriers to seek further cost cutting from their workers. The troubling reality for unions: There seems to be very little they can do to stop the trend. … The latest round of airline woes has come as the labor movement's fissures have widened, raising questions as to whether some of organized labor's problems are self-inflicted. This summer's defections from the AFL-CIO by four major unions -- representing more than one-third of the labor federation's members -- highlight existing tensions among unions and unwillingness to back fellow unions during strikes." The Journal notes, "The harsh challenges confronting unions in the airline industry, while more extreme than those in other corners of the labor movement, illustrate the problems facing all of organized labor as employers press harder to lower labor costs for active and retired workers in the name of being globally competitive. 'Unions are in an environment of shrinking alternatives,' says Marick F. Masters, a professor of business administration at the University of Pittsburgh. 'There are just not many good options left at this time.'"

Iranian President Offers To Share Nuclear Technology With Other Islamic Countries. USA Today (9/16) reports that after meeting the Turkish prime minister at the United Nations, Iranian President Mahmoud

Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his country is willing to provide other Islamic nations with nuclear technology." Ahmadinejad "repeated promises that Iran will not pursue nuclear weapons, the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency reported. Then he added: 'Iran is ready to transfer nuclear know-how to the Islamic countries due to their need.'"

The Washington Times (9/16, A1, Sands) reports in a front page story "repeated his denials of Iran's intent to make atomic bombs in a get-acquainted meeting with U.S. reporters and editors yesterday morning, saying such suspicions put a heavy burden on his country." But his "offer to share nuclear technology prompted a worried U.S. reaction. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli told a briefing, 'Iran, as its record demonstrates, has a long history of trying to develop weapons of mass destruction, supporting terror.'"

Rice Says US Many Not Have IAEA Votes To Refer Iran To Security Council. The Washington Times (9/16, A1, Sands) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "had been trying to rally support for a vote next week by the United Nations' Vienna, Austria-based nuclear watchdog to refer Iran's nuclear programs to the Security Council -- a first step toward possible sanctions." But Rice "conceded that the United States might not have the votes at what was supposed to be a climactic vote by the board of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) on Monday."

The Washington Post (9/16, A26, Linzer, Lynch) reports that despite "an intense lobbying effort at the most senior levels, the Bush administration failed to persuade three key countries Thursday to back the United States in pressuring Iran to give up sensitive aspects of its nuclear energy program." Russia, China and India "either publicly or privately turned down U.S. requests to help report Iran's case next week to the U.N. Security Council, which has the authority to impose economic sanctions or an oil embargo." The Administration has "the reluctant support of the European Union for the first time in more than two years, but that will not be enough. Without backing from one of the three others, U.S. officials indicated they were preparing to abandon, for now, a quest to move the matter into the council."

US Report Says Iran Intends Acquisition Of Nuclear Weapons. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz) reports a US government report says Iran is "concealing many of its nuclear facilities from international controls and the activities show it is seeking nuclear weapons." The computer slide presentation "developed by the Energy Department for the International Atomic Energy Agency also shows that Iran's nuclear program closely resembles Pakistan's nuclear arms programs." The report says, "Iran's past history of concealment and deception and nuclear fuel cycle infrastructure are most consistent with an intent to acquire nuclear weapons."

Iran To Offer "Compromise" On Nuclear Program. Financial Times (9/16, Staff) reports Iran "is to propose international joint ventures in its nuclear programme as a means of providing an 'objective guarantee' that it cannot be diverted to weapons use, senior Iranian officials have told the Financial Times." Iranian President Ahmadi-Nejad "is set to make the new proposal on Saturday before the United Nations General Assembly." It is "not clear whether Iran's suggestion would include the more sensitive sites in the country and European diplomats were sceptical that it would be acceptable to their governments."

The New York Times (9/16) reports President Ahmadinejad said Iran "would present new proposals tomorrow to try to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear programs, but he provided no details." European diplomats "indicated that they might defer their effort to bring Iran to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive action if sufficient progress was made in talking with Iran's leaders." Asked "repeatedly whether Iran had not discredited itself by its failure to disclose past nuclear activities, Mr. Ahmadinejad said Iran did not have nuclear weapons and 'there is absolutely no proof of a violation on the part of Iran' of its pledge to keep its nuclear program peaceful."

Ahmadinejad Criticizes US Over Iraq, Katrina Response, Foreign Policy. The Washington Post (9/16, A26, Kessler) reports President Ahmadinejad displayed "a dash of defiance at U.S. charges over Iran's nuclear program and a warning that the era of big-power dominance in international relations has ended." Ahmadinejad "blamed the Bush administration's policies for instability in Iraq. A veteran of Iran's war against Iraq, the president described the removal of Saddam Hussein as 'necessary' but said the task should have been left to Iraqis." On the subject of Hurricane Katrina, Ahmadinejad "poke[d] at the Bush administration's response and perhaps draw lessons about solidarity among Americans. He compared the delivery of aid to victims in the Gulf Coast unfavorably with the response to natural disasters in the Islamic republic." Ahmadinejad said, "We thought Americans would act more quickly and help their fellow Americans. We expected more." The Times adds Ahmadinejad's "visit here has been dogged by protesters asserting that, as a student leader, he played a role in the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and seizure of U.S. hostages during the 1979 Iranian revolution."

Bush To Pressure Putin On Iran, Foreign Energy Investment. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, King, White) reports President George W. Bush "hopes to persuade Russian President Vladimir Putin to toughen his stance on Iran, to further open his country's oil and gas reserves to foreign investment and to take steps to speed Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, when the two men meet at the White House." Bush Administration officials, "previewing Friday's one-day summit, described relations between Washington and Moscow these days as a mix of cooperation and tension, along with a dollop of indifference on the Russian side." US officials say the "first item on today's agenda, U.S. officials say, will be to urge Mr. Putin to look more favorably on European and U.S. efforts to persuade Iran to give up its alleged nuclear-weapons ambitions." Bush will "also try to get a feel from President Putin on what transpired in his private talks at the U.N. on Wednesday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the official said."

Putin Said To Be Looking For Way To Retain Power After 2008. In a The Washington Post column (9/16, A31), Martha Lipman says Russian President Vladimir Putin "looks, in fact, like a man interested in reelection. So much so that political commentators are once again guessing about whether he will stay in power beyond 2008, when his second -- and last -- term expires. To be sure, several loyal officials have suggested ways to overcome the constitutional obstacle to a third term. But with the next election still 2 1/2 years away, the Kremlin appears to remain undecided as to how to preserve the political status quo in Russia in 2008. Putin's heightened activity may just be a way of demonstrating that he is fully in charge and that he remains the ultimate decision maker on all important national issues, including the 'challenge of 2008.'"

Bush Trip To Bathroom During Security Council Meeting Creates Stir. The Washington Post (9/16, A29, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "President Bush created a bit of a stir Wednesday when he inexplicably walked out in the middle of an important UN Security Council meeting on terrorism, right in the middle of a speech by the leader of Benin. Delegates thought it was another example of American arrogance -- US officials are notorious for leaving meetings in mid-session, especially at the General Assembly. Russia's Vladimir Putin, Britain's Tony Blair and China's Hu Jintao sat patiently through the less-than-riveting address. But it appears that Bush meant no insult, judging from a note he handed to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice shortly before he left. Bush, after waiting while a member of his security detail swept a nearby bathroom, used the facilities and returned to the meeting a few minutes later."

North Korea Won't Drop Demand For Nuclear Reactor In Weapons Talks. The New York Times (9/16, Kahn) reports North Korea "refused to drop a new demand that the outside world build it a nuclear reactor before it dismantles its nuclear weapons, leaving six-nation negotiations here on the verge of collapse." The United States and North Korea have "identified its demand for a light-water nuclear reactor as the main sticking point in the talks, which have continued fitfully over two years and failed to produce even a joint statement of principles." Christopher Hill, the chief American negotiator, "made it clear on Thursday that the gap had widened over three days of talks." That "leaves the Bush administration with an unhappy choice - go on indefinitely with talks that have produced no result, or seek a consensus to impose international penalties on North Korea against the wishes of most countries in the region." One goal "for the United States in these talks, analysts say, is to show enough sincerity and flexibility to convince Asian nations that fault lies with North Korea and that imposing penalties is the only viable option."

The Washington Times (9/16, Sato, Kwanwoo) reports delegates said "talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear-weapons program are deadlocked due to 'major disagreements' between the North and the United States." A spokesman for the North Korean delegation "agreed yesterday that the talks were 'not making progress' due to the dispute over light-water reactors."

The Washington Post (9/16, A26, Cody) reports US and North Korean diplomats "acknowledged an irreconcilable deadlock Thursday in long-stalled nuclear disarmament talks, casting doubt on the future of Chinese-sponsored six-party negotiations." The "stalemate, based on the North Korean demand that it be given a light-water nuclear reactor to produce electricity, brought the current round of discussions to a rancorous standstill after three days. Representatives of the participating countries, which also include South Korea, Japan and Russia, did not indicate they would abandon the negotiations, but none outlined a way to keep talks going."

Diversion Of Food Aid Adds To Mistrust Of North Korean Regime. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Fairclough) reports the "widespread availability of donated food in North Korea's booming markets shows how difficult it is for relief organizations to work with a government that, frustrated aid workers and others say, is often more interested in preserving its power than in protecting its citizens. Reports of diverted aid also are deepening mistrust of the government among other nations -- including those negotiating with Pyongyang over the future of its nuclear capabilities." It is "impossible to know exactly how much aid is diverted -- to markets as well as to the military and other groups favored by the regime -- given tight North Korean restrictions on monitoring. But experts say it could be substantial."

Israeli Court Rules West Bank Security Barrier Must Be Rerouted. The New York Times (9/16, Myre) reports Israel's "highest court ruled Thursday that part of Israel's West Bank separation barrier had imposed major hardships on Palestinian villagers and must be rerouted. It was the second such decision by the court." However, the

"nine judges on the High Court of Justice also said in their unanimous ruling that Israel could build the barrier inside the West Bank, provided the government did so for security needs and not political considerations." The judges also "criticized an advisory ruling last year by the International Court of Justice in The Hague that said all sections of the barrier inside the West Bank violated international law and should be torn down. The Israeli court said the international court had failed to consider security needs."

The Washington Times (9/16, Mitnick) reports even as "the 9-0 ruling opened future challenges to the two-year-old network of electronic fence and concrete walls, the judges for the first time confirmed the legality of erecting a separation barrier inside the West Bank to protect Israeli citizens." Israel's "defense ministry now must consider alternatives to the path that separates about 1,200 Palestinians in five small villages from the rest of the West Bank. According to the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which brought the petition on behalf of the Palestinian villages of Wadi a-Rasha and Ras a-Tira, at least four more legal challenges to the fence's route in other areas are making their way to the Israeli Supreme Court."

Sharon Gets Polite Reception From UN. The New York Times (9/16, Brinkley) reports that for the first time, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon "spoke Thursday to the General Assembly, a body he has long considered a tool of the enemy, and challenged the Palestinians to demonstrate their commitment to peace now that Israel has completed its withdrawal from the Gaza Strip." Sharon said, "The State of Israel proved that it is willing to make painful concessions in order to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians. I call on the Palestinian leadership to show determination and leadership and to eliminate terror, violence and the culture of hatred from our relations." The Times adds the "audience reaction was polite, as is the custom here, but even that might have been more than Mr. Sharon would have expected in the past." Sharon said "numerous world leaders, including some from Islamic nations, have approached him in the halls of the United Nations building, asking to shake his hand and congratulating him on Israel's withdrawal from Gaza."

US Envoy To Taiwan Under Fire. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Douglas Paal, the U.S. government representative to Taiwan, is under fire from the State Department for misrepresenting Taiwan's policies to his bosses. A State inspector general report said Mr. Paal's leadership style caused low morale among employees of the American Institute in Taiwan, the official US office in Taiwan. The most serious IG charge, however, is that Mr. Paal falsely reported on Taiwanese issues to senior State Department officials, a cardinal sin for envoys. Officials familiar with the details of the IG report said Mr. Paal refused to allow dissenting views and was guilty of suppressing reports from US officials who disagreed with his pro-China views."

Bush Administration Again Pressing China To Revalue Yuan. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Phillips) reports the Bush Administration is "turning up the heat on Beijing to allow the Chinese yuan to rise against the dollar, reigniting an economic dispute that had appeared settled." Treasury Department officials are "disappointed that China's eight-week-old promise to let the yuan move with market forces has resulted in only a tiny increase in its exchange value. They warn that Beijing is courting a backlash from U.S. lawmakers who say China's undervalued currency is robbing American companies of business and American workers of jobs." Treasury Secretary John Snow has "invited the Chinese finance minister, Jin Renqing, to meet during a gathering in Washington on Sept. 23-24 of senior economic officials from the Group of Seven major industrialized nations. The Chinese have indicated they plan to attend, but haven't yet formally accepted."

EU Trade Commissioner Says Bush "Playing To Gallery" On Free Trade. The Financial Times (9/16, Alden, Beattie, Blitz, Williams) reports EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson "on Thursday accused President George W. Bush of 'playing to the gallery' by calling for the global elimination of tariffs and subsidies, saying US farmers would oppose such a sweeping measure." Mandelson's comments "came just one day after he and his counterpart Rob Portman, US trade representative, launched the most serious effort yet to agree on an agricultural liberalisation package as part of the Doha Round of global trade talks." In a Wednesday speech at the UN, Bush "said the US was 'ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to the free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same.'" Mandelson, in an interview "with BBC radio, said that, while he welcomed such ambition, 'it is easy to make these grandiose commitments. Some will say he is playing to the gallery, and some will say that he is making these sort of lavish promises in the almost certain knowledge that the rest of the world cannot or won't follow suit and therefore he will get a free pass."

US Decertifies Venezuela In War On Drugs. The Financial Times (9/16, Webb-Vidal) reports the US "struck Venezuela off its list of countries deemed to be co-operating in the war on drugs, injecting a new source of tension into deteriorating relations between Washington and Caracas." In a White House statement, President George W. Bush "said Venezuela, as well as Burma, had 'failed demonstrably' to adhere to their international counternarcotics obligations during the past year." Venezuela's "decertification", "as the measure is called, had been expected in the wake of a decision by President Hugo Chávez last month to suspend a co-operation agreement with the US Drug Enforcement Administration. While Mr Chávez has accused the DEA's officials of 'spying,' US officials have alleged elements within the Venezuelan authorities have become complicit with drugs-trafficking groups."

Merkel Shuffles Economic Advisers In Run Up To Election. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Walker) reports that with the German elections looming this weekend, "front-runner Angela Merkel is struggling to retune her message on the economy, which is supposed to be her strongest issue but has been weakening her lead in the polls." Merkel's center-right coalition "is still firmly ahead of rivals but polling just short of an absolute majority in Parliament. Calling on her supporters to give her an outright victory and a mandate for economic change, Ms. Merkel shuffled economic advisers and attempted to refocus attention on Germany's high unemployment and low growth under incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder." German media have "focused on her tax adviser, Paul Kirchhof, whose belief in flat-rate income taxes Mr. Schroeder has criticized heavily. Under pressure from within her own Christian Democrats party, Ms. Merkel has reduced Mr. Kirchhof's importance by inviting the party's most popular finance expert, Friedrich Merz, into the campaign. Mr. Merz fell out with Ms. Merkel last year."

The New York Times (9/16, Landler) reports "three days before an election that has become unexpectedly suspenseful," Merkel delivered "a blunt message: Chancellor Gerhard Schröder has failed, and his government ought to be thrown out." Merkel's "audience of several hundred cheered often, if not quite passionately." Merkel's "sense of grim purpose may suit the moment. After spending four months with a seemingly unassailable lead in the polls, she finds herself in a dogfight with Mr. Schröder." The campaign has "been bumpy for Mrs. Merkel, with a few missteps by her and more blatant gaffes by some of her allies. But what has made the real difference, political analysts say, has been a nimble performance by Mr. Schröder down the stretch."

The Washington Post (9/16, A22, Whitlock) reports that when he "took office seven years ago, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder made a big promise he didn't keep. 'My most important job is the fight against the scourge of unemployment,' he declared in his victory speech after winning the 1998 election. During the campaign, he told Germany's 4 million jobless that he would slash unemployment. Voters should kick him out of office if he failed, he added later." The Post adds Germany's "jobless rate is worse than ever; the number of people out of work hit a post-World War II high this year. German voters haven't forgotten Schroeder's pledge, and polls suggest they are ready to depose him in Sunday's national elections." Merkel "and her allies have been relentless in their reminders."

Bill Clinton Seeks To Generate Action At New York Conference. The Washington Post (9/16, A2, Kessler) reports the UN General Assembly "may have failed this week to come up with a stirring plan to combat the world's ills. But there was former president Bill Clinton -- once said to have harbored an ambition to become secretary general -- assembling his own mini-General Assembly of presidents, prime ministers, kings and other pooh-bahs on Thursday to devise specific plans for addressing poverty, global warming, religious conflict and better governance." The "inaugural meeting of what he has dubbed the Clinton Global Initiative will stretch over three days of seminars and speeches, bringing together 800 movers and shakers who paid $15,000 each for a seat. If the opening session is any guidepost, the meetings resemble the gabfests at Davos, the annual global economic summit held in Switzerland, or the Renaissance Weekends that Clinton attended as president. But Clinton added a catch -- each of the attendees is required to commit to doing something to improve the world." Every attendee is "required to make a commitment in writing. More than 50 commitments have been made, totaling more than $300 million."

Clinton Touts Global Initiative. In a Financial Times op-ed (9/16), former President Bill Clinton says, "This week, the inaugural Clinton Global Initiative (CGI), a three-day programme, is taking place in New York. More than 40 heads of state are joining me and a large number of participants from a broad swath of civil society: non-governmental organisation activists, legislators, policy experts, business leaders, journalists and writers from every continent. This will be a different kind of conference. At this conference, the activists will have access to the presidents and vice versa. And we will do a lot more than talk. International conferences always sound ambitious, but are rarely places where searching questions are answered." That is "exactly what we will try to get at CGI to address four critical challenges: poverty, religious strife, climate change and governance. All difficult – but all solvable."

Fox Expects Smooth Transition After 2006 Elections. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, O'Grady) reports the "past five years have been tough political sledding for Mexican President Vicente Fox, the first non-Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) president in 70 years. But his sixth and final year in the job may yet prove the most challenging." With the July, 2006 presidential elections "looming," Fox "emphasized the country's established 10-year record of fiscal stability and political reform that he predicts will guarantee a smooth transition of power." His "facts are straight. But still, there is the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD) and its candidate, Mexico City mayor and leftist firebrand Andres Manuel López Obrador, to worry about. This hard-charging, demagogic socialist with overt authoritarian instincts conceivably could win. Equally worrying are the stunts he might pull if he loses. He has a record of fomenting street violence when he doesn't get his way."

WSJournal Says UN Summit Accomplished Little. The Wall Street Journal (9/16) says in an editorial the United Nations world summit "seems to have done no real harm: It has not further extended the authority and reach of the U.N., it has not foisted another 'protocol' or 'convention' for the Senate to consider, and it has not established another significant seven-letter acronym -- er, agency -- for U.S. taxpayers to pronounce, and especially to fund." That "may be a negative accomplishment, but it is certainly a real one, especially as Secretary General Kofi Annan had envisioned the summit as an opportunity to expand membership in the Security Council, expand his own powers and require rich countries to pony up additional billions in foreign aid, among other brainstorms. It took new U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton seven weeks of dogged negotiation to make sure none of that happened, and for this he deserves credit." On the other hand, "the diplomatic price the US paid for a no-harm-done outcome was a no-reform result."

US Urged To Support Grass-Roots Institutions To Achieve Goals In Mideast. Waleed Ziad, an economic consultant and a principal in the Truman National Security Project, in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/16) questions whether the Egyptian election "or the other recent democratic experiments in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere, really further American aims in the Muslim world?" But "the establishment of the first popularly elected governments in Iraqi and Afghan history has been followed by more suicide bombings and unabated violence. And nobody expects real change, in terms of political freedoms or human rights, any time soon in Saudi Arabia or Egypt." Ziad believes the problem is "the absence not just of democracy but also of grass-roots representative institutions like a free press and independent political, cultural and social-welfare institutions." Ziad advocates the we "foster these organizations -- along with a free press and educational and cultural institutions. At the same time, our corporations should guide local entrepreneurs to promote a free market, the backbone of democracy. If anything is going to come of the neoconservative hope of making Iraq into a beacon of our values, it will be along these lines."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Little Progress In FBI Probe Of Anthrax Attacks (WP)

By Allan Lengel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

Four years after the deadly 2001 anthrax attacks, one of the most exhaustive investigations in FBI history has yielded no arrests and is showing signs of growing cold as officials have sharply reduced the number of agents on the case.

FBI agents and postal inspectors have pursued leads on four continents, conducted more than 8,000 interviews and carried out dozens of searches of houses, laboratories and other locations. They traveled to Afghanistan twice in the past 16 months to follow up on tips that proved fruitless, said law enforcement sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the issue.

Within law enforcement circles, some say the investigation, which is referred to as the Amerithrax probe, is in urgent need of a big break.

In the past year, the number of FBI agents on the case has dropped from 31 to 21, authorities said. During the same time, the number of postal inspectors has fallen from 13 to nine. The reward remains the same: $2.5 million for information leading to an arrest and conviction.

FBI officials said yesterday that investigators are still working diligently to find whoever was responsible for the anthrax-bacteria-laced mailings, which killed five people, sickened 17 others and led to the temporary shutdown of the House, Senate and Supreme Court buildings and numerous postal facilities. They said they are getting assistance from forensics experts and scientific researchers from law enforcement agencies, the intelligence community, university laboratories and private corporations.

"This globe-spanning investigation remains intensely active and broadly focused," said Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office. "The FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service remain steadfastly committed to the 22 victims of the attacks and to bring to justice those responsible."

The investigation has been so expansive that authorities now are in the process of taking inventory. The FBI and postal inspectors have spent months piecing together a voluminous internal report that will review the scope of the investigation and explore issues including what has been the prevailing theory: The culprit is a U.S. scientist who had access to the high-grade anthrax and the knowledge of how to physically manipulate it and use it as a weapon. That theory emerged early in the investigation and remains viable today, authorities said.

The report will include the names of various people deemed to be "persons of interest" over the years, as well as updates on the scientific tests. Authorities long ago narrowed down the type of anthrax to a strain called Ames but have been unable to identify the lab of origin. Much attention has focused on the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases, housed at Fort Detrick in the Frederick area.

Authorities hope that the report, which is to be completed soon and forwarded to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, will provide a concise road map of the probe and help determine its future direction.

Current and former law enforcement authorities said investigators and prosecutors often prepare such reports in complex, high-profile cases that go unresolved for years.

"It doesn't sound like they're close to cracking the case," said Eric H. Holder Jr., a Washington lawyer who was deputy attorney general during the Clinton administration.

The magnitude of the anthrax investigation has parallels to another marathon FBI probe: the 18-year search for the Unabomber, who killed three people and injured 23 others in mail-bomb attacks. Agents pored over 53,000 hotline tips, bomb parts and massive computer databases, but the breakthrough did not come until the Unabomber issued a public manifesto. The document led to the 1996 arrest of Theodore Kaczynski, whose brother recognized his thinking and tipped off the FBI.

The anthrax attacks took place just after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Spore-laden letters were mailed in pre-stamped envelopes in September and October of 2001 to the offices of then-Senate Democratic leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) as well as media outlets in Florida and New York.

Two District postal workers, a Florida photojournalist, a New York hospital worker and an elderly Connecticut woman died. At least 17 post offices and public office buildings were contaminated. Including cleanup costs, an FBI document put the damage in excess of $1 billion.

Over the years, officials have publicly identified only one "person of interest," and that was in August 2002: Steven J. Hatfill, a physician and bioterrorism expert who worked at Fort Detrick from 1997 to 1999. Hatfill, who has not been charged, has denied any involvement and filed a lawsuit against the Justice Department and then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft.

"He remains innocent today as he was four years ago," said Thomas G. Connolly, Hatfill's attorney. "They were getting enormous pressure, and a way to alleviate the pressure was to offer someone up, and that person happened to be Dr. Hatfill. That caused enormous harm to Dr. Hatfill. It didn't advance their investigation one iota."

Investigators have issued more than 5,000 subpoenas and conducted interviews and research throughout the United States as well as in Europe, Asia and Africa. Two years ago, the FBI spent about $250,000 and three weeks draining a pond in Frederick, acting on a theory that someone might have discarded materials there. The pond yielded nothing useful, authorities said.

In the past year, investigators have tried to follow up on and eliminate as many leads as possible. In case the matter ever goes to trial, they want to be able to counter any defense assertions that they failed to explore alternative scenarios or suspects, sources have said.

Authorities received information, for example, from at least one detainee at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, that there was an anthrax storage facility in the Kabul area, sources said. Because the deadly letters contained the Ames anthrax spores, manufactured in the United States, authorities entertained the possibility that they had been removed from a U.S. lab and transported overseas.

Agents checked the Kabul area in May 2004 but came up empty, sources said. In November, on additional information, agents spent weeks searching an area in the Kandahar mountains, several hundred miles outside of Kabul, but found nothing, sources said.

Meanwhile, in the United States, FBI agents and scientists have been working to match the gene sequence of the mailed anthrax spores to a specific laboratory. They remain particularly interested in such laboratories as Fort Detrick, Louisiana State University and Dugway Proving Ground in Utah.

An article published in May in a journal of the American Society of Microbiology and written by a number of scientists, including Bruce Budowle of the FBI laboratory in Quantico, suggested that scientists had still not pinpointed the lab of origin. "Grand leaps in sequencing technology to increase speed, to reduce costs and to maximize efficiency for forensic analysis are needed," the article said.

Clare Fraser, president of the Institute for Genomic Research in Rockville, one of the authors of the article, said of the science: "It's breaking new ground. There's still a lot of work to be done. But I don't think it's impossible to pinpoint."

Even if the test is successful, some scientists and law enforcement authorities caution, it may be of limited benefit because the nation's labs kept poor records of anthrax stocks and of those who passed through the facilities.

In light of the obstacles facing investigators, some relatives of the victims are wondering if the anthrax case will ever be solved. "It's been out there too long. I don't think they're going to find out" who did it, said Thomas L. Morris III of Suitland, whose father, D.C. postal worker Thomas Morris Jr., died of inhalation anthrax in October 2001.

Staff researcher Bobbye Pratt contributed to this report.

Congressman Says Hijacker Documents Destroyed (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) — A Pentagon employee was ordered to destroy documents that identified Mohamed Atta as a terrorist two years before the 2001 attacks, a congressman said Thursday.

The employee is prepared to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee and was expected to name the person who ordered him to destroy the large volume of documents, said Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa.

Weldon declined to name the employee, citing confidentiality matters. Weldon described the documents as "2.5 terabytes" — as much as one-fourth of all the printed materials in the Library of Congress, he added.

A Senate Judiciary Committee aide said the witnesses for Wednesday hearing had not been finalized and could not confirm Weldon's comments.

A message left Thursday with a Pentagon spokesman, Army Maj. Paul Swiergosz, was not immediately returned.

Weldon has said that Atta, the mastermind of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and three other hijackers were identified in 1999 by a classified military intelligence unit known as "Able Danger," which determined they could be members of an al-Qaeda cell.

On Wednesday, former members of the Sept. 11 commission dismissed the "Able Danger" assertions. One commissioner, ex-Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., said, "Bluntly, it just didn't happen and that's the conclusion of all 10 of us."

Weldon responded angrily to Gorton's assertions.

"It's absolutely unbelievable that a commission would say this program just didn't exist," Weldon said Thursday.

Pentagon officials said this month they had found three more people who recall an intelligence chart identifying Atta as a terrorist prior to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Two military officers, Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer and Navy Capt. Scott Phillpott, have come forward to support Weldon's claims.

Moroccan-born Dane Denies Promoting Terrorism In Court Hearing (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jan M. Olsen, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - COPENHAGEN, Denmark-A Moroccan-born Danish citizen arrested on suspicion of promoting terrorism denied the allegations in court Thursday.

Said Mansour was arrested Sept. 8 in Copenhagen on suspicion of encouraging terrorism by calling for a Jihad, or holy war, against the West in scores of CDs, computer discs and video tapes found in his home.

In his challenge to a court order allowing police to hold him for four weeks, Mansour told the Eastern High Court that he was not a terrorist and that the material was for his personal use. The court is expected to rule Friday.

"I have lived in this country for 23 years and I have always lived in peace," Mansour told the court. "I can assure you, I am no terrorist and I have nothing to do with terrorism."

In three raids on his home since November, police have seized some 3,000 CD-ROMs and roughly 500 computer disks, most containing calls for a jihad. Police also seized 161 CD-ROMs when Mansour was allegedly selling at a Copenhagen flea market in June, and 14 computer disks found in his car during a Danish-German border check in March.

Jihad is Arabic for the Islamic concept of the struggle to do good. However, extremists commonly use it to refer to holy war.

Mansour's lawyer, Claus Bergsoe, said his client had a large archive of material, but did not distribute it. However, Bergsoe also said Mansour acts like a missionary because "he's a man who agitates for Islam."

Prosecutor Lone Damgaard said results of a police wiretap include a tape in which the accused promised to copy a book and a tape. Someone calling themself Mansour in an Internet chat room also claimed to distribute information about Islam, she said.

"That must be some kind of distribution activity," said Damgaard.

Some material stamped with the logo of Mansour's publishing house, Al Nur Islamic Information, was also seized in a mosque in northern Italy and in Hamburg, Germany.

Some of the digital recordings shown earlier this month in court included Chechen Muslims decapitating and shooting Russian soldiers, and the beheadings of American hostage Nicholas Berg in Iraq and Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl in Pakistan.

If charged and convicted, Mansour could face up to six years in prison.

Mansour has been under surveillance by Denmark's intelligence service for years. Police claim he is tied to the al-Qaida terror network's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, and the blind Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, who was convicted in connection with the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in New York.

'Scary' U Of M Student Jailed (MCA)

By Chris Conley

Memphis Commercial Appeal, September 16, 2005

When FBI agents walked into Mahmoud Maawad's spartan apartment at 3557 Mynders # 5 on Sept. 9, they found a desk, chair, computer and a Koran.

They also found an airline pilot's uniform, a chart of Memphis International Airport, and instructional DVDs, including one called "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act."

A federal magistrate Thursday ordered Maawad, a 29-year-old University of Memphis student from Egypt, jailed until his trial on charges of wire fraud and fraudulent use of a Social Security number.

"The specific facts and circumstances are scary," Asst. U.S. Atty. Steve Parker said, arguing against Maawad's release.

Since Maawad can't get a Social Security number, "he can't get a pilot's license, and can't go to flight school," Parker said. "But he wants to get behind the wheel of an aircraft."

Parker said "we don't know either way" if Maawad is a terrorist or connected to any terror groups.

U.S. Magistrate Judge S. Thomas Anderson ruled that Maawad be held without bond.

Though it's not illegal to buy aviation material, Anderson noted, "it is hard for the court to understand why he has a large concentration of those items, and nothing else to indicate Mr. Maawad plans to stay in the community."

Maawad has been in the country illegally since 1999, and has used a false Social Security number to enroll in schools and open a bank account, Parker said.

He's been working off-the-books for cash at a North Memphis convenience store, and was arrested by Shelby County sheriff's deputies last spring for selling alcohol to a minor.

Agents are downloading information from Maawad's computer and analyzing materials from his apartment in search of a terrorism connection.

"My school is everything," said Maawad, a clean-shaven man built like a weightlifter. "I stay in this country for seven years; I stay for the school."

Maawad said he's studying science and economics at the U of M.

Since Maawad can't work legally, he told authorities a friend would support him.

When court employees tried to reach that friend, the telephone was disconnected.

Between April and August, the penniless student ordered $3,000 in aviation materials, DVDs titled "Ups and Downs of Takeoffs and Landings," "Airplane Talk," "Mental Math for Pilots" and "Mastering GPS Flying," FBI agent Thad Gulczynski testified.

He also ordered a pilot's coat and hat, and a chart of the Memphis airport terminal area from Spotty's USA in San Diego.

When the company didn't receive payment on $2,500 worth of merchandise it had delivered, officials called the FBI, which launched an investigation, Gulczynski said.

Hunger Strike Spreads At Jail For U.S. Terror Suspects At Guantanamo (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stevenson Jacobs, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico-A hunger strike at the U.S. prison for terror suspects in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to its largest point since detainees began their latest protest more than a month ago, a military official said Thursday.

After 11 detainees joined the protest overnight, there are now 131 taking part in the hunger strike, said Maj. Jeff Weir, a spokesman for the detention center.

Twenty-one of the striking prisoners were hospitalized in stable condition at the prison medical clinic, including 20 who were being tube-fed, Weir said.

The military considers a hunger strike to be a form of suicide and Weir said that one prisoner was restrained after he resisted having a feeding tube inserted.

"No facility in the U.S., and hopefully the world, is going to let someone starve to death," Weir said. "We're charged with keeping them in good health, and that's what we're doing."

Guantanamo officials said this latest hunger strike began Aug. 8 with 76 detainees protesting their confinement. It has since grown to more than a quarter of the approximately 500 detainees.

The military defines someone as being on a hunger strike after they have refused nine consecutive meals. There have been at least two previous hunger strikes, but military officials said they were not able to confirm whether this was the largest.

A U.S. human rights group, the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, has claimed that some 210 detainees are participating in the hunger strike.

The detainees are accused of ties to the al-Qaida terror network or Afghanistan's ousted Taliban regime. Most have been held for more than three years without charge.

PATRIOT ACT:

Heavican Says Patriot Act Not Threat To Average Citizen (KNEB-AM)

KNEB-AM 960, Scottsbluff, NE, September 16, 2005

U.S. Attorney Mike Heavican told Scottsbluff Kiwanians Thursday the average citizen should not fear the expanded power authorities have under the Patriot Act. Heavican, who spoke on the issue in Sidney Wednesday and will be in Chadron Friday, says the only people who should be concerned about the legislation should be those involved in terrorist activity.

Heavican says authorities have always had access to library, bank and medical records for cases involving criminal investigations. Heavican says with the Patriot Act, those powers now expand to cases involving international terrorism. Heavican told the group searches into personal records can only be done if probable cause is established and if the judicial system agrees it is justified.

Heavican says the feds have tried to use their new authority, which includes delayed notice search warrants, sparingly and only under circumstances where somebody's life is in danger, the suspect is a flight risk, or if the investigation would be compromised.

WAR NEWS:

Insurgents Strike Baghdad Again; Two-Day Death Toll Nears 200 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 15 (AP) - Suicide bombers struck the capital again on Thursday, killing at least 31 people in two attacks about a minute apart and lifting the death toll in two days of carnage to nearly 200.

A dozen bombings during a nine-hour spate of terror on Wednesday killed at least 167 people and wounded nearly 600 in Baghdad's worst day of bloodshed since the United States-led invasion in March 2003.

American officials blamed the onslaught on efforts by the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency to answer a successful joint United States-Iraqi offensive last week in the northern city of Tal Afar and to spark sectarian strife in hopes of undermining the Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's proposed constitution.

"These spikes of violence are predictable around certain critical events that highlight the progress of democracy," said Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, the chief American military spokesman in Iraq.

General Lynch said the joint operation in Tal Afar killed 145 insurgents and captured 361 in the second operation in a year to rid the area of militants, including foreign fighters crossing from Syria. Now, he said, American and Iraqi forces were fighting to regain control of the Syrian border, near the western insurgent stronghold of Qaim, on the Euphrates River and well to the south of Tal Afar. "We believe that the terrorists and foreign fighters are entering Iraq across the Syrian border, down the Euphrates River Valley into Baghdad," General Lynch said.

The latest violence only deepened the misery in Baghdad, where streets on Thursday were noticeably quieter and, in the southern Dora district, where the latest bombings were concentrated, deserted.

American and Iraqi soldiers using loudspeakers roamed the district, warning residents to stay indoors because five more suicide car bombers were believed to be in the area.

[Gunmen shot dead two laborers and wounded 13 in the New Baghdad district of the Iraqi capital on Friday morning, Reuters reported. The laborers were waiting to be hired for a day's work when the gunmen opened fire, the police said.]

Clashes were reported Thursday in Ramadi, a militant stronghold on the Euphrates west of Baghdad. A police captain, Nasir Alusi, said American and Iraqi troops in Ramadi came under mortar attack as militants roamed the streets. Shops were closed and streets empty. Gunfire echoed through the area, he said.

The American military did not confirm the report, but General Lynch said operations were continuing in Anbar Province, where Ramadi is the capital.

The United Nations planned to print and distribute five million copies of Iraq's draft constitution before the Oct. 15 referendum, a spokesman said Thursday. The spokesman, Farhan Haq, said officials hoped the Iraqi Parliament would sign off on the text by Sunday. "Once the transitional National Assembly designates a final draft constitution, we stand ready to assist in printing it and distributing that draft constitution so that the Iraqi people can make an informed choice in the upcoming referendum," Mr. Haq said.

Baghdad Toll Nears 200 As Insurgent Strikes Continue (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 15 -- Insurgents believed to be allied to Abu Musab Zarqawi's group al Qaeda in Iraq kept up bombings in the capital on Thursday, launching strikes that brought the two-day death toll here to more than 190.

The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the surge in bombings represented the kind of occasional spikes in attacks that the military has been expecting. Lynch told reporters, "Zarqawi is on the ropes."

Three car bombs in a western neighborhood of the capital killed four Iraqi postal workers and 17 police commandos, police and Interior Ministry officials said. Iraqi and U.S. leaders have identified the commandos as Iraq's front line against the insurgency.

Meanwhile, one policeman was killed in a gun battle with insurgents and another officer was found handcuffed and shot in the head, news agencies said. The bodies of seven unidentified men were found in spots around the capital, blindfolded with their hands tied.

Insurgents also managed to land a single mortar round inside the Green Zone, the base for U.S. officials and Iraq's government. There were no casualties and only minimal damage, U.S. officials said.

A day earlier, at least 14 car bombs across Baghdad killed more than 160 people, the majority of them Shiite Muslim civilians -- the war's highest toll for deaths inflicted by insurgent attacks in the capital.

An audiotape released on an al Qaeda-linked Web site after Wednesday's attacks said Zarqawi's group had opened "all-out war" on Iraq's Shiite majority. The voice sounded the same as that heard in previous, authenticated statements from Zarqawi's group.

Alleged al Qaeda attacks on Thursday also hit the city of Ramadi, capital of the western province of Anbar, a stronghold of foreign-led fighters. Witnesses said al Qaeda-allied fighters rocketed and shelled two U.S. military installations at Ramadi and traded fire with U.S. patrols in the city.

The U.S. military reported one Marine killed in the fighting at Ramadi and said a would-be car bomber also was killed. Iraqi emergency medical workers said Marine snipers killed six al Qaeda fighters.

The two-day barrage of attacks attributed to al Qaeda in Iraq, and the increasing control of towns in the west along the Euphrates River being asserted by foreign-led insurgents, intensified the U.S. military's focus on Zarqawi.

American commanders often have publicly denigrated Zarqawi's role in the insurgency to little more than that of a media-fostered figurehead. On Thursday, however, Lynch discussed Zarqawi in some of the sharpest terms yet, calling him the Americans' main target and saying the United States was winning the fight against him.

"We believe we are experiencing great success against the most crucial element of the insurgency, which is the terrorists and the foreign fighters. The face of that is Zarqawi and al Qaeda in Iraq," Lynch said.

"We've got great intelligence which tells us where he's moving to and where he's trying to establish safe havens. As soon as we see him trying to establish a safe haven, we will conduct operations," such as the one still underway against northwestern insurgent strongholds in Tall Afar, Lynch said. "We're using all assets under our control in conjunction with the Iraqi security forces to find him and kill him."

Asked why he believed U.S. forces and their allies were succeeding in the fight against insurgents, Lynch pointed to accomplishments in Tall Afar and two other recent or ongoing operations in the west and northwest: 371 suspected insurgents killed and 1,163 detained.

Killings by insurgents, however, also have mounted fairly steadily since Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari's transitional government was named on April 28. The insurgents' use of increasingly sophisticated roadside bombs and land mines helped make August the third-deadliest month of the war for U.S. troops, with corresponding increases this summer in deaths among Iraqi civilians and security forces.

Defense Minister Sadoun Dulaimi told reporters Thursday that the stepped-up Baghdad bombings were insurgent retaliation for the Iraqi military's leading role in the operation at Tall Afar. "We tell the terrorists, we will never be weak or inattentive. We will chase you wherever you are, in the cities, villages," Dulaimi said. "I think what is happening is the last breath of the terrorists."

[On Friday morning, gunmen killed two day laborers and injured 13 in an attack in the New Baghdad district of the Iraqi capital, police said, according to the Reuters news agency. The laborers were waiting to be hired for a day's work.]

In other violence Thursday, bombs and ambushes killed a total of four policemen in the cities of Baqubah, Samarra and Kirkuk, all north of Baghdad. In southern Iraq, police told news agencies they had found the body of Mahdi Attar, a prominent Shiite cleric. Attar and three associates had been shot or stabbed to death.

Sectarian tensions have multiplied in Iraq in recent months, encouraged in part by insurgents with the avowed intent of provoking civil war. Shiite religious ceremonies have been frequent targets of attacks, and many Shiites fear attacks this weekend, coinciding with their annual pilgrimage to the holy city of Karbala, in southern Iraq.

Also Thursday, a Western official familiar with arrangements for Saddam Hussein's trial by an Iraqi tribunal, scheduled for Oct. 19, said he expected the former president to be tried in connection with a variety of crimes, including the destruction of thousands of Kurdish villages and the disappearance and killing of their inhabitants in the 1980s. Authorities so far have announced charges in only one, smaller event, the killing of 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against Hussein in their town.

U.S. forces also released video Thursday from the Sept. 7 rescue of American contractor Roy Hallums, kidnapped from his office in Baghdad 10 months earlier. The video showed what looked to be a narrow, dark cave covered by steel bars, and a wasted but happy Hallums talking to U.S. soldiers immediately after his release.

The cage was in a hole under a farmhouse, and a rug and freezer were placed on the hatch over the hole to conceal it, said Lynch, the military spokesman. U.S. forces had detained someone they believed had information about Hallums's whereabouts and used the detainee to pinpoint the location, Lynch said.

In Najaf, south of Baghdad, police announced the recovery of 150 relics stolen from Iraq's national museums and the site of ancient Babylon, describing some as monuments that required trucks to move. Police arrested four Iraqi suspects. A fifth suspect, an Iranian, escaped, local border police commander Hussein Awais Ghazal said. Illegal trafficking of relics from Iraq's 5,000-year history erupted with the looting accompanying the U.S. invasion and collapse of Hussein's security forces.

Special correspondents Naseer Nouri in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

More Iraqis Lured To Al Qaeda Group (LAT)

By Greg Miller And Tyler Marshall, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Al Qaeda's top operative in Iraq is drawing growing numbers of Iraqi nationals to his organization, increasing the reach and threat of an insurgent group that has been behind many of the most devastating attacks in the country, U.S. officials and Iraqi government leaders say.

The group, headed by Jordanian-born radical Abu Musab Zarqawi, previously was composed almost exclusively of militants from other Arab nations, and has symbolized the foreign dimension of a stubborn insurgency fighting to oust U.S. forces.

But Zarqawi "is bringing more and more Iraqi fighters into his fold," a U.S. official said, adding that Iraqis accounted for "more than half his organization."

Although Zarqawi is believed to command fewer than 1,000 fighters, the daring and lethal nature of their attacks, coupled with Zarqawi's links to the Al Qaeda terrorist network, has made him the most notorious figure in the Iraq insurgency.

The U.S. has set a $25-million bounty on Zarqawi, whose organization has been behind a series of beheadings, suicide bombings and other gruesome attacks.

Zarqawi's faction has claimed responsibility for a bombing campaign this week that has left at least 169 dead in Baghdad, apparently in reprisal for a U.S.-Iraqi campaign against insurgents in the northern city of Tall Afar. One of the car bombers reportedly lured day laborers to his vehicle by posing as an employer. It was unclear whether he was Iraqi.

Details of a growing Iraqi dimension to Zarqawi's group were provided by three U.S. officials with access to classified intelligence data and who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. Their comments reflect the government's latest attempt to come to grips with a multi-layered insurgency that has often confounded U.S. forces and intelligence agencies.

The U.S. officials indicated that the infusion of Iraqis, including, apparently, former members of the Iraqi intelligence service and military, represented a change in the group's makeup rather than a major expansion.

A significant Iraqi presence in the Zarqawi group carries ominous implications, both for the Bush administration and the fledgling, popularly elected government it supports in Baghdad.

The Iraqis under Zarqawi's wing could provide him with better intelligence, and give legitimacy to a group viewed by many Iraqis as unwanted outsiders. In addition, Iraqi recruits are being exposed to the workings of a highly efficient extremist group.

The influx of Iraqis also would diminish the effect of any tightening of border controls — a key Bush administration objective — on the insurgency's strength.

U.S. intelligence in Iraq has frequently been wrong. However, two factors add credence to the reports of the shifting composition of Zarqawi's group: Several of his senior lieutenants have been captured by U.S. forces in recent months and some reportedly have talked extensively under interrogation.

Senior Iraqi officials reported seeing the same development.

Mowaffak Rubaie, Iraq's national security advisor and a former Shiite activist, said "there's no doubt" that once-nationalistic elements of the insurgency were drifting toward Zarqawi and his extremist Salafi sect, also known as Wahhabism, which seeks to establish a puritanical society modeled on early Islamic times.

"There's a tendency to religion-ize the insurgency," he said. "Religion is a strong motive. You're not going to find someone who's going to die for Baathists. But Salafists have a very strong message.

"If you use the Koran selectively, it could be a weapon of mass destruction."

Few Iraqis appear to share Zarqawi's goal of establishing a radical Islamic state, but small numbers of Iraqi hard-liners apparently are attracted by the effectiveness of Zarqawi's group.

"They're the best game in town, the most organized organization," said a U.S. official, who added that Zarqawi's network was also a "well-funded organization that is willing to pay people for their work" when many Iraqis, particularly police, have little or no income.

The officials noted that police in three cities, including Mosul, are not being paid. They declined to name the others.

Officials said it was not clear how dedicated these Iraqis were to the broader Al Qaeda cause, or whether they would be willing to travel outside the country to carry out terrorist attacks in Arab or Western nations.

Zarqawi escaped capture in February near the city of Ramadi, authorities say. He fled on foot as coalition forces at a checkpoint intercepted a truck containing a laptop and documents. Coalition forces since have killed or captured several of his lieutenants. The latest such incident was announced Sept. 9, when a U.S. military official said a high-level aide had been killed in western Iraq.

But the U.S. officials who are familiar with intelligence on Zarqawi's group said the organization had proved remarkably resilient and was organized to withstand losses of key leaders, including Zarqawi.

One of the officials noted that coalition forces thought they had delivered a major blow in January with the capture of Zarqawi's principal bomb maker in the capital. But since then, the official said, "car bombs are way up in Baghdad."

Overall, the officials said, the insurgency in Iraq is divided into three "clumps": religious extremists such as Zarqawi; former members of the Baath Party of Saddam Hussein; and disparate Iraqi groups acting out of local or national interests.

The officials described a steady flow of Saudis, Yemenis and other Arab nationals into — and, in some cases, out of — the country. But officials said foreign fighters accounted for less than 10% of the insurgents in Iraq.

Zarqawi's reported success in recruiting Iraqis to his cause comes as frustration is mounting among the minority Sunni Arabs, who fear they will be marginalized in the new Iraq and are prepared to fight its emergence.

The CIA and other agencies have resisted pressure to provide an estimate of the number of insurgents in Iraq, partly out of concern that it would foster the impression that there is a finite population that can be stamped out.

Rather, officials said intelligence analysts had noted that there were about 800,000 to 1 million Iraqi Sunni Arab men of military age who represent the pool of potential insurgents. How many might turn to violence depends on several factors, starting with the extent to which Sunnis are satisfied with their stake in any new government.

Some Sunnis have objected to the draft constitution that is to be presented to Iraqis in a national referendum next month. The community's sense of estrangement could be heightened if the document is passed, as is likely, over its objections.

"They're going to be extremely disappointed when they fail, and they're going to believe this is the result of fraud and being cheated out of what they deserve," one of the U.S. officials said. "There's going to be some real ratcheting up of Sunni disaffection with the process."

The trial of Hussein, to begin next month, is also likely to add to a sense of victimization among Sunnis, analysts say.

US Tempers Its View Of Victory In Iraq (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - Since the day in May 2003 when President Bush stood beneath a banner proclaiming "Mission Accomplished," the course of the conflict in Iraq has been one of optimism followed by revision.

From the earliest battle plans, which called for the quick return home of tens of thousands of troops, to the campaign in Fallujah and national elections that followed, the Pentagon had hoped it could largely eliminate lingering unrest before turning security over to Iraqis.

The increasingly bracing tone from the White House and Pentagon, however, points to a new calculus. The persistence of the attacks, as well as their undiminished capacity - witnessed by Wednesday's bombings in Baghdad, which killed more than 150 Iraqis - seems to have confirmed that the insurgency will probably outlast the American occupation.

Indeed, the inability of American forces to defeat the insurgency through strikes such as the current offensive in Tal Afar raises doubts about the possibility of any clear victory for the administration. And it could leave the Iraqis with a years-long task that many planners had not anticipated.

"There has been a clear realization that this war is not winnable in the short term," says Seth Jones, a terrorism expert at RAND Corp. in Arlington, Va.

The change in thinking has come gradually, as pivotal moments in the maturation of the Iraqi state have come and gone - and the insurgency has remained. In the first months after Mr. Bush declared victory, Pentagon officials were loath even to use the word "insurgency" to describe the attacks that killed some two dozen troops in May and June of 2003.

In testimony before Congress that July, Gen. Tommy Franks argued that the attacks did not fit his definition of an insurgency.

A year later, however, the continuing toll of the insurgency was reshaping the Pentagon's expectations. By the spring of 2005, a spike in violence, despite the previous November's successful campaign against the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah and January's relatively peaceful elections, made it clear that political momentum was not enough.

Part of the reason for the failure to plan for uncertainties came from the ideological insistence that almost all Iraqis would see Americans as liberators. Yet it also came from a political calculation that dismissed the lessons of the Clinton years. "There was a sense that there was nothing to learn from Somalia or Haiti or Bosnia," says Dr. Jones.

Some parts of the administration have been slower to reach this point than others. In the midst of the May attacks, Vice President Dick Cheney famously said that the insurgency was in its "last throes." But less than a month later, on June 26, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said: "Insurgencies tend to go on five, six, eight, 10, 12 years. Coalition forces, foreign forces are not going to repress that insurgency. We're going to create an environment that the Iraqi people and the Iraqi security forces can win against that insurgency."

It is this attitude that has moved from post-invasion rhetoric to Pentagon doctrine. In some ways, it is the same measure of victory that the Pentagon laid out two years ago. "At an absolute minimum, we'll be here for [two years], and probably longer, to make sure that [Iraqi forces] are capable of protecting the sovereignty of Iraq," said Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez in an Aug. 7, 2003, Pentagon briefing.

Administration officials have always insisted that events on the ground - and not artificial timelines - would dictate American actions in Iraq. Yet today, the finish line is no more certain than it was two years ago - and the threat that Iraqi forces will be facing when US troops leave is more dire than many military officials imagined.

The result is that Bush's characteristic steel about Iraq still lacks any specifics or certainty. "As a practical matter, no one in the administration is going to admit this," says Anthony Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies here. "Nobody's making military promises that are unrealistic."

There are some positive signs. The offensive to roust insurgents from Tal Afar, which began in May and intensified the past two weeks, has put more responsibility in the hands of the Iraqi military. "It's a very important step in turning over security to the Iraqis," says Rachel Bronson, an analyst for the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

But there is a long way to go, she and others say. Significantly, when Iraqi President Jalal Talabani suggested this week that Iraqi forces would be ready to replace 50,000 US troops by the end of the year, he quickly reversed his statement and later added that US soldiers might be needed for another two years, though he set no deadline.

Amid this military uncertainty, administration officials have turned to political events as the primary marks of progress. "The referendum on the constitution and the elections at the end of December are the most important aspects of what we're doing now," Gen. George Casey told Congress in June.

Yet Wednesday's attacks in Baghdad suggest that the practical matter of adequately preparing the Iraqi military - not the grand clash of political ideas - will ultimately determine the success or failure of American hopes, analysts say. In a recent paper, Dr. Cordesman writes: "If political developments do have a positive effect, it will be ... because a substantially larger number of Iraqi Sunnis ... see the military balance shifting decisively in favor of Iraqi government forces."

Iraq's President Talks Of Saddam And Better Days (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Jalal Talabani, the president of Iraq, is sitting at a long table set in the middle of a hotel ballroom in Manhattan. This is U.N. Week in New York, the annual opening of the General Assembly. It is 8:30 in the morning and he is talking about Saddam Hussein. The trial of Saddam will begin as scheduled Oct. 19, it will be public and "it will last months." There have been reports that the trial would be limited to a single event -- the 1982 massacre in Dujail of 150 Shiites. Mr. Talabani said the trial will extend well beyond the events in Dujail.

"At first Saddam refused to talk," Mr. Talabani said. The former dictator would not discuss the operational military details of alleged Baathist crimes elsewhere. "Then a young Iraqi judge, a very clever man, said to him, 'I'm very sorry to see the ex-president of Iraq is a coward.' Saddam said, 'I am coward? I can answer every question.' After that, he talked."

While Mr. Talabani is speaking to his interviewers -- writers and editors from The Wall Street Journal -- a man in a suit passes behind the Iraqi president and returns to quietly place a plate before him. It holds three peeled, glistening hard-boiled eggs, sauteed mushrooms and bread. The man returns with a small plate of fresh fruit. President Talabani has tucked a linen napkin into his collar. He is ready to eat.

The Iraqi president looks at his un-plated guests, and with the aplomb of a skilled politician smiles and insists that they get up from their chairs, go over to a table nearby and get some food. "I invited you to breakfast," says the president, beaming.

Mr. Talabani, a hearty man at 72, represents a country presented to the world daily on TV and in print as falling into an insurgent abyss of bombs and blood. Amid this, he conveys remarkable calm and confidence.

"Two weeks ago I was in Najaf," he says of the holy city (pop., 560,000) in the Shiite south. "I went into the streets and into the people and it was calm." He claims that 14 of Iraq's 18 provinces are quiet: "All Iraq is not Fallujah and Tal Afar."

It no doubt requires a deep reservoir of equanimity to keep the constitutional process moving forward amid events like Wednesday's mass bombings in Baghdad. Mr. Talabani, arguably the most popular political figure in fractious Iraq, brings to this project a personal history built from political stress.

At 13, he is said to have begun a secret association of Kurdish students. At 14 he joined the Kurdistan Democratic Party. Back then, in the 1940s, his opposition was the Hashemite monarchy, which denied him entry to medical school. Fortuitously, he became a lawyer, journalist and ultimately a leader of the 25-year Kurdish resistance to Saddam's Baathist dictatorship. In April he was appointed to the presidency by the popularly elected National Assembly and is now, in effect, the public face of the new Iraq.

New Iraq's ability to get as far politically as it has turns in no small part on its major players acting responsibly, rare in any nation but noteworthy in a country widely predicted to be heading inevitably to civil war. The Kurdish Mr. Talabani is one such person. Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, leader of the south's Shiites, is another, as Mr. Talabani explained:

"In the 1920s when British forces came to Iraq, Shiites resisted and they lost everything. This time the Shiites did not make that mistake. For example Sistani, he doesn't call the foreign forces 'occupiers'; he calls them 'guests.' Tell 'the guests' to do so and so. The Sunnis have repeated the mistake of the Shiites of the '20s. Now the Sunnis understand they made a big mistake, and they are trying to improve relations with the United States."

Mr. Talabani also singled out another of Iraq's leaders, the oft-criticized Ahmed Chalabi. "Among civilians, Dr. Chalabi especially has been active in preventing war between Sunnis and Shiites," he said.

But while the Sunnis are starting to understand where their best interests lie, they lack a political center just now. The Kurds and Shiites, Mr. Talabani explains, are relatively cohesive as political entities, but the Sunnis are divided into small, often tribal groups: "Saddam didn't permit any kind of Sunni leadership to emerge." Right now, he said, the Sunnis need assurance that the government can protect them, as in the current joint U.S.-Iraqi offensive against the insurgents in Tal Afar.

Up to now, he said, the anti-insurgent offensives in the Sunni Triangle essentially have amounted to a policy of "liberate and leave." This time with Tal Afar, they intend to stay: "We must keep some forces there or arm local people to defend their freedom."

He acknowledged that Iraq's transition poses a challenge in the region: "All Arab states are afraid of a democracy. A democratic Iraq with different nationalities -- Kurds, Arabs Turkomen, Shiites, Sunnis -- will inspire all the Middle East. The Sunnis of Saudi Arabia, the Kurds of Iran, Syria, Turkey -- when they see this, it will inspire all of them. For that reason none in the Middle East is helpful in having a democratic Iraq." When he is asked to discuss Syria and the current terror inside Iraq, he declines to stay on the record.

At the end, with the three eggs gone, one feels impelled to wish Mr. Talabani good luck. The Iraqis, by now, have earned it.

Records Detail Treatment Of Iraqi Captives (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Army officers in Iraq told their superiors last year that soldiers often lacked the training to handle detainees, did not always understand what constituted abuse and sometimes used techniques against prisoners that they "remembered from movies," according to military records made public Thursday.

In two incidents described in the reports, bound detainees were shot and killed by soldiers. Although the circumstances were unclear, officers or Army lawyers said afterward that the killings could have been prevented with better training, facilities and understanding by soldiers of the rules of engagement.

The episodes were described last year to Lt. Gen. Paul T. Mikolashek, the Army inspector general who conducted one of more than a dozen reviews in the aftermath of the abuse scandal at the Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad. In reporting his findings to top Army commanders in July 2004, Mikolashek concluded there were no systemic failures or widespread patterns of detainee abuse.

But according to documents generated for his report, including 1,800 pages of evidence that were obtained and released Thursday by the American Civil Liberties Union as part of a lawsuit to learn more about prisoner treatment, Mikolashek was told of many incidents in which poor training and inadequate facilities created an atmosphere that fostered abuse.

Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman, said the documents represented "Army reports and Army information, where the Army was looking into allegations and sorting out the situation about detainee mistreatment."

But he said they did not show widespread abuse. "The Army has looked carefully at each allegation and addressed it very thoroughly," he said.

Boyce added that there had been more than 400 investigations into allegations of Iraqi detainee mistreatment — many involving individual incidents — since the earliest revelations of sexual abuse and physical mistreatment at Abu Ghraib in January 2004. Thus far, he said, allegations against more than 200 soldiers have led to court-martial proceedings, nonjudicial punishment and other administrative penalties.

Mikolashek concluded in his report that incidents of abuse did not result from deficiencies within the Army. "The Army's leaders and soldiers are effectively conducting detainee operations and providing for the care and security of detainees in an intense operational environment," he wrote. "Based on this inspection, we were unable to identify system failures that resulted in incidents of abuse."

But Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the documents suggested that Mikolashek had brushed aside evidence that there was abuse and significant training problems.

"Our government has failed, and the blame is on Washington, not Hollywood," Romero said.

Romero was referring to an account of a platoon leader who said interpreters were often taken along on raids to pick up insurgents. But there often were not enough interrogators to go with the interpreters, and that meant other officers were thrust into the job of interviewing detainees — even though they had no training to do so.

The unidentified platoon leader, who was with the 4th Infantry Division from Ft. Hood, Texas, said they had to improvise. "Officers and [noncommissioned officers] at point of capture engaged in interrogations using techniques they literally remembered from movies," he said.

The platoon leader did not elaborate on the nature of the techniques used. But he added: "Soldiers need to be trained in basic tactical interrogation techniques. It's going to be done one way or the other. Why not the right way?"

Another report to Mikolashek described one of the fatal shooting incidents that emerged from the documents. In the report, an unnamed officer said a soldier "killed a detainee he was guarding" at a collection point, prior to the prisoner being sent to a prison.

"The detainee's hands were tied … and the soldier shot and killed the detainee," the officer said. "This incident could have been prevented if he had better training."

The officer said the soldier did not understand the Army's rules of engagement, and noted that the soldier was discharged. No other details were provided in the heavily redacted reports released Thursday.

A second incident was detailed in an account by a member of the judge advocate general's office from the 4th Infantry Division. The officer, a lawyer, described a guard who shot and killed a prisoner he believed was trying to escape. The officer said the detainee's hands were cuffed and he was standing behind a prison wire.

"The investigating officer determined the detainee was not trying to escape," the officer said. "He said the incident could have been prevented with better facilities, and training for the guard force."

It was unclear whether the soldiers involved in the two cases mentioned in the reports had been punished.

In his report last year, Mikolashek mentioned an incident in which a bound prisoner was shot and killed by a U.S. soldier, but it appeared to differ from those described in Thursday's documents in that the soldier in question had bragged about wanting to kill an Iraqi.

In other instances of potential abuse, two officers reported that a detainee was forced to sit on the floor while a bottle of water was poured over his head by a civilian U.S. interrogator who "just seemed to be having a good time, because [the] detainee was not talking and never did talk," an unnamed officer said.

Others also took part in abusing the detainee, the officer said. But the incident was not reported to superiors because it was not considered a violation. A staff sergeant interviewed for Mikolashek's investigation complained of a lack of guidance on what soldiers were allowed to do. In interviews about other incidents, officers said commanders had never explained what constituted abuse.

With soldiers overworked in dealing with a crush of detainees, one first lieutenant said that there was no requirement to report abuse, only a "moral obligation" to do so.

Afghan Candidate Wounded; 2 Backers Abducted (NYT)

By CARLOTTA GALL

DOJ_NMG_0005982

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 15 - A candidate was shot in Nuristan Province on Wednesday morning, and two of her supporters were kidnapped, in an attack before the national election on Sunday, local officials said Thursday.

The candidate, Hawa Alam Nuristani, an anchorwoman on the state-run Afghan Television and Radio in Kabul, was traveling by car to a campaign meeting in Nuristan, her native province, in the east when she was wounded.

"They came under attack by unknown people," the provincial police chief, Gen. Abdul Baqi, said by phone. "She received four rounds from a pistol in her leg. Two others with her, supporters filming her campaign, were kidnapped."

Another woman, the representative of the Women's Affairs Ministry in Nuristan, was in the car, but was not injured, Muhammad Tamim Nuristani, the governor of the province, said.

Ms. Nuristani, the candidate, was treated by American troops in the region and then evacuated to Bagram Air Base, near Kabul, where she was in stable condition, said a United States military press officer, Sgt. Marina Evans. A spokeswoman for the election commission, Bronwyn Curran, said Ms. Nuristani had been shot three times in the hip.

Clerics and elders in the region were gathering to try to secure the release of the kidnapped men, General Baqi said. Early reports indicated that the attackers were not Taliban fighters or other antigovernment insurgents but rival candidates, he said.

Six candidates and four election workers have been killed in the period before the parliamentary and local vote. Seven police officers were killed Wednesday in Oruzgan Province in the south. Their bodies were found with their election registration cards, said the governor, Jan Muhammad.

A police checkpoint was also attacked Wednesday night in Oruzgan Province. Three people suspected of being Taliban fighters were killed and one was captured in the firefight, he said. An American soldier was wounded Wednesday in a roadside explosion in Oruzgan Province, the United States military said in a statement.

Voting May Be Life-and-Death Choice For Afghans (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

QALAT, Afghanistan, Sept. 14 - Who's afraid of democracy in Afghanistan?

In the southern city of Kandahar one morning last week, a candidate for Parliament opened her front gate to find one of her campaign posters scribbled with terrifying threats. "Your children salute me every morning," said one. "Soon, I will salute them back."

Here in the capital of neighboring Zabul Province, suspected Taliban fighters offered the driver for another parliamentary candidate a huge sum of money in exchange for delivering the candidate to them. The candidate said she no longer dared to campaign outside the provincial capital.

And in Shajoy, a market town two hours up the road, some men wondered aloud how many townspeople would have the courage to travel a couple of miles through Taliban redoubts to cast their votes in Sunday's election. Never mind the women; the men said they did not expect any polling places to be open for women anyway.

Nearly four years after the Taliban government was routed from Afghanistan by American-led forces, a newly emboldened insurgency has stepped up a campaign of threats and thuggery on the eve of the country's parliamentary and provincial elections, particularly here in the badlands of the country's south. Elsewhere, the presence of former warlords on the ballot has led to charges of voter intimidation.

But what is just as remarkable is the degree to which so many ordinary Afghans seem unfazed by the threats and violence, and, on occasion, are openly defiant.

Whether Afghan men and women will be able to cast their votes freely and fairly in Sunday's election remains to be tested. For now, even candidates who have been threatened have vowed to stay in the race, even as they have had to limit their campaign activities sharply.

"The day I registered as a candidate I knew about these problems," said Rona Tarin, 34, the Kandahar candidate whose campaign poster was defiled and left in front of her home.

With 68 seats reserved for women in the new 249-member Parliament, Ms. Tarin, a preschool supervisor, is one of nine candidates competing for three seats reserved for women from Kandahar Province.

"How long should I sit at home?" she said, fuming. "How long should I close my eyes? How long should I shut my ears? I have to take my people's problems to Parliament."

The price of running for office in this part of the country can be perilous. Since early June, six candidates and five election workers have been killed, most of them in the south. Last week, security forces turned up two dozen cooking pots filled with explosives behind a Kandahar school designated to serve as a polling place.

Taliban leaflets known as "night letters," left at markets and mosques in several southern provinces, have issued warnings against anyone who participates in elections.

In Khost, to the east, a bomb went off inside a mosque being used for voter registration. In the eastern city of Jalalabad, the convoy of a parliamentary candidate, Safia Sadiqi, was fired on, injuring two campaign workers.

In Helmand, to the west, gunmen ranged across villages threatening to kill anyone who dared go to the polls. Officials with the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission said they suspected local officials, rather than insurgents, were responsible.

[On Thursday, officials with the rights group said they had also received reports of candidates and local officials preventing other candidates from campaigning freely.]

In parts of central and northern Afghanistan, the reason for fear is less because of the Taliban than the powerful former mujahedeen commanders, who supposedly have been disarmed and removed from public office, but who continue to wield considerable influence in their territory, especially in the countryside.

"People are afraid that those commanders and those who governed by force of weapons, will again win seats and return to power," said Abdul Azim Azimi, a local election observer in the northern town of Mazar-i-Sharif.

About 200 people with links to militias are running for office, and election observers have accused some of intimidating voters or preventing rival candidates from campaigning. To date, 47 candidates have been disqualified by the elections commission, mostly for links to armed groups.

"How much legitimacy will the new Parliament have?" said Sam Zarifi of Human Rights Watch, which released a report this week documenting election-related intimidation. "Having warlords isn't about their past abuses. It's about their inability to move the country forward."

It is unclear whether international monitors will be able to monitor rural polls, particularly in the south, on election day.

Voter turnout Sunday will signal not only the nerve of Afghan voters, but also their confidence in the still fragile government of President Hamid Karzai and his American backers. Since presidential elections last fall, life in the south increasingly has become precarious and the exercise of politics clouded by growing insecurity, voters and candidates in Zabul and Kandahar Provinces said in interviews this week.

"Slowly, slowly, morale is going down," said Talatbek Masadykov, the chief of the southern region for the United Nations Mission in Afghanistan, based in Kandahar. One reason, he said, is, "the security is not improving," adding, "the central and provincial government cannot deliver assistance to people in very remote areas."

In Shajoy, Muhammad Aziz, a shopkeeper, predicted that only men who live in the town would vote. His relatives two miles away would be unlikely to try to travel into town unless security improved.

Abdul Zahir, a farmer, said that during last year's presidential elections, the men of his village, a couple of miles away, had come to Shajoy to vote, but those farther out of town did not. "This time," he said, "God only knows."

As part of their efforts to reinforce security in the days leading up to elections, an American Army convoy pulled in to Shajoy one morning this week to donate wheat seeds to the local government and hand out radios and clothes to the children.

But to Mr. Zahir, the additional patrols, by American and Afghan soldiers alike, made little difference. "In the daytime, this government is coming to us, and in the nighttime the Taliban are coming to us," he said. "We're stuck in the middle."

Police and election officials, eager to deflect criticism about security, noted that despite intimidation, 1.6 million additional Afghans had registered to vote since the presidential election, bringing the total to 12.6 million. About 5,800 candidates had signed up to run for seats in Parliament and provincial assemblies, and 44 percent of the new registered voters this year are women.

"The people of Afghanistan have brave hearts," said Mullah Gul, a police commander in Kandahar whose men found the body of the last candidate killed in the campaign. "They don't care about death."

DOJ_NMG_0005984

Officials with the United Nations-assisted Joint Electoral Management Body Secretariat, which is running Sunday's election, also took pains to note that there was no proof that the six candidates were killed because they were running for office.

Violence may not necessarily subside after the election. For one thing, under Afghan election law, in the event of the winner's death, the runner-up takes office, which some fear could heighten the likelihood of political assassinations.

In these elections, the stakes for women are particularly high. In a society where women customarily cover themselves from head to toe, several women have boldly displayed their faces on campaign placards. But tradition and terror have also sharply curtailed their campaigns.

Torpakai, a public health worker in Qalat running to represent Zabul Province in Parliament, said she feared that there would be no outsiders to monitor the polling places and that the election would be unfair. She said she had not been so hopeless during last year's presidential election or during the earlier constitutional assembly, in which she participated. "Not just me, all the people were optimistic about democracy, optimistic about security," she said.

One of her rivals, Zarmina Pathan, 38, said she did not expect many women in the countryside to vote. She said she approached Sunday's elections with an odd mix of gloom and determination.

"Every time they threaten me, it dashes my hopes," she said. "But I'm running for Parliament. I can't just run away from the elections."

Afghan Parliament Will Have Big Visions, Few Rules Of The Road (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Nobody ever accused Mullah Mohammad Khaksar, a former Taliban deputy minister, of being an Afghan Thomas Jefferson.

But his goals for Afghanistan sound remarkably like those of a founding father, and like those of the majority of the other 5,700 candidates running on Sunday in the country's parliamentary election. Mr. Khaksar wants a strong central government, improved security, faster reconstruction, and a serious effort to control drug trafficking and government corruption.

With such broad consensus, Afghanistan should be well on its way toward creating a sound, workable Afghan parliament that serves as a watchdog to the government. But even Khaksar is not so sure it's going to work that way. He fears that many parliamentarians who come to Kabul will be inexperienced, or be just as corrupt as the government they are supposed to be watching over.

"I am very disappointed about the future of this parliament," says Khaksar, a candidate from his native city of Kandahar. "Look, we are building this parliament. But if, instead of using a strong cornerstone, you build with unbaked bricks, will you be able to build a strong building?"

The problem, many candidates and foreign observers say, is the way in which Afghanistan's parliament was created in the country's new constitution. Voters choose candidates as individuals, not as members of a party. This creates an environment where personalities are more important than ideas, coalitions struggle to stick to common agendas, and individual MPs are more easily manipulated by the palace.

"This parliament will not be functional for several years," says Barnett Rubin, an expert on Afghan politics at New York University who helped organize the Bonn Conference in December 2001 that set up the post-Taliban government. Rubin says that President Hamid Karzai's habit of ruling through patronage - rewarding those who support him with better positions or development funds - has now set a precedent for many elected parliamentarians to turn to him as a kind of feudal lord with deep pockets.

"Once elected, what is their main goal? To get reelected," says Mr. Rubin. "The goal is to get benefits to a small number of people, with no notion for the benefit of society." He pauses. "I don't know how they are going to pass legislation."

Yet, already there are signs that some candidates are forming three main coalitions. One, led by Northern Alliance politician Younus Qanooni, will act as a sort of permanent opposition to President Karzai, and will attempt to change the system of government to give parliament more power, including a prime minister. A second faction will be a cross section of independents from around Afghanistan, who side with Karzai on most issues. A third faction of liberal and leftist parties will swing back and forth between the opposition and Karzai, supporting the president on common issues, but voting against him on others.

With many voters expressing frustration at the slow pace of reconstruction, and visible signs of corruption in their government, even Karzai's friends may find it necessary to slap the hand that feeds them from time to time.

Mohammad Iqbal, a young independent candidate from Jalalabad in the eastern province of Nangrahar, says he supports Karzai, and particularly the way he mediates local problems through local tribal elders. But if Karzai fails to clean up corruption in government, fails to rebuild the country, or strays too far from Afghanistan's Islamic traditions, Mr. Iqbal says he will vote against him.

"Friendship is friendship, but if Mr. Karzai is anti-Afghanistan, then even if His Excellency Mr. Bush asks me, I will say no," says Iqbal, with a wry smile. His supporters break out in laughter.

Experts say it will take time for Afghan parliamentarians to figure out the new process, when most of the elected officials have no experience in how to legislate and none will have researchers to help them sort out good bills from bad bills.

"With a limited role for political parties, things will be fluid, with lots of deal- making," says Paul Fishstein, director for the Afghan Research and Evaluation Unit, a think tank in Kabul. Many Afghans are optimistic that things will get sorted out in traditional Afghan ways, but Mr. Fishstein says that parliamentarians are in for a rude awakening when they confront the hard work of legislation.

"A lot of people love to talk about improving security, electricity, water systems, but that's not necessarily what parliament is intended to do," says Fishstein. "They'll be passing budgets, they'll be representing the material interests of their constituencies, and that takes a certain level of skill."

He smiles. "It's going to be an interesting parliament."

Warlords On Ballot Worry Afghan Election Observers (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 16, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — The presence of warlords and ex-Taliban officials on the ballot when Afghans vote Sunday is raising fears that figures from the past will sabotage efforts to build a stable democracy.

“The Afghan people need a government that is functional and accountable,” says Sam Zarifi, deputy director of the Asia division of Human Rights Watch, an activist group. “The warlords offer neither.”

Millions of Afghans will choose candidates to fill 249 seats in the lower house of the National Assembly and local council seats in 34 provinces. It's a historic step toward establishing democracy in a country riven by decades of conflict. About 30,000 coalition troops are providing security for the election. This week, female candidate Hawa Nuristani was shot and injured and seven registered voters were killed, the Associated Press reported.

The Electoral Complaints Commission disqualified 21 candidates, citing ties to illegal militias. Afghan President Hamid Karzai cautioned: “Don't vote for bad people.”

In a report released Thursday, Human Rights Watch said warlords are intimidating candidates and voters. It said Allam Khan Azadi, a candidate and commander near the northern city of Mazar-e-Sharif, for instance, threatened to cut the water supply to those who did not vote for him. “Complaints were heard in almost all regions of the country,” the group said.

Abdul Rabb al-Rasul Sayyaf, a warlord, is seeking a National Assembly seat in the capital. After the Soviet Union was driven from Afghanistan in 1989, Sayyaf's Ittihad militia battled rival factions in Kabul. Human Rights Watch says Sayyaf and his rivals are guilty of war crimes.

A former religious teacher at the University of Kabul, Sayyaf said this week that he took up arms to battle the Soviets. “The needs of the country transferred me from the classroom to the bunker,” he said. “If the mujahedin are not worthy to enter politics, who will be?”

Mawlavi Qalumuddin was deputy administrator in the Taliban's Ministry of Vice and Virtue, which enforced rules that banned girls from attending school, women from working outside the home, men from shaving and anyone from flying a kite. He's running for the National Assembly from Logar province.

"I'm sure the people know me and my background," he says. Qalumuddin says it would be dangerous to ban warlords from the democratic process; isolated, they might turn to violence.

Afghanistan Votes (WP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

FOUR YEARS AGO this weekend, the Taliban dictatorship of Afghanistan rejected a U.S. demand that it break its bond with Osama bin Laden, despite the attacks on New York and Washington one week earlier and the threat of American military action. This weekend, as many as 12 million Afghans will vote in nationwide elections for parliament and provincial councils in a historic step toward democracy. Among the 6,000 candidates are representatives of almost every faction that has contended for power in Afghanistan over the past several decades. There are tribal leaders and Western-educated liberals; communists and the mujaheddin who once fought them and, later, each other; and several former officials of the Taliban itself. Five hundred eighty-two of the candidates are women, who four years ago were banned from holding jobs, going to school or appearing on the street without covering themselves from head to foot. They will fill at least 68 of the 249 seats in the parliament.

It's easy for Westerners, and even Afghans, to lose sight of how much progress this represents. Sunday's vote is not only a breathtaking leap for a nation whose previous government was an Islamic theocracy that mixed medieval social policies with sponsorship of 21st-century terrorism. It also places Afghanistan ahead of almost all of its Central Asian neighbors, who have never held a vote as free. Much of the reporting of Western observers and human rights groups nevertheless has focused on the perceived failings of the political process. Though insurgent activity has fallen off in recent weeks in the face of aggressive operations by some 20,000 U.S. troops and 10,000 NATO peacekeepers, several southern provinces remain insecure and some voters there may be intimidated. Human rights groups protest that warlords guilty of crimes in Afghanistan's civil war are poised to collect votes. At the insistence of President Hamid Karzai, the election system is centered on individuals rather than parties; critics say this may produce a weak or conservative legislature.

While many of these critiques are legitimate, it's worth noting the tenaciousness with which many liberal Westerners have opposed every step by Afghanistan toward freedom. Four years ago, for example, former European Union commissioner Emma Bonino was one of those who condemned the U.S. intervention against the Taliban, which she said would "all but doom" millions of Afghans "to death." Now, incredibly, she leads the E.U.'s observer mission at the elections; not so surprisingly, she's again pessimistic. "I simply don't think this election is going to produce . . . a healthy political life," she told the Financial Times.

Afghanistan surely has a long way to go. Part of the Taliban is still fighting, and more U.S. soldiers (51) have died in combat this year than in any since 2001. Though Kabul is booming, Afghanistan is still one of the world's five poorest countries, and up to 60 percent of its economy comes from the production of poppies for opium. Once the elections are over, Mr. Karzai will still have the problem of edging the former warlords and communists aside and encouraging the emergence of new leaders committed to democracy and human rights. No, political life isn't entirely "healthy." But as the world will shortly see, it is immeasurably better off than it was four years ago -- and than it would have been had the United States hesitated to act.

Will U.S. Abandon Afghanistan? (WT)

By Joanna Nathan And Mark Schneider

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

"I will not vote, these elections are not worth anything, the candidates are the same people who destroyed Afghanistan," thunders the taxi driver as we jolt down Kabul's streets. Campaign posters for the upcoming National Assembly and Provincial Council elections on Sept. 18 blanket every non-moving object.

Suddenly, a thought struck him: "If I do vote, I will vote for a woman! They do not have blood on their hands." Hopefully, such revolutionary ideas will occur to many other voters in Afghanistan. Hopefully, they will feel confident enough in the secrecy of the ballot to exercise true choice and secure enough amidst an ongoing insurgency in the south and east to make it to the polling booth in the first place.ÅA

Election preparations have been at full steam for six months now, with more than 12 million voters enrolled and 5,800 candidates, 582 of them women. Ballot papers are a vision in color, featuring a picture and symbol for each candidate to aid illiterate voters.

Weighing more than 1,000 tons, they are now making their way by helicopter, plane, truck, donkey and camel out to 6,000 polling centers across the country.

But despite such impressive technical preparations for these $159 million polls, there are wider concerns about both the framework of the elections and the viability of the institutions they will ultimately create.

The concern most immediately apparent to Afghans, such as our taxi driver, is the lack of a robust vetting system to bar candidates implicated in years of atrocities and drug trafficking. Indeed, the failure of the Karzai administration and his international backers to tackle head-on the perpetrators of past atrocities has led to a culture of impunity, with many of the same people back in power today and now seeking the mantle of a democratic mandate.

The U.N. Office of Drug Control reported at the end of August that Afghanistan produced 87 percent of the world's opium for the second year in a row. It also urged the removal of corrupt governors and officials involved in the drug trade, barring parliamentary candidates with drug ties, and "zero tolerance" toward warlords' involvement in drug trafficking. The latter recommendation has yet to be acted upon by the administration and Coalition forces who argue they are fighting against a still virulent insurgency. Yet, the drug trade is financing Taliban insurgent operations.

The fact that, in what became a highly politicized vetting process, only 32 candidates were barred for retaining links to armed groups has added to local disillusionment.

An inappropriate voting system, the rarely used single non-transferable voting and a political framework hostile to political parties mean these elections are being fought on ethnicity and individuals rather than ideas. In turn, the democratic bodies to emerge are likely to be fractured and weak with no workable caucuses or groupings on which to build a robust political culture.

However, above all these concerns are fears the international community may see these elections widely touted as the end of the transitional process agreed to in Bonn in December 2001 as a time to downgrade commitments to Afghanistan.

It is absolutely imperative that these elections are viewed as the beginnings of democratization, not the end. Afghanistan is still at a perilously fragile stage. This vote will provide the trappings of a democratic state, but there is still little in the way of institutions or resources to exert true control.

The ongoing insurgency in the south and east has been bloodier this summer than at any time since the fall of the Taliban, including the killing of six candidates and even more election workers. Ordinary Afghans continue to suffer some of the lowest social indicators in the world: life expectancy is 45; a woman dies in childbirth every 30 minutes; and illiteracy is running at 70 percent. The Bonn process was about tight deadlines for political transition. The momentum created in this sphere now needs to be used to push forward in other areas.

Previous lessons about the consequences of abandoning Afghanistan should be fresh in everyone's mind. Now, more than three-and-a-half years after the fall of the Taliban, the growing sense of discontent on the streets of Afghanistan is palpable. If Afghanistan is allowed to slip back into being a failed state because the international community turns away after elections, that sense of discontent will be the country's major export.

U.S. Attorney Faces A Lot Of Challenges (DEN)

By David Shepardson, The Detroit News

Detroit News, September 16, 2005

DETROIT -- If nothing else, the U.S. attorney is a man who can cry.

Stephen J. Murphy III, a former assistant U.S. attorney and General Motors lawyer, repeatedly fought through tears after his formal swearing-in as the top law enforcement officer in eastern Michigan.

A Who's Who of Michigan politicians lauded Murphy Thursday and ribbed him about his performance as an assistant U.S. attorney.

Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm and Murphy were among the "young Turks" who served in the U.S. attorney's office in the 1990s, she noted.

In 1992, Granholm recalled seeing Murphy fall asleep at his desk with his finger on the "Z key."

Granholm and a colleague responded by sending Murphy a phony memorandum sternly reprimanding him for falling asleep on the job.

Among those speaking were Chief U.S. District Judge Bernard A. Friedman, state Attorney General Mike Cox, General Motors general counsel Thomas Gottschalk and Michigan Supreme Court Justice Maura Corrigan.

Unmentioned directly but referenced by several speakers was the continuing fallout from the botched 2003 Detroit terrorism case.

A federal judge threw out the convictions of two Arab immigrants arrested shortly after Sept. 11 after a Justice Department review found evidence of prosecutorial misconduct.

The case and a separate criminal investigation into the conduct of the former lead prosecutor are pending.

Bradford A. Berenson, a former White House counsel's office lawyer, noted that Murphy was taking over "at a time when the office has been through some serious difficulties."

Since taking office in March, Murphy has reshuffled the leadership in the office and issued a two-sentence mission statement. Murphy said his office "is dedicated to doing the right thing."

"We've had ups and we've had downs," Murphy said. "We have a lot of challenges ahead."

And he promised not to fall asleep on the job.

"No way," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Marsh Brokers, Executives Are Indicted In Bid-Rigging Case (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK -- Eight former Marsh Inc. insurance brokers and executives were indicted yesterday by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, on criminal-fraud charges including an alleged scheme to defraud and grand larceny, as his yearlong probe of insurance bid-rigging moves into final stages.

Mr. Spitzer alleged that the brokers cheated some corporate clients by rigging bids for insurance contracts in order to steer business to insurers that paid Marsh, a unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos., large commissions.

Mr. Spitzer alleged that the scheme raised clients' costs in at least 35 instances, in a few cases by $1 million or more.

The indicted individuals all formerly worked in a Marsh Inc. group that specialized in excess casualty insurance, which is big-ticket coverage typically sold to large corporations.

Early this year, Marsh & McLennan signed an $850 million settlement with New York authorities and apologized to clients for the "unlawful" and "shameful" behavior of some employees. In recent months, an additional 17 insurance executives and managers, including eight former Marsh employees, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter.

In New York state court yesterday, five former Marsh employees -- William Gilman, Joseph Peiser, Edward McNenney, Greg Doherty and Thomas Green -- were indicted on charges including scheme to defraud in the first degree, and grand larceny in the first, second and third degrees. The first-degree grand-larceny charge carries a maximum 25-year prison sentence.

Three other former Marsh executives -- Kathleen Drake, William McBurnie and Edward Keane -- were indicted on the same charges, but the grand-larceny charges are in the second degree, with a maximum 15-year prison term.

At least one of the individuals is in talks with authorities about a guilty-plea agreement, according to two people close to the matter, but it wasn't clear when or if a deal would be made.

Mr. Gilman was named repeatedly in Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Marsh. His attorney, Robert Cleary, said his client "has not violated any laws." Mr. Peiser's attorney, Jerry Bernstein of Blank Rome LLP, said his client "is innocent of these charges, and I am confident he will be found not guilty at trial."

Mr. Green's attorney, Stephen Scaring, said his client "entered a plea of not guilty and he is prepared to defend himself." An attorney representing Mr. Keane declined to comment.

Mr. Doherty's attorney, Maranda Fritz, said Mr. Spitzer's office "is trying to construct claims of criminal behavior against Marsh employees who were actually and consistently working for the benefit of the client."

Attorneys representing Mr. McNenney and Ms. Drake didn't immediately return phone messages. An attorney for Mr. McBurnie couldn't be reached.

Mr. Spitzer said Marsh "should be applauded" for changing its management and business model to avoid conflicts of interest, but added that he couldn't rule out more prosecutions of former or current Marsh employees, among others in the insurance industry.

"This indictment is about the past," Marsh Chief Executive Michael G. Cherkasky said in a statement. "MMC today is focused on the future and is committed to excellence."

Interpublic Warns Of Illegal Actions (WSJ)

By Brian Steinberg And Suzanne Vranica, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Interpublic Group, in a sign that its accounting problems are more serious than previously understood, says an internal investigation has turned up instances of "misappropriation of assets" and "falsified books and records" that violated laws, mainly occurring at operations outside the U.S.

The ad holding giant, whose agencies work for such big-spending advertisers as Microsoft, Unilever and Coca-Cola, said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it has fired or is in the process of firing "culpable" employees.

Interpublic also said a six-month investigation had confirmed that the company would have to restate its earnings going back to 2000 as a result of several accounting errors. The size of the restatement will be revealed by Sept. 30, the company said, but it noted that the "impact on our results of operations for all periods will be material." Past financial statements shouldn't be relied upon, it added.

Interpublic had reported results ranging from a profit of $397.1 million in 2000 to a loss of $451.7 million in 2003. While investigating its accounting problems, the company hasn't filed an earnings report for 2004 or the first half of 2005.

Yesterday's filing appeared to take Interpublic's long-running accounting problems to a new level. Since late last year several big Interpublic clients, including General Motors and Bank of America, have taken at least some of their business elsewhere. Interpublic had estimated cash and cash equivalents of approximately $1.6 billion as of June 30 compared with debt of about $2.3 billion.

The company's accounting has been the subject of an SEC probe since 2002, when it restated five years of earnings after uncovering $68.5 million in charges in Europe that hadn't been properly expensed. But yesterday's filing was the first time the company had revealed that it may have uncovered possible criminal behavior.

The filing gave few details of the possible unlawful activity, including the amount of money involved, although it said it involved "accounting errors that were qualitatively material." A person close to Interpublic played down the significance of the activity, saying the possible criminal actions represented only a small portion of the company's overall accounting problems.

This person said the number of people involved could be as many as 60 at around 20 locations. Interpublic has around 43,000 employees and between 800 and 900 offices.

An Interpublic spokesman said Interpublic has contacted or will be contacting local authorities in affected areas. "Instances in which we believe there was malfeasance represent a small number of our locations," he said. "The fact we have been able to identify them demonstrates that we are making progress in enhancing our risk-management controls."

The activity Interpublic said was questionable took place primarily at Interpublic operations in Eastern Europe and Latin America, the person said. Those regions account for a relatively small portion of Interpublic's business. More significantly, however, much of the activity occurred at McCann WorldGroup, people familiar with the situation said. McCann is Interpublic's biggest operation and largest moneymaker and was at the center of the accounting problems disclosed in 2002. Interpublic's other agencies include Lowe, Draft and Foote Cone & Belding.

The main cause of Interpublic's accounting errors were "weak controls and our decentralized operational structure," the company said. The bulk of the restatement is owing to inappropriate accounting for lease expenses as well as problems with how Interpublic accounted for revenue and for companies that had been acquired.

In certain cases through 2001, Interpublic consolidated revenue and expenses of businesses in its financial statements before Interpublic had completed their purchase. From the mid-1990s through 2002, Interpublic acquired hundreds of advertising and marketing firms as part of a broader consolidation within the ad industry.

Interpublic said it expected its outside auditor, PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, to issue a "disclaimer of opinion" on the effectiveness of its internal financial controls. But Interpublic said it expected the firm to sign off on its 2004 financial statements. The auditing firm said it doesn't comment on client matters.

Any talk of wrongdoing "is going to perk up the ears of the clients," says Alexia Quadrani, a Bear Stearns ad-industry analyst. Advertisers will be asking themselves whether "they can afford to expose their corporate reputation to this," says Lauren Rich Fine, who follows Interpublic for Merrill Lynch and has a "sell" rating on the company's stock. "If you can't clean up your own house, how can I trust you to come up with my company's strategy?" she asked.

Interpublic Group Retraces Its Accounting Missteps (NYT)

By STUART ELLIOTT

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

THE troubled Interpublic Group of Companies said yesterday that it had found evidence of "possible employee misconduct" in the course of efforts to get to the bottom of persistent accounting problems.

Since an investigation that began in March, Interpublic said in a regulatory filing, the company, its longtime accounting firm and forensic accountants have uncovered potential illegal activities that involved "falsified books and records; violations of laws, regulations and company policies; misappropriation of assets, and inappropriate customer charges and dealings with vendors."

In the regulatory filing, called an 8-K, Interpublic disclosed that the "culpable employees" had been or will be fired, "or are otherwise no longer with the company."

The announcement was the most recent in a series of unexpected disclosures by Interpublic, which has been struggling with financial and operational difficulties for three years, mostly related to weak internal controls. In a news release with the 8-K, Interpublic said it would be able, "barring unforeseen circumstances," to meet a Sept. 30 deadline it had previously set to file delayed financial reports, including results from the last six quarters.

Interpublic said that it would probably be restating earnings for 2000 to 2004 because of systemic accounting problems in revenue, acquisitions and lease expenses.

"I have been clear since assuming my current responsibilities that our top priority is to fix our financial controls and leave accounting issues behind us," Michael I. Roth, co-chairman and chief executive of Interpublic in New York, said in a statement. Mr. Roth's reference was to his assuming the duties of chief executive in January, when he became the third man with that title since Interpublic found the first of its financial problems in August 2002.

In that period, Interpublic has also had four chief financial officers.

The disclosure about the possible misconduct marks the first time in those three years that Interpublic has said that not all the errors leading to its plight were necessarily honest ones. The company's difficulties include two previous restatements of earnings, an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and losses incurred by an ill-advised expansion to auto-racing tracks.

Interpublic said it would provide additional details about the potential misconduct when it reports the delayed financial data, which is to include the 2004 annual report along with results for the full year 2004 and the first two quarters of 2005.

"Instances in which we believe there was malfeasance represent a small number of our locations," said an Interpublic spokesman, Philippe Krakowsky.

"The fact we have been able to identify them demonstrates that we're making progress in enhancing our risk-management controls," Mr. Krakowsky added.

Preliminary findings have uncovered problems involving about 50 employees at a couple of dozen offices outside the United States. Interpublic has about 43,000 employees who work in about 1,000 offices around the world.

Interpublic is the world's No. 3 agency company in revenue, behind the Omnicom Group and the WPP Group, and owns agencies like Campbell-Ewald, Deutsch, Foote Cone & Belding, Draft, Initiative and WeberShandwick. The three years of financial uncertainty, coupled with some losses of large clients and defections of senior managers, have taken a toll on Interpublic, particularly in its stock price.

For instance, an analysis last month by USA Today showed that Interpublic shares were among the worst performers in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index since a bull market began in October 2002. Interpublic stock closed in trading yesterday at $11.31, down 2 cents, or 0.2 percent.

After the release of the Interpublic statements, Fitch Ratings said it was keeping the company's credit facility ratings at B+ and on negative watch, where they have been since March. On Aug. 31, after Interpublic agencies lost the large Bank of America account, Standard & Poor's said it would keep its outlook at negative for the Interpublic long-term credit rating, which is BB-.

Analysts who follow advertising stocks had mixed reactions to Interpublic's news.

"We believe confirmation of reporting financials is a positive step in improving visibility," Credit Suisse First Boston said in a report that maintained its rating of outperform on Interpublic stock.

"If management can execute, the risk-reward on IPG is highly favorable and this is a major turnaround story," the report concluded. The letters "IPG" are the symbol under which Interpublic shares trade on the New York Stock Exchange.

The promise to meet the Sept. 30 deadline "should allay some of the worst concerns of investors," J. P. Morgan Chase said in a report, which called the news of the possible employee misconduct "an incremental negative." The report reiterated a rating of Interpublic stock as neutral.

A report that was more downbeat came from Merrill Lynch, which last week lowered its rating of Interpublic stock to sell - a rare call on Wall Street - from neutral.

"While the bulls may find the news that IPG is going to file by the Sept. 30 deadline encouraging," said the Merrill Lynch report, which maintained the sell rating, "we take the view that there is heightened risk concerning IPG's historical profitability and more importantly, its future earnings power in the wake of recent account losses."

Those losses have included the accounts of advertisers like Bank of America and the Lowe's Companies as well as parts of accounts of longtime Interpublic clients like General Motors, Nestlé and Unilever.

Interpublic also warned in the filing that any previous estimates made about the coming restatement or financial results "should no longer be relied upon" because of the extent of the work required to get to the bottom of the accounting problems. That work by the forensic accountants and the Interpublic accounting firm of the last three decades, PricewaterhouseCoopers, has even included performing certain tasks manually that are typically automated.

Interpublic said that when the delayed data are reported, it expects to receive "an unqualified opinion" on the statements in the 2004 annual report.

The initial financial problems that Interpublic found three years ago stemmed mostly from mistakes in intracompany transactions, primarily at European units of the largest Interpublic division, the McCann Worldgroup. The disclosure in March of additional problems attributed them to the weakness in accounting procedures in areas like tracking the hundreds of agency acquisitions made by Interpublic in the 1990's.

Trying To Put Some Reins On Derivatives (NYT)

By RIVA D. ATLAS

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Seven years ago, Wall Street's top bankers were caught off guard by the near-collapse of the Long-Term Capital Management hedge fund.

Since then, the number and influence of hedge funds have ballooned. The hedge fund explosion has prompted concerns that if a big bet goes wrong, regulators and banks will again be caught up in a collapse. High on the list of worries is the voracious appetite of hedge funds for arcane credit derivatives.

Yesterday, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York met with representatives of 14 banks, as well as regulators from the United States and overseas, to discuss cleaning up the processing of the contracts in the booming market for credit derivatives. There were $8.4 trillion such contracts outstanding at the end of last year, up from $919 billion just three years earlier, according to the International Swaps and Derivatives Association, a trade group.

Credit derivatives and hedge funds were part of the focus of a July report by a team of Wall Street executives, led by E. Gerald Corrigan, the former head of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and now a managing director at Goldman Sachs.

Mr. Corrigan's committee, which bears the unwieldy name of the Counterparty Risk Management Policy Group, was established at the request of the New York Fed after the Long-Term Capital turmoil. He reconvened the group in January to assess current risks in the markets.

"The report intended to air a significant number of issues in what is a pretty tranquil environment," Mr. Corrigan said in an interview last week. He ticked off a list of shocks the markets have absorbed in recent years, from terrorist attacks to the war in Iraq. The recent allegations of fraud at the $300 million Bayou fund have also had little effect.

In May, investors were briefly reminded that some traders might once again be making aggressive bets without fully understanding the risks. That month, the credit rating of General Motors was cut to junk status and the prices of G.M. bonds fell sharply, disrupting trading in certain baskets of credit derivatives that traded in ways that contradicted elaborate models upon which traders had relied.

Mr. Corrigan noted that the fears of losses on the part of hedge funds and banks alike after the downgrade turned out to be overblown.

"Anyone with half a brain knows that models are models," he said, adding that the banks and hedge funds should view the downgrade as a learning experience.

What Mr. Corrigan and bankers at the Federal Reserve are more worried about is what happens in the event of a corporate bond default.

Credit derivatives are bets on whether a company will pay its debts. In the event of a default, the party on the losing side of a trade must compensate the institution that holds the other end of the bet.

The problem is Wall Street has been overwhelmed in keeping track of these trades - and if corporate defaults, which are at an 11-year low, suddenly rise, it could have a mess on its hands.

The Federal Reserve called the meeting yesterday to address both a backlog in processing these trades as well as something called assignments, which refers to who holds the contracts at the time they are due.

Credit derivatives contracts were once arranged between banks and other large institutions like insurance companies. Now, banks are frequently entering into these contracts with hedge funds, which as frequent traders may wind up transferring the contract to another party.

The transfers of these contracts have become so frequent that there is often a lag in updating the paperwork for the contract to reflect the new owner, Mr. Corrigan said.

There is also a backlog of 13.3 business days before such trades are completed, according to a June survey by the association. Still, that was an improvement over 17.8 days last year, the organization said.

"The backlog reflects the explosion of activity, but also poses operational risks," Mr. Corrigan said.

One banker who attended and insisted on anonymity because of the confidential nature of the meeting said: "Regulators wanted to get everyone together to make sure the industry knew they were concerned. It was left to the industry to come back with solutions."

The International Swaps and Derivatives Association also issued standards this week to address these issues.

Mr. Corrigan said, "I could not be happier that the Fed and other regulators are taking the initiative to work with the private sector to come up with approaches to get the backlog issue under control."

Bankers give Mr. Corrigan credit for bringing further attention to the growing pains in the credit derivatives market.

"Jerry has a history of paying close attention to the plumbing of the financial system," said Mark C. Brickell, who was for years a senior member of the derivatives group at J. P. Morgan, the largest bank in the derivatives business. "It may not be glamorous but it's very important."

But executives like Mr. Brickell, who now runs an electronic trading system for derivatives, note that there are limits to what Mr. Corrigan's group, or the Federal Reserve, can accomplish.

Mr. Corrigan's group was largely made up of bankers, with a smattering of executives at hedge funds and other investment firms. The Federal Reserve does not oversee hedge funds. And even with the new requirement that hedge funds register with the Securities and Exchange Commission, their trading will remain hard to monitor. The recommendations of Mr. Corrigan and the Federal Reserve do not carry the teeth of regulations, he said.

But hedge fund executives say that they welcome the suggestions.

How Long To Jail White-Collar Criminals? (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

On Monday morning, L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former chief executive of Tyco International, will learn his fate. Mr. Kozlowski, who was convicted of grand larceny, falsifying business records, securities fraud and other charges, is to be sentenced in New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan and, unless he is granted bail, could be whisked off to Rikers Island to be processed. He faces a prison sentence as long as 30 years.

While recent lengthy sentences for white-collar crimes have been hailed by some as desperately needed deterrents after a deluge of corporate scandals, the sentencing of Mr. Kozlowski, 58, comes at a time when a number of lawyers, including former prosecutors, are questioning whether such sentences are justified.

Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chairman of WorldCom who was convicted of masterminding an $11 billion accounting fraud that bankrupted the company, was sentenced to 25 years in prison.

Because Mr. Ebbers is 63, some have contended that the sentence amounts to a life term. Likewise, John J. Rigas, the 80-year-old founder of Adelphia Communications, was sentenced to 15 years.

"You have to ask yourself whether the proof in these cases warrants such a sentence," said Otto G. Obermaier, a former United States attorney in Manhattan, who had been an aggressive prosecutor of white-collar crimes when he ran the office from 1989 to 1993. "Ebbers's sentence moved the goal posts pretty far back. You can describe it as a pendulum switch, but it is an overreaction."

Unlike Mr. Ebbers or Mr. Rigas - or indeed most other convicted corporate chiefs, who have been sentenced in the federal court system - Mr. Kozlowski, along with Mark H. Swartz, Tyco's former chief financial officer, who was convicted of the same set of crimes, is being sentenced in a state court. As a result, the judge in the Tyco case, Michael J. Obus, may have more latitude in his sentencing than federal judges, who have a strict set of guidelines to follow.

The convictions of Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz also differ markedly from some other recent white-collar cases. While prosecutors are asking that Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz be sentenced to 30 years, Justice Obus has the flexibility to give them as little as one to three years in prison.

Depending on the length of the sentence, both men could be incarcerated in a maximum-security prison like Attica.

No lawyer is suggesting that white-collar criminals not serve time. Rather, lawyers and jurists are asking what the appropriate sentence is for white-collar crimes relative to punishments for other crimes in a post-Enron world.

Jonathan Simon, a professor of law at the University of California, Berkeley, said: "The most obvious comparison for the emerging attitude toward white-collar criminals is the harsh punishment we give to people involved in the drug trade. But both represent increasingly irrational and inhumane levels of punishment."

Noting that he considered Mr. Ebbers's sentence "draconian," he added that "25 years is more than most people would get for rape or a nonaggravated murder."

Of course, the main argument for imposing lengthy sentences is that they serve as a powerful warning to other executives not to break the law. After Mr. Ebbers's conviction in July, Alan G. Hevesi, the New York State comptroller and court-appointed lead plaintiff in the WorldCom securities class action, said it was "important to send a strong message with a severe sentence" because of the billions of dollars and thousands of jobs that were lost as a result of the fraud.

Yet Professor Simon, for one, said he had doubts about whether an especially long sentence worked as a significantly greater deterrent to potential white-collar criminals than shorter terms.

"Deterrence is, in my view, highly contextual," he said. "If you live in a community where young people die all the time from stray bullets - whether they are gang-banging or going to school - it is pretty hard to deter anyone with threats of punishment.

"In contrast, white-collar workers are extraordinarily sensitive to threats since their whole socialization and environment encourage calculation of future benefit and cost."

Mr. Simon suggested that "it would be far more effective to impose a lot of short sentences on a wider group of offenders rather than the example model of harshly punishing a few celebrity cases while most potential offenders know that they are unlikely ever to be caught and punished."

Still, some prosecutors and lawyers suggest that lessons that were supposedly learned during an earlier crackdown on corporate crime in the late 1980's did not stick, in part, because the sentences were too lenient. Michael R. Milken, for instance, was sentenced to three and a half years and served less than two.

Lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz are expected to stress on Monday how different their cases are from those at Enron, WorldCom and Adelphia, companies all forced to file for bankruptcy protection as a result of the crimes. Tyco never filed for Chapter 11 protection, and its underlying business was relatively unaffected by the crimes despite swings in its stock price. The two Tyco figures were convicted of stealing about $150 million by paying themselves unapproved bonuses and conspiring to keep the thefts secret.

In addition to determining a sentence, Justice Obus, is expected to make Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz disgorge the money they stole. Prosecutors may also seek to have them pay hundreds of millions of dollars that they say shareholders lost as a result of the two executives' falsifying business records and hiding other information from investors, as well as millions of dollars in fines.

It is unclear whether the judge will rule on how much money shareholders should be reimbursed because no definitive amount was established during the trial.

He could decide to hold a hearing to determine the amount or he may leave that to the civil courts, which are overseeing lawsuits against the two men.

Lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz declined to comment.

A spokeswoman for the Manhattan district attorney's office did not return a call seeking comment.

Judge Tosses ITT Shareholder Lawsuit (INDYSTAR)

By J.K. Wall

The Indianapolis Star, September 16, 2005

A federal judge in Indianapolis dismissed a shareholder lawsuit against ITT Educational Services Inc. Wednesday, saying the shareholders did not adequately demonstrate securities fraud.

U.S. District Court Judge David F. Hamilton gave the shareholders, who had been seeking class-action status, until Oct. 14 to file an amended complaint.

The lawsuit had accused ITT Educational, a Carmel-based for-profit educator, of inflating enrollment figures, falsifying grades, attendance and placement records, and shredding documents just before visits by government investigators.

But Hamilton found that none of the accusations were precise or strong enough under the Securities Exchange Act and the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, which govern shareholder lawsuits.

The dismissal comes less than three months after the U.S. Justice Department said its investigation of ITT Educational had found no evidence of wrongdoing by the company or its executives. The Justice Department shifted its focus to “local issues” at individual ITT campuses.

The shareholder lawsuit was sparked after the Justice Department sent federal agents in February 2004 to raid ITT Educational's headquarters and 10 of its campuses. The raid sent ITT Educational's stock plunging, but they have since recovered most of their value.

ITT Educational operates 79 technical institutes in 31 states serving about 40,000 students.

When Charity Stems From A Lawsuit (NYT)

CHARITY, according to popular lore, begins at home. These days, however, it sometimes begins in court. Therein lies a question of propriety, as well as one of just whose interests are being represented.

Call it "settlement charity." Lawrence J. Ellison, the chief executive of Oracle, has settled a shareholder derivative suit, without admitting he did anything wrong, for a $100 million donation in Oracle's name to a charity chosen by Mr. Ellison.

The suit in question is one of three that were filed after it came out that Mr. Ellison sold some Oracle stock at an opportune time in early 2001, weeks before the company reported that it would not meet its sales goals, sending the stock down from levels it has not seen since. The suits saw those sales as insider trading.

Mr. Ellison denied he knew how bad things were getting, and a Delaware judge dismissed one suit, concluding there was no evidence to the contrary. A class-action suit filed in federal court in California is still pending, but this settlement deals with the derivative suit filed in California state court, ostensibly on behalf of Oracle. It demanded that Mr. Ellison turn over to the company the money he saved by selling Oracle shares before the fall.

Had that suit prevailed, Oracle would have received a lot of money, so it arguably was in the interests of the shareholders. But the settlement provides for something else entirely.

Oracle will pay $24 million to the plaintiffs' lawyers, with $1.5 million of that to cover their expenses and the rest for a fee. The company owned by the shareholders will have that much less cash. Mr. Ellison will donate $100 million to charity.

How does that benefit the company? The lead plaintiffs' lawyer, Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., a partner in Berman DeValerio Pease Tabacco Burt & Pucillo, told me Oracle would benefit because its chief executive would not be distracted by having to defend the suit, something one might think could have been arranged had the suit not been filed in the first place.

He also points to new rules by Oracle, not yet detailed, that are supposed to increase protections against insider trading by company officers.

BUT the real gain, to hear Mr. Tabacco tell it, is "a positive benefit for Oracle in fulfilling its obligations as a good corporate citizen." Giving that money to charity "will enhance its reputation and improve its shareholder value."

Some might think that Oracle's reputation is harmed by Mr. Ellison's decision to settle, rather than fight, a suit that called his integrity into question. Others might conclude the settlement does not fit the charge. If Mr. Ellison did harm the company by his trading, he should pay the company, not some charity.

John C. Coffee Jr., a professor of securities law at Columbia University, is not persuaded justice was served. He suggested that it "would be fairer if the plaintiffs' attorneys would take their fee in the form of a charitable contribution that Mr. Ellison would make in their name to charities of his choice." Perhaps, he mused, Mr. Ellison would choose a charity that promotes tort reform.

Mr. Tabacco, unsurprisingly, did not like that idea. "We think it is fair compensation for bringing substantial value to the company," he told me, adding that compromises are necessary in any negotiation and that he had worked hard to get his clients the best deal possible.

"Given the amount of work that went into putting the case to the point that it was ready for trial, we should be fairly compensated," he said.

One fascinating thing about the result, assuming a judge signs off on the settlement, is that the as-yet-unnamed charity could never have filed suit to get the money from Mr. Ellison. But it gets the cash, and does not even have to pay the lawyers.

There is no doubt that the lawyers, who were chosen by eight shareholders with small stakes, will do very well. It is not nearly as clear that their clients have reason to rejoice.

CIA Leak Investigator Warns Against Document Release (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The Justice Department and the special counsel investigating the leak of a CIA operative's identity pressed Congress to block legislation that would compel the administration to turn over documents related to the case, the department said in a letter released on Thursday.

The Justice Department, in a letter dated September 14, said special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had advised that producing documents and holding hearings would interfere with his investigation. The letter was sent to the House Intelligence Committee's Republican chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan.

Congressional Democrats have so far failed in their attempts to pass legislation that would force President George W. Bush and the departments of state, justice and defense to provide Congress with documents relating to CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee on Thursday rejected the legislation on a party-line vote. Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee and International Relations Committee rejected similar resolutions on Wednesday.

Republican say Congress should await the outcome of Fitzgerald's investigation.

Democrats countered that Republicans were trying to protect Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove.

"We have an oversight responsibility regardless of what criminal investigations may or may not be under way," said Rep. Rush Holt, a New Jersey Democrat.

Lawyers close to the Plame investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks. The outcome could have major political implications for Bush, whose current approval ratings are the lowest of his presidency.

Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, said the leak was meant to discredit him for criticizing Bush's Iraq policy in 2003 after a CIA-funded trip to investigate whether Niger helped supply nuclear materials to Baghdad.

A reporter for Time magazine has said that the first person to tell him about Plame was Rove. Rove's attorney says Rove did nothing wrong and has been repeatedly assured he is not a target of Fitzgerald's investigation.

Democrats have urged Bush to fire Rove or revoke his access to classified information. It is against the law in some cases to knowingly reveal the identity of an undercover CIA officer.

US Senate Turns Aside Web Gambling Ban For Now (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. Senate on Thursday turned aside an attempt to restrict Internet gambling in a procedural move, but Sen. Jon Kyl vowed he would try again and said he expected the legislation would become law eventually.

The Arizona Republican tried to attach language restricting Internet gambling to an annual spending bill that must be passed this year, but an unnamed Democrat objected to attaching an unrelated matter to the spending measure under consideration.

Kyl said his legislation would require banks and credit card companies to block payments to online Internet gambling sites. He said some firms were already voluntarily blocking money transfers.

"We will proceed with this, it will become law at some point at some time," the Arizona Republican said on the Senate floor. "There should be no reason why we can't move forward on this."

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, a Maryland Democrat, said that a member of her party had objected to attaching Kyl's language to the spending bill but she was not sure who. Kyl urged the lawmaker to come forward so the concerns could be addressed.

The U.S. Justice Department has said the laws that prohibit interstate gambling apply to the Internet. But Americans have turned to offshore gambling Internet sites as an alternative.

The Senate and U.S. House of Representatives have passed similar legislation in the past but have been unable to reach agreement on a single, identical bill, Kyl said.

Shares of online gambling sites in Britain moved higher on Thursday in anticipation of the Senate action. Partygaming Plc moved up 5 percent to 105 pence while Sportingbet.com Plc moved up 11.3 percent to 321 pence on London trading.

Man, 66, Convicted Of Chicago Courthouse Bomb Plot (AP)

AP, September 16, 2005

(AP) CHICAGO A counterfeiter who sat in prison dreaming of revenge against the judge who sent him there was convicted Thursday of planning to blow up Chicago's federal courthouse.

Gale Nettles, 66, was also convicted of making a fresh batch of bogus $20 and $100 bills.

Jurors deliberated for about a day over evidence in the two-week trial, which featured tape recordings of Nettles telling an undercover FBI agent that not enough body bags were coming home from Iraq and too many people escaped death in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Judge John Keenan of U.S. District Court in Manhattan, a visiting judge who came to Chicago to preside over the Nettles trial, set sentencing for Jan. 12.

Keenan was brought in because the judges who regularly hold court in Chicago's Everett M. Dirksen Federal Courthouse were the targets of the bomb plot federal prosecutors outlined.

Nettles could be sentenced to 70 years in prison for his conviction on two counts of attempting to destroy the building and six additional counts of counterfeiting.

Prosecutors said it was unclear what the sentence might be under federal guidelines, which are only advisory. But they said with his previous record Nettles could expect a long sentence.

Nettles claimed that he was a victim of entrapment by federal officials. But prosecutors told jurors that Nettles talked about taking revenge on court officials before he ever had contact with the agents who gathered evidence against him.

Nettles was serving time for counterfeiting in a federal prison in Mississippi when another inmate told officials that he was talking of bombing the courthouse where he was sentenced.

After he was released, Nettles went searching for ammonium nitrate -- the same fertilizer that was used by Timothy McVeigh to blow up the federal building in Oklahoma City.

The FBI saw to it that he got urea, a substance that looks like ammonium nitrate but which would not have exploded if detonated in the way that Nettles planned.

Nettles then went looking for a member of Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terrorist network. What he found was an undercover FBI agent who was posing as a terrorist. Nettles sold a batch of the urea to the undercover agent, who made many of the recordings that were played for the jury.

Prosecutors told jurors that besides planning to blow up the courthouse, Nettles was hoping that his blast would level the Kluczynski Federal Office Building across the street.

Counterfeiter Convicted Of Plot To Blow Up Courthouse (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 16, 2005

A counterfeiter known in prison by the name "Ben Laden" was found guilty Thursday of trying to blow up Chicago's federal courthouse.

A U.S. District Court jury deliberated for about one day before finding Gale Nettles of Chicago guilty of plotting to destroy the courthouse with a bomb that was to be made out of fertilizer and diesel fuel.

Nettles' defense attorney, John Theis, argued that the FBI entrapped Nettles by, among other things, having an undercover officer repeatedly offer to sell him the fertilizer.

But Assistant U.S. Atty. Brandon Fox disputed that in his closing arguments Wednesday.

"This defendant had no reluctance at all," Fox told the jury. "This was something he was going to do from the beginning... He was going to take down this building."

Nettles , 67, was also found guilty of making counterfeit money, some of which he used to obtain the fertilizer. Nettles, who is to be sentenced Jan. 12, was acquitted on one count of providing material support for terrorism. Prosecutors said Nettles hatched the scheme in 2003 while serving a prison term in Yazoo City, Miss., for counterfeiting.

A prison informant tipped authorities to the plan, and after Nettles was released, a sting operation was set in motion, prosecutors said.

After Nettles showed interest in pursuing the plan, undercover agents and informants approached him. They offered him computer equipment to make counterfeit bills and sold him fertilizer, prosecutors said. Although the fertilizer sold could have been dangerous if mixed with fuel, it would not have had Nettles' intended impact, prosecutors said. It was not the type needed for a bomb such as the one used to destroy the federal building in Oklahoma City, they said.

The FBI provided a fake customer, a cabdriver named "Ali," when Nettles wanted to sell some of the fertilizer at a profit, and agents recorded Nettles' conversations with Ali and others, prosecutors said.

In his closing argument, Theis disparaged the "so-called bombing plot." He said that when Nettles was living in Chicago in 2004, he had no money, no transportation and no means to engage in any such plot.

Theis said Nettles would go weeks or months without contacting the undercover agents, which forced them to call Nettles.

"They are the ones who are putting [the plan] in action," Theis said. "If they just left him alone, we wouldn't be here."

Prosecutors argued, however, that Nettles' statements in prison showed that he was "predisposed" to commit the crime, a factor that can defeat an entrapment defense.

Attorney: 'Joey The Clown' Writes Again (CHIST)

By MIKE ROBINSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 16, 2005

Missing reputed mob figure Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo has written a new letter to his attorney disputing testimony from an FBI agent, the attorney said Thursday.

Lombardo is among 11 alleged organized crime figures accused in a federal indictment last April of conspiring in a series of at least 18 long unsolved mob killings.

When federal agents rounded up those charged in the indictment they were unable to locate Lombardo and he has been missing ever since.

In May, Lombardo attorney Rick Halprin delivered a four page letter from his client to U.S. District Judge James Zagel offering to surrender if he could have a separate trial.

Nothing came of that.

Halprin said in a telephone interview Thursday night that he has received a new letter from the 75-year-old Lombardo, handwritten on both sides of a single page.

Halprin said the letter was postmarked Chicago and dated Aug. 25. He said two Chicago newspaper clippings were in the envelope.

Asked why he is sure that the letter is authentic, Halprin said: "Because I know his printing and I sure know his signature."

Halprin said the letter takes issue with testimony before the Illinois Gaming Board by John Mallul, the head of one of the FBI's Chicago-based organized crime squads.

The testimony came at a July 19 hearing at which the Gaming Board was trying to cancel the dormant license of the Emerald Riverboat Gambling Casino which was to be based in Rosemont.

Mallul testified that in May 1999, Lombardo and other mob figures and mob associates met with Donald Stephens, the mayor of the tiny suburb near O'Hare International Airport.

Stephens has denied that such a meeting ever took place.

Halprin said Lombardo denies it in his letter.

"He says he's willing to take a lie-detector test or take truth serum," Halprin said.

Asked how Lombardo could take a lie-detector test while on the lam, Halprin said: "There is a logistical problem with that sentiment."

Halprin said he had not shown the letter to anyone. He said the letter was addressed to him and not to Zagel or federal prosecutors.

But he said that if prosecutors think "there is forensic value in it they can subpoena it."

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Randall Samborn, declined to comment.

Second Lombardo Letter Surfaces (WMAQ-TV)

WMAQ-TV, September 16, 2005

CHICAGO -- Joseph Lombardo, who is alleged to be one of Chicago top mobsters, sent his attorney another letter, Unit 5's Carol Marin reported exclusively on Thursday.

Lombardo, who carries the nickname "The Clown," has been on the run since April, when he was indicted on racketeering conspiracy charges. While he has not been seen, he is being heard from.

"Dear Rick," said Lombardo to his attorney, Rick Halprin, in his latest letter. "How can a person be in so much trouble without committing a crime?"

Lombardo's letter was dated Aug. 24 and postmarked Aug. 25 -- in Chicago.

"I have no idea where Mr. Lombardo is," Halprin said.

It was the second time Halprin has a received a letter from his client since his indictment. Lombardo is one of 14 reputed mobsters implicated in 18 unsolved murders. But that is not why Lombardo wrote his attorney, Marin reported. Rather, it was two Chicago Sun-Times articles Lombardo clipped and included his letter. One of the stories linked Lombard to Donald Stephens, the mayor of Rosemont.

For years, Stephens has tried to have a casino built in the town he founded 50 years ago. And also for years, Stephens has battled allegations of mob connections, including an FBI agent's testimony in July that Stephens met mobsters, including Lombardo, for dinner in 1999.

"Let me inform you it is positively a lie," Lombardo said in his letter.

Illinois Attorney General Lisa Madigan has moved to deny Rosemont a gambling license, citing Stephens' alleged involvement with the Chicago Outfit. But appearing at a hearing before the Illinois Gaming Commission, Stephens said he actually threw the outfit out of Rosemont decades ago.

When asked about whether there is definitive evidence that proves that Rosemont is mobbed up, Bob Clifford, an attorney representing the Emerald Casino that was to have been built in Rosemont, said, "we are talking about speculative evidence. We're talking about triple quadruple hearsay."

Lombardo has said he's willing to take truth serum or a lie detector test alongside the FBI agent to see who is telling the truth, Marin reported. In his other letter, written to federal Judge James Zagel, Lombardo also proclaimed his innocence. The U.S. attorney's office did not have any comment.

Stephens: I Didn't Meet With Mob (CHIST)

By CAROL MARIN AND SHAMUS TOOMEY, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, September 16, 2005

Rosemont Mayor Donald E. Stephens adamantly denied under oath Thursday that he met with the mob in 1999 to talk about a casino for his town. And, in an ironic twist, a reputed mob boss on the lam is backing him up.

Joey "The Clown" Lombardo fired off a letter to his lawyer last month denying an FBI informant's claim that Lombardo and other alleged hoodlums met with Stephens at Armand's, an Elmwood Park restaurant, according to Rick Halprin, Lombardo's lawyer.

"Let me inform you that it is positively a lie," the hand-printed letter, which included misspellings, read. "I have never, never, ever sat down with Mayor Stephens and the rest of the names in the article. I will take truth serum or lie detector test if the agent and there reliable witness will take one. It has to be done by a private co., not the FBI."

Lombardo, 76, has been missing since a major federal indictment linking the mob to 18 unsolved murders came down in April. Shortly after the indictment, a letter from Lombardo arrived by mail at Halprin's Chicago office. That letter, postmarked in Chicago and directed at U.S. District Court Judge James B. Zagel, proclaimed his innocence and asked for a separate trial from the others indicted.

The latest letter was dated Aug. 24 and postmarked Aug. 25 in Chicago. The letter was on three-ring notebook paper and was accompanied by two Chicago Sun-Times articles, including a July 19 clipping about Lombardo's alleged meeting with Stephens, Halprin said.

"I have no idea where Mr. Lombardo is," Halprin said. "I'm saying the same thing I've said over and over again: It's my obligation to tell Joey, I can only tell him he should surrender himself and prepare for trial."

'Ridiculous nonsense'

FBI agent John Mallul had testified on July 18 that an informant told him of the Armand's meeting. Mallul's testimony came during a state Gaming Board hearing to revoke the license of Emerald Casino, which has been trying to open a casino in Rosemont but has been bogged down by mob allegations.

Lombardo says he also sent a separate letter to Rosemont's village attorney denying the Armand's meeting. "And also if I met with these people on that date, May 29th, 1999 I would have been in violation of my parole and probation," the letter to Halprin read.

Rosemont attorney Bob Stephenson confirmed he recently received two letters, purportedly from Lombardo. One appeared to mirror the Halprin letter, the other was a brief note in which Lombardo told Stephenson he remembered him from an old Teamsters trial, Stephenson said. The letters were signed "Joseph Lombardo I'm an innocent man," wording similar to the letter sent in the spring.

The Rosemont letters were turned over to the feds, Stephenson said.

Word of the latest round of Lombardo correspondence came as Stephens testified before retired Judge Abner Mikva, who will rule whether Emerald should lose its gaming license. Stephens testified he was "absolutely not" at the Armand's meeting -- and said he had never even been to the restaurant.

Outside of the hearing, Stephens, 77, called the Armand's allegation "such ridiculous nonsense."

'I hate my son-in-law'

"The FBI agent said there was some informant. Well, at the very least, the informant's a liar," Stephens said. "As a matter of fact, I also understand that my [ex-]son-in-law was at this meeting. I've got news for you, I hate my son-in-law. I've never gone around the block with him in my car. Never."

Ex-Mobster Claims An FBI Cover-Up (NYS)

By JERRY CAPECI

New York Sun, September 16, 2005

A turncoat Luchese mobster who helped authorities nail two suspects in the deadly Seton Hall arson five years ago has now turned the tables on law enforcement, claiming that a high-level FBI agent, together with New Jersey investigators, have knowingly kept an innocent man incarcerated for 12 years for a murder he didn't commit.

In a 14-page affidavit, mob defector Thomas Ricciardi, whose cooperation has also led to convictions of mobsters and mob associates, alleged that the officials learned they had wrongly convicted the gangster just four days after he was found guilty in 1993.

Driver For The Mob Gets 20 Years (NYNSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, September 16, 2005

Anthony Urso, the driver for Bonanno boss Joseph Massino who briefly took over command of the crime family in 2003, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for the killing of a mob associate.

"I am sorry for the harm I did to my own family," Urso, 69, said before U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis sentenced him in Brooklyn Thursday

Urso, known by the moniker "Tony Green," told Garaufis he earned the nickname because he once worked at a company known as "T. Green."

Urso, who had been living in East Meadow until his arrest, pleaded guilty earlier in the year to taking part in the murder of Anthony Tomasulo. Tomasulo, a Bonanno family associate, was killed in May 1990 after he allegedly failed to pass along some of his illegal gambling proceeds from joker-poker machines to the crime family administration, officials said.

Informants and trial testimony revealed that Tomasulo was shot to death.

Urso could have faced as much as 30 years in prison, his lawyer, Edward P. Jenks of Mineola, said. Jenks said his client had no legal problems until the current case.

"This guy never had a parking ticket until now," he said. "Effectively it is a life sentence."

Urso had been a driver for Massino over the years. Massino, who was convicted in July 2004, is now a cooperating witness for the government.

Blagojevich Surfaces In Pension Probe (CHIST)

By CHRIS FUSCO, DAVE MCKINNEY AND SCOTT FORNEK, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, September 16, 2005

Gov. Blagojevich and two top fund-raisers schemed to steer lucrative state pension deals to investment firms and consultants who agreed to donate to Blagojevich's campaign, a key figure in a widening corruption probe claims he's been told.

The unproved but explosive allegation surfaced Thursday in a federal plea deal by Chicago lawyer Joseph Cari, a former finance chairman for the Democratic National Committee. Cari, 52, pleaded guilty to attempted extortion for his role in a kickback scheme the feds say was directed by former state teacher pension board member Stuart Levine.

'Fund-raising strategy'

Blagojevich said he had "no knowledge whatsoever" about any pension deals being traded for contributions to his campaign. "Absolutely not," the governor said. "I know nothing about any of that."

Cari's 17-page plea offers no indication he ever spoke directly to Blagojevich or anybody from his political fund-raising operation, but the document laid out a broad "fund-raising strategy" outlined to Cari by Levine. Levine told Cari that he and Blagojevich's two fund-raisers would "not let an Illinois public pension fund . . . invest in a private equity fund" unless that firm hired a consultant they chose, and that consultant agreed to make "certain political or charitable contributions."

Blagojevich was not specifically named in the Cari plea, which referred to him as "Public Official A." Sources confirmed to the Chicago Sun-Times that the governor is Official A. The administration said it had no idea who Official A is.

Top Blagojevich fund-raisers Antoin "Tony" Rezko and Christopher G. Kelly were referred to in the plea as "two close associates" of the governor who helped him "pick law firms, investment banking firms and consultants that would help Public Official A." The Sun-Times confirmed their identities through the same sources.

Blagojevich, Kelly and Rezko have not been charged with any wrongdoing. Attempts to reach Kelly and Rezko were unsuccessful.

Also Thursday, former teacher pension board outside counsel Steven Loren, 50, pleaded guilty to tax-related charges tied to the alleged scheme. Both Cari and Loren are cooperating with prosecutors.

The scheme outlined in Cari's plea deal is similar to allegations raised earlier this year by Blagojevich's estranged father-in-law, Chicago Ald. Richard Mell (33rd), who accused Kelly of orchestrating appointments to state boards and commissions in exchange for contributions to Blagojevich.

Under threat of lawsuit from Kelly, Mell retracted the claim. But it still triggered a probe into the administration's hiring and contracting practices by Attorney General Lisa Madigan and Cook County State's Attorney Richard Devine. To date, no charges have arisen from that investigation.

'This is speculation'

Levine, who has pleaded not guilty to defrauding the state teacher pension system, would seem an unusual source about the inner workings of Blagojevich's campaign -- he was the top fund-raiser for Blagojevich's 2002 GOP opponent, former Attorney General Jim Ryan. Still, Blagojevich reappointed Levine to two state panels, including the Teachers' Retirement System of Illinois. After Blagojevich took office, Levine contributed $4,267 worth of free air travel to his campaign.

Levine often spoke of his ties to Rezko and openly discussed how Rezko helped reappoint him to the teacher pension board, according to one source familiar with the probe. Records involving Rezko and a consulting firm he ran were sought by a subpoena investigators sent to TRS.

Cari was familiar with the teacher pension board because he was a partner and managing director of HealthPoint LLC, a New York investment firm that secured two TRS investments worth $35 million in 2003. Cari and other principals in HealthPoint contributed $30,500 to Blagojevich's $14.3 million campaign fund, records show.

Despite his ties to top national Democrats, Cari knew Levine and backed Ryan against Blagojevich.

In his plea, Cari admitted he acted as Levine's emissary and tried to get a Virginia real estate investment firm, JER Partners, to pay an $850,000 fee to an unnamed consultant who would do no work on the deal. Cari believed that if JER "hired the consultant identified by Levine, the consultant would be required to make political or charitable contributions as directed by Levine and Public Official A's associates," according to the document.

Talking to a JER lawyer, Cari said the fee "was political and this was how Public Official A handled patronage." At Levine's insistence, he repeatedly told JER officials that if the fee agreement wasn't executed, the $85 million investment JER appeared poised to secure would be dropped from an upcoming board agenda.

A pension official, however, kept JER on the agenda. The consultant was not hired and JER won the investment deal.

Cheryle Jackson, Blagojevich's communications director, downplayed the credibility of Cari's statements. "This is speculation based on testimony from an admitted extortionist who was told this by someone twice accused of extortion himself." Jackson said the feds have not contacted the governor.

Pension Probe's Spotlight Widens (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, September 16, 2005

Pleading guilty Thursday to attempted extortion, a prominent Democratic fundraiser said he was told that a "high-ranking Illinois public official" was behind a kickback scheme that steered state pension-fund investments to favored businesses in exchange for campaign contributions.

The plea agreement by attorney Joseph Cari, a former finance chairman for the Democratic National Committee, launched a new and potentially far-reaching phase of the investigation into influence peddling at the state's multibillion-dollar public pension funds.

In Cari's plea agreement and a related one by a former pension board attorney, prosecutors for the first time suggested that their investigation had gone beyond the dealings of political insiders at obscure pension panels to include a prominent government official orchestrating a scheme to siphon campaign cash and reward donors.

Neither plea agreement named the high-ranking person in Illinois government. He was referred to simply as "Public Official A."

Gov. Rod Blagojevich was peppered with questions about the plea agreements at an unrelated news conference but said he had no knowledge of them. Later, asked if the governor's office knew who the high-ranking Illinois official was, Blagojevich spokeswoman Abby Ottenhoff said, "We don't know who Official A is."

"The only people who know that are the feds. You'd have to ask them," Ottenhoff said. "This is speculation based on testimony from an admitted extortionist who got his information from a person who was twice accused of extortion himself."

Asked if federal investigators had questioned the governor, Ottenhoff said, "Not on this matter."

But Ottenhoff disclosed for the first time that federal investigators had questioned Blagojevich earlier this year about allegations that his administration traded appointments to state boards and commissions for campaign contributions. Blagojevich denied any wrongdoing, she said.

In pleading guilty to one count of attempted extortion, Cari said Stuart Levine acted as a conduit between the unnamed public official and the state Teachers' Retirement System to steer pension business to people and firms that would help the public official.

Levine is a prominent campaign donor who was initially named by a Republican governor to be a trustee of the pension fund for public teachers outside Chicago. He was reappointed by Blagojevich. Levine has pleaded not guilty to earlier charges that he extorted kickbacks from investment firms seeking pension fund business.

`A fundraising strategy'

In his plea agreement, Cari acknowledged trying to participate in a kickback scheme with Levine in 2004. He said Levine told him the selection of pension fund investors and others was motivated by politics.

"Levine said that a high-ranking Illinois public official [Public Official A], acting through two close associates, was selecting consultants for the private equity funds that appeared before the state pension funds," Cari's plea agreement said.

"Levine said that this was part of a fundraising strategy. Levine said that Public Official A, and his associates, were going to pick law firms, investment banking firms, and consultants that would help Public Official A," the plea agreement said.

The plea agreement said "Levine told Cari that consultants selected by Levine and those associates would subsequently be required to make certain political or charitable contributions as directed by Levine and those associates."

When a firm balked at hiring a Levine-selected consultant, who would do no work, Cari told the firm, according to the plea agreement, "that it was political and this was how Public Official A handled patronage."

Cari had repeatedly demanded that the firm, Virginia-based JER Inc., pay an $850,000 consulting fee, equal to 1 percent of the $85 million it was seeking from the teacher pension board to invest. Cari, in the plea agreement, said Levine repeatedly threatened to pull the JER investment from the agenda of the pension board unless the consulting fee was paid.

Cari said in his plea agreement that he believed Levine wielded great power over the teacher pension board and that "if Levine did not want something to be approved by the TRS board, it would not be approved."

In a related move, Steven Loren, formerly an outside attorney for the teacher pension board, pleaded guilty to one count of obstructing the Internal Revenue Service for allegedly helping Levine work a kickback scheme involving a Levine-favored consultant paid through a sham contract. The consultant received a finder's fee by an investment firm that got pension-fund business.

In the plea agreement, Loren said it was his understanding that "Levine's associates, who were close to a high-ranking public official, would use those placement fees as an incentive or reward to those who made campaign contributions that would benefit the high-ranking public official."

The plea agreement indicates that Loren began cooperating with the federal government early in its investigation. Loren gave prosecutors what is called a proffer letter on Nov. 23, laying out his knowledge of the activities of Levine and others.

That proffer and a one in July show that Loren was cooperating not only in the pension-fund case, but also in a second investigation involving Levine's role at the state's hospital planning and construction board, where he has previously been charged with extorting bribes, according to the plea agreement.

Levine has pleaded not guilty to those charges as well.

Sentencings postponed

Cari, 52, of Chicago and Loren, 50, of Highland Park, pleaded guilty just minutes apart in U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve's courtroom.

Both are cooperating in the continuing federal probe, according to their plea agreements with the government. Their sentencings were indefinitely postponed until after their cooperation has been completed.

Under their plea deals with prosecutors, Cari faces about 2 years in prison, while Loren faces under 12 months in prison or possibly probation.

Each remains free on bail.

Both defendants and their lawyers, former U.S. Atty. Scott Lassar and Michael Siegel, declined to comment as they left the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse. So too did Levine's attorneys.

Aides to Blagojevich said that neither the governor nor his top administrative officials had been questioned about the pension investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0006004

But Ottenhoff, the governor's spokeswoman, said Blagojevich had been interviewed by federal investigators in late February or early March about allegations, raised by the governor's father-in-law, Chicago Ald. Richard Mell (33rd), that appointments were traded for campaign cash.

"He answered the questions they had about Mell's allegations and he's never heard back," Ottenhoff said.

Mell recanted his allegations under the threat of a defamation lawsuit by top Blagojevich adviser and fundraiser Christopher Kelly. But Mell's accusations prompted Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan and Cook County State's Atty. Richard Devine to open a joint investigation that is ongoing.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office declined to comment Thursday on the plea agreements or the administration's acknowledgement that federal investigators were reviewing Mell's allegations.

Landscape Exec Admits Bribing Parks Official (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 16, 2005

A former landscaping company executive on Thursday admitted his role in a scheme to pay $137,000 in bribes to a Chicago Park District official to help win $8 million in contracts at Millennium Park and other city properties.

John Kevin Haas, the former chief operations officer at James Michael Inc., pleaded guilty to two counts of fraud in U.S. District Court in Chicago.

In a plea agreement, Haas, 57, of Gurnee, admitted he made arrangements to send former parks official Shirley McMayon to a Wisconsin resort in 2000, bought a computer for her son and helped orchestrate other payoffs.

Haas, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, described bribes to McMayon that included cash, ski vacations and $22,000 to help pay off McMayon's loan on a Dodge Durango.

The plea deal calls for Haas to be sentenced to 2 years, 7 months in prison, forfeit $350,000 in wrongly obtained profits and pay restitution of $49,000.

Without cooperation, Haas would have faced a likely sentence of 37 to 46 months under federal sentencing guidelines.

U.S. District Judge David Coar must approve the deal. No date has been set for sentencing.

Prosecutors allege that Haas made payoffs along with Michael Lowecki, who owned the Mundelein landscaping company, in a scheme that ran from 2000 to 2004.

McMayon, the district's former director of natural resources, pleaded guilty two weeks ago. She agreed to cooperate in a plea deal that calls for her to receive a 34-month sentence.

Fraud and bribery charges are pending against Lowecki. He has pleaded not guilty.

According to Haas' plea agreement, he and Lowecki had concerns about how much they were paying McMayon. The two men agreed in 2001 that the company would not give McMayon more than 2 percent of the revenue the company got from the Park District, the plea deal said.

Legislator Resigns Amid Federal Inquiry (NYT)

By Stacey Stowe

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Sept. 15 - A veteran state senator who is under federal investigation resigned here on Thursday morning in a fiery speech on the steps of City Hall.

The senator, Ernest E. Newton II, a Democrat who represented Bridgeport for 17 years, was the target of a raid on his office in February by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in connection with an inquiry into a job training program here.

The head of that program, Warren Keith Godbolt, pleaded guilty on Aug. 2 to charges that included offering a $5,000 bribe to an unnamed public official in exchange for securing a $100,000 state grant. He is cooperating with the authorities, according to court papers filed by prosecutors.

Mr. Newton has not been charged. He said on Thursday that he was resigning from his Senate seat for the sake of his family. He said that his wife had multiple sclerosis and that one of his sons needed to go to college and the other "had some problems."

His voice alternately raspy and booming, Mr. Newton said, "You all can't ask me about my trial; that's not what this is about." His lawyer, Salvatore C. DePiano, also declined to comment.

"I've made some mistakes in my life," Mr. Newton, an advocate for minorities and the poor during his tenure, told about 200 supporters who murmured or shouted their support. "Charge it to my head, not my heart."

Last month, Mr. Godbolt, the executive director of Progressive Training Associates, admitted in court papers to making $5,000 in payments to an unnamed public official in exchange for the state grant. On June 4, 2004, according to those papers, that public official announced he had secured a $100,000 state grant for the job center.

Mr. Newton was the official who made the announcement that day.

Mr. Godbolt also pleaded guilty to embezzling more than $70,000 from the center, for purchases that included a $24,000 BMW. He is scheduled to be sentenced on Nov. 14.

Mr. Newton said he was proud of his record and called himself the "Moses of my people." He said he would step down rather than force an expensive legislative inquiry.

He spoke to rain-soaked reporters and camera crews from a cross-embossed lectern under an umbrella, flanked by his sons and his pastor. During his statement he chastised the press. "The media has already convicted me," he said.

For the announcement, Mr. Newton wore a cinnamon-colored chalk-stripe suit and a satin fez. A sartorial standout in the Connecticut General Assembly, he favored double-breasted suits in purple or pale pink and the occasional fedora.

A supporter, Clyde Nicholson, said afterward: "This ain't about $5,000. It's about taking a black man out, one of the most powerful black men in the state."

In a statement, Gov. M. Jodi Rell noted that Mr. Newton had not been charged, but she said, "I am disappointed by the chain of events that led to today's announcement." Many of Mr. Newton's Democratic colleagues, including Mayor John Fabrizi of Bridgeport, expressed sadness.

A special election to fill his seat will be held in November and will coincide with state mayoral contests.

County Seeks FBI Probe Into $6.4 Million Loan (HAMJN)

By Candice Brooks, Butler County Bureau

Hamilton (OH) Journal News, September 16, 2005

HAMILTON — The Butler County Commissioners unanimously agreed Thursday to sever an agreement with a fiber optics firm and request an FBI investigation into why the firm obtained multi-million-dollar loans in the county's name, allegedly without commissioners' approval.

"We are standing as a team to protect the finances and integrity of Butler County," Commission President Charles Furmon said. This was the third time that Furmon had urged his fellow commissioners to end the agreement.

Cincinnati-based Dynus Technologies, formerly CBS Technologies, obtained loans for $2.4 million Sept. 2, 2004 and $4 million Dec. 31, 2004 from National City Bank to lease equipment used in fiber optic networking.

The commissioners and Dynus began negotiating an economic development agreement in September 2004, but the agreement — now terminated — was not approved until July 28 and the county never assumed financial obligation for it, county officials insisted.

Dynus would have used four of the county fibers and, in exchange, the company agreed to attract 100 new jobs within three years and give the county 10 percent of the profit from customers using its high-speed internet, phone, and data services.

The company paid on the bank loan for nine months. However, county officials said they were surprised on Sept. 2 to receive an invoice for a $99,485.78 payment on the remaining $5.3 million in debt. County officials and the county prosecutor's office also said they were surprised documents appeared to show that Dynus President Jim Smith signed the lease agreement and other documents as a county agent.

In addition, County Auditor Kay Rogers signed at least six documents stating that Smith was a county agent even though the county commissioners said they never approved a resolution to give Smith the authority to incur debt for the county.

Rogers said Smith misled her to believe the documents were for tax purposes and she insists she told him the commissioners' approval would be required.

Commissioner Gregory Jolivette on Thursday expressed his disappointment in Rogers and Dynus officials.

"What did she think Dynus would do with these documents — put them in a waste paper basket or in a file?" he said. "It just disturbs me that she would take these actions in so many different documents — six or seven. (I'm) extremely disappointed with Dynus Corporation for not being more up front with us regarding their dealings. As they entered into this agreement in September and all through 2005 until we signed the agreement in July, we've had meetings with them and not once did they disclose that they had a financial agreement with National City Bank with our name on it."

Commissioner Mike Fox said Dynus officials were specifically asked during a meeting in February if they expected Butler County to accept any financial obligation and the response was no.

"It appears that the county was the object of a grand scheme and a con," Fox said. "Representations were made that were obviously inaccurate."

Furmon said he contacted the FBI earlier in the week and Fox said the county prosecutor's office would cooperate with the FBI.

"We have received the complaint from the commissioner," said Michael Brooks, spokesman for the Cincinnati FBI. "We'll make a determination if an investigation should be conducted."

Jolivette also asked that County Administrator Derek Conklin check other banks for unknown loans in the county's name because the commissioners would not have know about the Dynus loan had an invoice not been sent.

"I support the Commissioners' decision to terminate the contract with Dynus," Rogers said, but insisted "I did nothing wrong.

"There is no financial obligation to the county, as I have previously stated. I am concerned that some of the forms in question appear to contain fraudulance, (sic) and do not contain my actual signature. This is also apparently true of one of our Commissioners, and one of the employees of my office.

"As far as the forms that do contain my signature, I was only verifying my knowledge of the documents and the funds available to the county, since my office was overseeing the Fiber Optics Project. I was always clear to representatives from Dynus that the Commissioners, and only the Commissioners, may act as contracting agents for Butler County. If my signature was used improperly by outside agents, it is extremely unfortunate... The Commissioners know that in 10 years I have operated a highly professional office with full integrity."

Tom Rowe, spokesman for Dynus Technologies, said there was a meeting Wednesday between Dynus officials and county administrative officials and National City Bank officials.

"Based on this meeting, we agreed to continue our discussions toward a mutually agreeable solution to this matter," Rowe said. "We are committed to resolving this outside the courtroom.

"We anticipated the commissioners were going to take this action this morning,"

Scott Owens, executive director of the Butler Republican Party, and West Chester Township Trustee George Lang are both executives with Dynus. State Rep. Bill Coley (R-West Chester Township) has served as legal counsel for National City Bank.

County Republican Party Chair Carlos Todd said he has "purposely stayed out" of the matter, but said when he knows the facts he would make a statement.

Butler County Democratic Party Chair Dan Gattermeyer said the Republican Party must ask Rogers to resign.

"Our county deserves better government that the activities of Republican Kay Rogers in relation to the Dynus Technologies debacle," Gattermeyer said in a statement. "One party rule results in leaders who feel insulated and not accountable for their actions. The first step in changing this mindset is for all, Republicans and Democrats alike, to join in calling for Kay Roger's resignation."

Bronson Records Seized In Federal Grand Jury Probe (GAINSUN)

By KAREN VOYLES, Sun staff writer

Gainesville (FL) Sun, September 16, 2005

BRONSON - About two years ago, town councilman Aaron Edmondson started asking questions about why some new lights on the mayor's property looked so much like the new lights the town had just received.

Edmondson's curiosity led to a joint local and state investigation into embezzlement that ended with the mayor, James Blaine "Jamie" Griffin, going to state prison and the town clerk, June Greenlee, being put on probation.

On Thursday an FBI agent served a subpoena on the town for its financial records. The subpoena ordered all the town's financial records from Jan. 1, 2000, through Wednesday be delivered to the federal grand jury in Gainesville by Oct. 25. Subpoenas for town records were also delivered to Bronson banks. Mayor Beatrice Mongo said she expects the federal government will dig even deeper than state officials dug.

"Apparently they (federal investigators) don't think justice was served," Mongo said. "They told me they are not just looking at the people who got caught last time. They are looking at everybody and everything."

Town officials and others close to the case said there are at least two situations that likely caught the attention of the federal government.

A check made out to the Internal Revenue Service during the previous mayor's tenure was allegedly used to pay more than $2,000 in personal back taxes.

The other possible factor was $1 million in the form of two Community Development Block Grants that was not spent according to the contract signed by the town.

State Attorney Bill Cervone, whose office prosecuted Griffin and Greenlee on the state charges, said having the federal government pursue the same case is rare but does happen.

"It's an occasional thing, but when there is anything involving federal money, they are much more likely to be interested," Cervone said.

Sun staff writers Deborah Ball and Janine Young Sikes contributed to this report. Karen Voyles can be reached at (352) 486-5058 or voylesk@gvillesun.com.

Lawyer Says Threats From Gotti Made Him Alter Strategy (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 16, 2005

The former attorney for Frank LoCascio, a co-defendant of John Gotti Sr. in a 1992 murder and racketeering trial, testified Thursday that he tailored his defense strategy to suit Gotti after the now deceased mob boss threatened him.

"He would take care of me -- and I knew what that meant," the attorney, Anthony Cardinale, said Thursday during an evidentiary hearing in Brooklyn federal court.

The alleged threat, he said, came during a break in the trial while Cardinale was cross-examining the prosecution's star witness, Salvatore "Sammy the Bull" Gravano.

Cardinale had considered asking Gravano if he knew that LoCascio was not involved in one of the central charges of the indictment, the murder of Louis DiBono. But after Gotti spoke with him, Cardinale said, he did not ask for fear of making LoCascio look better at the expense of Gotti.

"I was afraid, if that's what you're asking, yes," Cardinale told LoCascio's appellate lawyer, Herald Price Fahringer of Lipsitz, Green, Fahringer, Roll, Salisbury & Cambria.

Cardinale also said he did not meet with LoCascio alone after Gotti told him not to, and changed the tenor of his overall defense and his closing arguments to emphasize Gotti's innocence.

Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Firestone, however, Cardinale would not say that his actions constituted an ethical breach or ineffective assistance of counsel.

"I really don't have a feeling one way or another on that issue," Cardinale said, clearly uncomfortable on the witness stand. "That's for others to decide. I think I did the very best I could have done for Mr. LoCascio under the circumstances."

Cardinale, a Boston attorney, was testifying at a hearing that was ordered in January by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The circuit asked Eastern District Judge I. Leo Glasser to determine if LoCascio received ineffective assistance of counsel and deserved a new trial.

Cardinale did not tell LoCascio or anyone else about the threat. Only after Gotti died three years ago did he mention it to another of LoCascio's appellate attorneys, Thomas Harvey, who revealed the incident.

Cardinale refused to submit an affidavit about the alleged threat out of fear of retaliation. His testimony Thursday was compelled by subpoena.

Judge Glasser, who presided over the 1992 trial, previously rejected LoCascio's request for a new trial, ruling that Gotti's attempt to orchestrate defense attorneys -- including those of his co-defendants -- was well known. He also rejected four previous attempts to appeal.

But the 2nd Circuit in January ordered a hearing on the matter, describing it as a "close call." The court noted that Cardinale, who took the case after LoCascio's first attorney was disqualified, was not an "in-house" attorney for the Gotti organization.

Firestone tried to further blunt the attack on Cardinale's performance by pointing out that Gotti and LoCascio were tried and defended jointly before any threat was made.

Referring to transcripts from the 1992 trial, he pointed to moments when Cardinale, during his closing arguments, singled out LoCascio, not Gotti, for the jury's attention. He also noted that Cardinale continued to work for Gotti, for no pay, on his appeals in the years following the convictions.

Gotti died in June 2002 while serving a life term in prison. LoCascio, 72, is also serving a life sentence.

Glasser reserved decision to allow the parties to make supplemental arguments.

Fugitive In Armored Car Theft Gives Up After 12 Years (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

LAS VEGAS, Sept. 15 - A woman who became one of the most sought after fugitives in the United States after disappearing with an armored car and $2.5 million ended almost 12 years on the run on Thursday when she walked into a federal courthouse here and surrendered.

The woman, Heather C. Tallchief, was a driver for Loomis Armored, now Loomis Fargo, on Oct. 1, 1993, when while making a stop at the Circus Circus casino hotel she took off with her truck and its contents, leaving behind two other guards.

Over the years, the authorities have said they were baffled about how Ms. Tallchief and her suspected accomplice, Roberto Solis, who had served time in prison for killing an armored car driver in 1969, eluded capture.

The case had been repeatedly broadcast on crime programs, including "America's Most Wanted" on Fox. A spokesman for the F.B.I. said Thursday that she had been a "highly sought after fugitive."

In an interview before her surrender, she said she was in Europe much of the time, out of reach of the money and working as a hotel maid.

In a court appearance in the afternoon, Ms. Tallchief, 33, was ordered held on charges that included bank larceny, fraud, conspiracy and making false statements to obtain a passport. A hearing was set for Sept. 29.

Ms. Tallchief, dressed in a gray blazer, a pink blouse and pale olive slacks, was led away in handcuffs and leg irons.

This week, Ms. Tallchief's lawyer, Robert Axelrod, interviewed his client on videotape in Los Angeles in hopes of selling her story to Hollywood. The two people said they would use the proceeds to reimburse the stolen money.

They allowed The New York Times to observe the interview and ask follow-up questions on condition that the newspaper not publish an article until the surrender.

Contrary to previous reports, Ms. Tallchief said she was not the mastermind behind the crime, but rather a victim of Mr. Solis's brainwashing. The criminal complaint does not say who organized the scheme but describes the two people as planning and carrying it out together.

Ms. Tallchief, a Seneca born in Buffalo, N.Y., said she lived a largely unhappy life, ostracized at school as she followed the punk rock scene and becoming addicted to crack.

She eventually obtained a general equivalency diploma and a nursing assistant certificate and worked in hospitals and clinics in the San Francisco Bay area, but , she said, had trouble keeping jobs. When she had hit bottom, she met Mr. Solis, more than 20 years older, through a friend at a nightclub.

She said he kept an altar in his apartment with a goat's head, crystals and tarot cards, all of which she initially found shocking but came to accept his beliefs, particularly that their meeting and "spiritual journey" were predestined.

In the tape with Mr. Axelrod, she said Mr. Solis constantly showed her tapes in the weeks leading up to the crime that had a hypnotic effect.

"They allegedly opened your mind but made you more receptive" to suggestion, she said. "They had lots of swirling colors like a tie-dye t-shirt."

Ms. Tallchief said his sway was so powerful that she hardly questioned him, even as he steered her toward finding work at Loomis.

"He was reformed," she said in the interview. "He wrote poetry. I knew his mother. He was a very normal person. If you sat down and met him, you would probably actually enjoy him. You would laugh at his jokes. You would think he was a nice person. There was never anything about him that you would think he was a heinous, horrible murdering con."

Ms. Tallchief said she followed Mr. Solis's instructions up to and on the day of the crime "almost like a robot." She said recalled little about the planning.

After driving off her route with the truck, she said, she drove to a warehouse, but did not know what happened to the money after helping Mr. Solis load it into boxes there. "I probably asked him about it but he wouldn't ever answer," Ms. Tallchief said, adding that when the subject came up he would say things like: " 'Don't worry about it. I'm taking care of it. It's O.K. It's safe. I've got it under control.' "

She took flight, she said, at first disguised as an old woman in a wheelchair pushed by Mr. Solis. She later led a low-key life in Amsterdam as a hotel maid, affecting an English accent that she still faintly speaks with now.

She declined to discuss how she slipped out of the United States with Mr. Solis and how she returned. Mr. Axelrod said she re-entered through Los Angeles a few days ago.

Ms. Tallchief said she had seen a psychiatrist in Los Angeles in the last few days.

She added that she had no contact with Mr. Solis after she took their took their infant son and left him. The boy, now 10, is in Amsterdam with friends of Ms. Tallchief.

Mr. Solis, 60, is at large.

Mr. Axelrod said that though the notion of being brainwashed "is a hard concept to follow" he believed a jury or the authorities would find that a "mitigating factor" in her case. He would not let Ms. Tallchief answer whether she would plead guilty, though she does not deny carrying out the crime.

Joe Parris, a supervisory agent for the F.B.I. in Washington, declined to comment on her brainwashing statement. A spokeswoman for the United States attorney here said the office would have no comment.

Ms. Tallchief said she decided to abandon her flight for the sake of her son, who she fears will ultimately suffer consequences of her crime. The boy, she said, does not have a legitimate birth certificate or other documentation and is growing curious about her past and his.

"I didn't give my child a normal life, but I think I am on the way to doing that," Ms. Tallchief said in the taping of the video, which a Hollywood producer, Robert Aaronson, is trying to sell to television networks and studios.

Mark Clark, a spokesman for Loomis, Fargo, said repaying the stolen money "would be a nice gesture" but he declined to address the case in detail, saying the company would "let it take its course."

Living abroad, Ms. Tallchief said, she avoided Americans and did not socialize much, to avoid people asking about her past.

"I've learned how to not have so many close friends, so I don't get asked all the questions," she said. "It's a lonely life, being a fugitive. And I certainly don't go to, you know, book clubs and, you know, cake sales and stuff. I don't have coffee morning with the girls."

Ms. Tallchief's history is the subject of a screenplay that is being worked on. A former chairman of 20th Century Fox, Bill Mechanic, who produces films through his own company, Pandemonium, in Los Angeles, said his company was finishing a script based on the robbery.

For all its dramatic potential, Ms. Tallchief's life on the run ended in anticlimactic fashion. Accompanied by her lawyers, she entered the office of the United States marshal at 9:29 a.m., sat on a couch and tapped her foot as officers conferred and then, after about 20 minutes, led her away.

Fugitive Surrenders For Las Vegas Armored Truck Heist (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-A woman on the FBI Most Wanted list accused in a $3.1 million (â,¬2.5 million) armored truck heist surrendered Thursday after more than 10 years on the run.

Heather Catherine Tallchief is accused of driving an armored truck loaded with cash away from the Circus Circus casino in October 1993. Speaking to reporters before she gave herself up, Tallchief, one of a handful of women ever on the FBI list, acknowledged her role.

"I truly feel this is the right thing to do," Tallchief said. Her lawyer said her boyfriend, also accused in the heist, "brainwashed" her into participating.

Attorney Robert Axelrod, her lawyer, was with Tallchief when she surrendered at U.S. District Court in Las Vegas. He said she was tired of hiding, and wanted her 10-year-old son to have a chance at living a normal life.

A message seeking comment from the FBI office in Las Vegas was not immediately returned.

Axelrod said Tallchief was an impressionable 21-year-old who blindly followed a persuasive older boyfriend in the Oct. 1, 1993, theft. The boyfriend, Roberto Solis, is now 60 and is still a fugitive on the FBI's Most Wanted list.

Tallchief maintained she was only following Solis' instructions and doesn't know where Solis is now, although they have a son together.

"He brainwashed her, as surely as a Manson kind of character (or) a Jim Jones kind of character," Axelrod said.

Tallchief eluded authorities by living under an assumed name and working as a maid and at other cash jobs in Amsterdam, Netherlands, her lawyer said.

Police said Tallchief was employed for several months as a driver for Loomis Armored Inc. before she disappeared with a truck loaded with $100 and $20 bills while co-workers filled automatic teller machines inside the casino.

Us Weekly Writer Charged Is Sex Case (LHL)

The Lexington Herald-Leader, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK - An Us Weekly gossip writer found himself on the wrong side of the police blotter after being charged with trying to seduce an FBI agent posing on the Internet as a 13-year-old girl.

Us Weekly suspended Timothy McDarrah, editor of the Hot Stuff column, without pay, a magazine spokesman said Thursday.

McDarrah responded in June to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the "freshest, youngest" girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent, who had posted the advertisement to lure pedophiles, that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said.

After McDarrah failed to show up for a meeting, the agent began sending instant messages in his guise as a 13-year-old girl. McDarrah offered to buy the agent clothes, compact discs and an iPod in exchange for a variety of sexual favors, the agent wrote in the complaint.

On Wednesday, the agent wrote, McDarrah e-mailed that he was waiting at a building the agent had described as the 13-year-old girl's address. FBI agents went there and arrested McDarrah, who is charged with one count of using the Internet to entice a minor into sex, which carries a minimum five-year sentence.

McDarrah was arraigned in Manhattan federal court, held on $50,000 bond and barred from using the Internet or having unsupervised contact with children. He did not enter a plea.

Felon In No-show Job Scam Asks For Early Release (AP)

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) A former payroll clerk convicted with three others of swindling thousands of dollars from a city-run vocational school has asked a federal judge for early release from a halfway house.

Jamie Dwyer, 54, has served two months of a six-month sentence at a halfway house in Hartford, Conn., for her role in a no-show job scheme that bled about $50,000 from the Massachusetts Career Development Institute.

Dwyer was convicted of fraud, conspiracy and lying to FBI agents. U.S. District Judge Michael A. Ponsor sentenced her to the halfway house, to be followed by six months home confinement.

But she said she doesn't need the mandatory group counseling and drug-testing at the facility, The Republican of Springfield reported Friday.

``The Hartford House's rehabilitative mission causes me to be subjected to restrictions and rules that are unnecessary and demeaning," Dwyer wrote in an affidavit filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court.

``I have been gainfully employed throughout my adult life," Dwyer continued. ``I successfully raised two children. I do not have problems with alcohol or substance abuse, and I have historically respected authority and the rights of others. I do not need counseling regarding those issues."

Gerald Phillips, MCDI's former executive director, was sentenced to 21 months in prison. Luisa Cardaropoli was sentenced to 15 months in prison for pocketing thousands of dollars from a no-show job she got through Giuseppe Polimeni, who was sentenced to one year in prison.

The charges against all four sprang from an ongoing investigation into public corruption in Springfield that began about five years ago and has netted several indictments and convictions.

Dwyer's lawyer, John S. Ferrara, said Dwyer's sentence is ``disproportionately harsh" compared to other local white-collar felons in separate cases. He pointed to former mayoral aide Cornell Lewis and accountant Salvatore Anzalotti, convicted last year for their roles in swindling $600,000 from a city loan fund. Both received home detention.

The Republican reported that Assistant U.S. Attorney William M. Welch II did not return a call for comment. Is it unknown whether he will oppose Dwyer's motion. It's unclear is when Ponsor will rule.

Inside The Ring (WT)

Taiwan envoy

Douglas Paal, the U.S. government representative to Taiwan, is under fire from the State Department for misrepresenting Taiwan's policies to his bosses.

DOJ_NMG_0006012

A State inspector general report said Mr. Paal's leadership style caused low morale among employees of the American Institute in Taiwan, the official U.S. office in Taiwan.

The most serious IG charge, however, is that Mr. Paal falsely reported on Taiwanese issues to senior State Department officials, a cardinal sin for envoys.

Officials familiar with the details of the IG report said Mr. Paal refused to allow dissenting views and was guilty of suppressing reports from U.S. officials who disagreed with his pro-China views.

As a result, the IG concluded that the U.S. government had an inaccurate picture of the situation in Taiwan.

Mr. Paal also angered the Pentagon by blocking for several years the appointment of an active duty military officer to help Taiwan with arms purchases. Army Col. Al Willner, the new Pentagon liaison in Taiwan, is the first U.S. military officer posted in Taiwan since 1979, when diplomatic relations were downgraded.

The report bolsters the views of conservative critics of Mr. Paal in Washington, who have said that he has pro-China views and has not dealt fairly with Taiwan.

As we reported in this column in 2001, Mr. Paal was picked for the Taiwan post even though he gave a speech falsely asserting President Bush had "misspoke" in saying the United States would do whatever it takes to help Taiwan defend itself from a mainland attack.

The U.S. officials discussed the unpublished details in the IG report after they were first disclosed in Taiwan's China Times and Taipei Times newspapers.

Mr. Paal, who is in Washington, could not be reached for comment. A spokesman in Taiwan declined to comment on the IG report.

Detective work

The Army has compiled a list of more than 450 criminal cases whose DNA was tested by a laboratory where an examiner has admitted to making a false entry in one case.

The list includes defendants from military installations across the country and around the world, from the Air Force Academy to Incirlik Air Base in Turkey. The blood testing dates back to 1995.

The exams are being reviewed by the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory in Forest Park, Ga.

In a memo, the laboratory is asking staff judge advocates — the military's lawyers — to contact the Army Criminal Investigative Command about any cases involving DNA.

The Aug. 25 memo, a copy of which we obtained, states that the examiner had been suspended in January 2004 after "permitting contamination in his testing process. After retraining, he was returned to casework on 13 September 2004, initially working one case at a time under supervision."

The false entry was found the following April. "The examiner was suspended from his DNA case work on 3 May 2005," the Army memo states. "In an inquiry initiated on 2 June 2005, the examiner admitted the false entry."

Morgue duty

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has signed off on mortuary teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., deploying to the Gulf Coast.

The job was supposed to be handled by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. But FEMA informed the Pentagon it must first find a contractor for the gritty work.

Nine teams arrived in New Orleans on Tuesday. The team can process 20 remains per day, per team. Another nine teams were on the way. The death toll from Hurricane Katrina in Louisiana is nearing the 500 mark.

After peaking at 72,000, the troop strength in the Gulf Coast has dipped below 65,000.

Inhuman enemy

Army Col. H.R. McMaster is a soldier-scholar who once advised Gen. John Abizaid, the top Middle Easter commander, on how to wage war in Iraq.

Col. McMaster now is in the heat of that battle himself. For the past several weeks, he has led the campaign to retake the border town of Tal Afar.

Col. McMaster appeared in the Pentagon this week via a video hookup to describe how his 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, joined by 3rd Iraqi Army Division, routed most of the extremists.

But it was his description of how the enemy occupied their safe haven that got the most attention. Col. McMaster told of beheadings, gunshot killings, a booby-trapped dead child and kidnappings. "This is the worst of the worst in terms of people in the world," he said. "To protect themselves here, what the enemy did is they waged the most brutal and murderous campaign against the people of Tal Afar. ... The enemy here did just the most horrible things you can imagine, in one case murdering a child, placing a booby trap within the child's body and waiting for the parent to come recover the body of their child and exploding it to kill the parents."

Col. McMaster said his men killed scores of the enemy in a series of firefights up and down the tight streets of the crossroads between Syria, where insurgents train, and the critical northern Iraqi city of Mosul.

"These Iraqi soldiers are brave," he said. "They're courageous. They're building capabilities every day."

Col. McMaster said soldiers captured some associates of lead terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

"They are some of the worst human beings on the face of the Earth," he said. "There is no really greater pleasure for us than to kill or capture these particular individuals."

Reform movement

In its effort to reform how it detains and interrogates war-on-terror detainees, the Pentagon and Army have drafted four directives:

•The Department of Defense Directive on the Detainee Program

•The Department of Defense Directive on Intelligence Interrogations, Detainee Debriefings and Tactical Questioning

•Army Field Manual on Human Intelligence Collector Operations

•Joint Publications on Detention and Interrogation Operations.

D.C. Waiter's Assailant Gets 22-Year Term (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

All Adrien Alstad's family wanted to talk about yesterday was the brother, partner and friend he had been over his 55 years, before he was gunned down last year in an early-morning robbery near Dupont Circle.

Gathered in D.C. Superior Court to see one of Alstad's youthful killers sentenced, they were flush with grief over a life lost and with memories of a life lived.

"My heart has been crushed," said his sister, Lynnette Bock, clutching her prepared statement in one trembling hand and a tissue in the other. "There is something so empty inside me."

The pleas for punishment seemed almost angry afterthoughts. But the sentencing was, after all, why they were in the courtroom.

Kurt Williams, 20 and mildly retarded, according to presentencing examinations, had been the lookout as Alstad was robbed and fatally shot Aug. 23, 2004. Alstad, a popular waiter, had just gotten off work when Williams and an accomplice accosted him. It was a crime that struck fear in a usually safe neighborhood, and it was neither the first time Williams had robbed nor the last, said the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Colleen Covell.

The killing was not, Judge Judith E. Retchin agreed, a single, "youthful act" but rather part of "a series of crimes," and it demanded the maximum 15 years that the sentencing guidelines recommend for voluntary manslaughter. She added a seven-year term for another robbery, for a total of 22 years.

Santha Sonenberg, Williams's attorney, had urged the judge to consider a host of mitigating factors detailed in a lengthy defense memorandum on Williams, of Northwest Washington.

Williams was born with cognitive impairments, was sexually and physically abused as a child and has an IQ in the mildly retarded range, according to a report submitted as part of the defense memorandum.

The judge acknowledged that Williams "had a terrible childhood" and "suffered all types of abuse." But she said that what Williams did in the days that followed Alstad's death was revealing. Not only did he commit another robbery, she noted, but when he was spotted by police, he ran.

"You knew right from wrong," Retchin said.

It was that second robbery, two nights later, again on R Street NW, that led police to Williams and his 15-year-old accomplice, who has not been publicly identified because he was charged as a juvenile. The 15-year-old pleaded guilty in a closed proceeding soon after the attack, but his sentence was not announced. The maximum penalty he faced was city supervision until he is 21.

Williams, who was 19 when he was arrested, pleaded guilty in May to manslaughter in Alstad's death and to armed robbery for the holdup two nights later.

For Alstad's relatives and friends, yesterday's sentencing took them back to a shattering moment barely a year ago.

Williams and the accomplice had accosted Alstad on R Street as he walked home from his job at Annie's Paramount Steak House. The pair demanded his money. When Alstad protested that he didn't have any cash, the younger assailant fired two or three shots, killing him.

As he did on the day he pleaded guilty, Williams apologized to his victim's family. "I understand your pain, losing a great person," he said.

Outside the courthouse, Alstad's sister said she has been too sad during the past year to be angry.

Now, she hopes Williams will find his way, which is what her brother would have wanted, she said. "He would've wanted to see that he got help," she said.

And if Williams can stay out of trouble, she said, her brother's death will not have been for nothing.

Personal Chef Laid Off During Probe Of AU President's Spending (WP)

By Valerie Strauss And Susan Kinzie, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

The personal chef employed by suspended American University President Benjamin Ladner and paid for by the school has been let go during a probe by the university's Board of Trustees into personal and travel expenses submitted by Ladner, according to sources.

In addition, the social secretary for the president and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner, has been transferred, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. Sally Ekfelt is now working in the president's office as an assistant to David E. Taylor, chief of staff to the president of the university, they said.

The actions come as the trustee board is close to completing a months-long probe of Ladner, who became president in 1994 and soon faced criticism for hiring the chef, Rodney Scruggs, and spending some $200,000 for drainage work and landscaping at the university-owned house where he lived.

Ladner was placed on administrative leave Aug. 24, and Provost Cornelius M. Kerwin was named acting president.

Neither Ladner nor Kerwin returned phone calls seeking comment. Several trustees declined to comment, as did Scruggs. Ekfelt did not return phone calls.

One source with knowledge of the investigation said the position of chef was eliminated as "an unnecessary expense," the same reason Ekfelt was transferred to another job. Ekfelt had worked out of the Ladners' on-campus home and was paid by the university to coordinate their social schedule.

It was not clear why the board eliminated Scruggs's position now; he had been employed by the university since 1996. University presidents are expected to entertain a great deal as part of their fundraising and other duties, so many rely on caterers or, less commonly, chefs.

Scruggs was known at the Northwest Washington school for whipping up multi-course meals for the Ladners, as well as for their personal and university guests in Ladner's campus home and in a house he and his wife own on Gibson Island in Maryland.

Sources knowledgeable about the case said Scruggs would sometimes be called late at night to cook dinner for the couple. Two chauffeurs who worked for the Ladners also said they often were required to take Scruggs's dirty white uniforms to a dry cleaner.

Ladner's base salary last year was $633,000, according to Internal Revenue Service records.

Va. Student's Disappearance Now A Criminal Investigation (WP)

By Leef Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

Although there is still no evidence that she has been harmed, the search for missing Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Marie Behl was upgraded yesterday to a criminal investigation, and an Amber Alert was issued in the case late last night.

Richmond police, who have taken the lead in the case from campus police, said they decided to open a criminal investigation based on three factors: The search involves a juvenile; more than a week has passed without a solid lead in the 17-year-old's disappearance; and an increasing number of tips are coming in because of national media coverage.

Law enforcement officials said the involvement of Richmond police will enhance the search for Behl, of Vienna, who was last seen by a roommate in their dorm room Sept. 5.

"They have the resources and the experience to get this investigation much further than the campus police were able to," said Behl's mother, Janet Pelasara, who welcomed the development as a fresh start. "They did their best, but they didn't have the manpower or the experience to handle this type of investigation."

In the Amber Alert, issued after 11 p.m. by the Virginia State Police, Behl was described as five-feet-six, 135 pounds, with brown eyes, light brown hair, pierced ears and a pierced nose. Police said she may be traveling in her car, a white 1997 Ford Escort with Virginia tag JPC-2848.

Amber Alerts disseminate information about missing and abducted children through the media and on highway signs.

Earlier yesterday, a task force was formed yesterday to pull together local, state and federal partners including VCU police, Virginia State Police, the FBI and the Virginia attorney general's office in the search for the Madison High School graduate.

"Whether Ms. Behl is still in Richmond, in state or out of state, we have the resources needed to locate her and bring her back to safety," said Richmond police spokeswoman Cynthia Price.

Pelasara described her daughter as a someone who obeyed her curfew "99 percent of the time" and was a friend to the Vienna police, whom she got to know while working at her hometown Starbucks.

"She didn't drink; she wasn't a partier," Pelasara said. "She didn't do drugs. She's a simply a bright, beautiful, engaging girl."

Behl was last seen about 10 p.m. Labor Day after a late dinner at a local cafe. She found her roommate in their room with a boyfriend and told her that she would leave for a while to give them privacy, police said.

Police said she was wearing jeans and a hooded black sweat shirt and took only her keys and a credit card, although Pelasara said her daughter did not have her credit card with her.

Police said Behl continues to receive e-mails but has not logged on to read them. Her credit card has not been used, and the last call on her cell phone was made the night she disappeared.

Police said dozens of tips generated in the past week have failed to provide credible information on Behl's whereabouts or the location of her car.

"It's just baffling to us that with this kind of exposure, that nothing has panned out," said VCU police spokeswoman Pam Lepley. "There always was concern, but now it's been raised to a new level."

Pelasara said her daughter had about $40 in cash with her when she disappeared. Because Behl had so little money with her, Pelasara said she believes her daughter "couldn't be involved in this on her own."

Police ask anyone with information about Behl or her car to call the Richmond police tip line at 804-514-8477 or VCU police at 804-828-1196.

Photographer Gets Prison Sentence For Diaz Shots (LAT)

From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

A photographer was sentenced Thursday to prison for trying to extort $3 million for nude pictures of superstar Cameron Diaz he had taken early in her career.

John Rutter was sentenced to three years and eight months in prison for perjury and attempted grand theft under a sentence imposed by Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Michael E. Pastor.

The charges against Rutter, 42, stemmed from a daylong photo shoot in 1992 in an abandoned Los Angeles-area warehouse. Diaz, then a 19-year-old unknown, posed topless, wearing fishnet stockings and leather.

In the years after the shoot, her career took off. Such films as "The Mask" and "There's Something About Mary" earned her a place on Hollywood's A-list and paychecks of up to $20 million a film. Rutter approached Diaz with the racy photos in 2003, a week before the premiere of "Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle," in which she co-starred, saying he had interested buyers.

Rutter's attorney, Mark Werksman, called the July trial a battle between a "rich and famous celebrity" and a "hardworking photographer."

Deputy District Attorney David Walgren downplayed the celebrity aspect of the case in statements to reporters, saying that, had the victim been someone other than Diaz, the case still would have been prosecuted "in the same courts" and "in the same manner."

Walgren had asked for the sentence the judge imposed.

Diaz testified that she felt no shame or embarrassment about the photo session.

"I kind of bought into thinking I would like to do images that are great images -- rather than just a model who sells clothes," Diaz testified in July. "I didn't think of them as pornographic. I didn't think of them as perverted."

Bush Endorses Plan To Close 22 Bases (WP/AP)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

President Bush yesterday endorsed a plan for closing 22 major military bases and reconfiguring 33 others, leaving their fate to Congress.

Bush had until next Friday to either accept the entire report from an independent commission and send it to Congress or return it to the commission for further work.

The report will become final in 45 days unless Congress acts to reject it in full. Communities probably have little hope of a reprieve for their bases, as lawmakers have never rejected such reports.

Bush had said that for the process to be "nonpolitical" the commission's decision would have to stand. He got the report last Friday from the nine-member Defense Base Closure and Realignment Commission.

Bush's submission of the report comes as his administration and Congress are preoccupied with aiding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast and other priorities. A GOP-led effort in the Senate to derail the base-closing process, which Republican leaders feared could embarrass them, has fizzled.

The commission said its recommendations would mean annual savings of $4.2 billion, compared with $5.4 billion under the plan it received in May from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld had recommended closing 33 major bases and reducing personnel at 29 others.

The commission largely endorsed Rumsfeld's vision to restructure the domestic network of military bases to save billions of dollars over the next two decades and streamline the Army, Navy and Air Force.

But commissioners did recommend keeping open several major bases against the Pentagon's wishes, including a shipyard in Kittery, Maine; a submarine base in Groton, Conn.; and Air Force bases in South Dakota and New Mexico.

The commission denied politics played a role in any decisions, even as it voted to keep open bases in the home states of Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) and other senators leading the opposition. That all but eliminated the possibility of congressional intervention.

In the House, a majority of members overwhelmingly support this round of closures and consolidations, the first in a decade.

Gonzales Says Justice Department Will Fight To Keep Pledge In Public Schools (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, The Associated Press

AP, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday that the Justice Department will fight to overturn a federal court ruling that the Pledge of Allegiance can't be recited in public schools because it contains a reference to God.

Gonzales said the pledge is one of several expressions of national identity and patriotism that mention of God but don't violate the Constitution's ban on state-sponsored religion.

The high court "has affirmed time and again that such official acknowledgments of our nation's religious heritage, foundation and character are constitutional," Gonzales said in a statement a day after the ruling by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton in Sacramento.

Karlton's decision could put the issue on track for another round of Supreme Court arguments. The court sidestepped the issue last year, ruling atheist Michael Newdow had no standing to bring the case on behalf of his daughter because he did not have custody of her.

The Bush administration had opposed Newdow on the same basis that Gonzales set forth Thursday. Newdow also is involved in the latest case, acting as attorney for three parents challenging the pledge because it includes the words "under God."

Gonzales is widely viewed as a leading contender for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Supreme Court because he is close to President Bush. Gonzales' statement of support to keep "under God" in the pledge could appeal to religious conservatives, who have expressed concerns about him as a potential justice because he has not stated opposition to the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion.

The Becket Fund, a religious rights group that is a party to the pledge case, said it would appeal to the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which held the `under God' provision of the pledge unconstitutional in 2002.

The decisions by Karlton and the appeals court conflict with an August opinion by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, similar to the requirement in California.

Mother Of Pledge-battle Girl Vows To Fight For `under God' (KRT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - Sandra Banning, the Sacramento, Calif.-area mother of the girl who helped trigger the legal battle over the Pledge of Allegiance that flared anew this week, came to the nation's capital Thursday with a pledge of her own:

To do everything she can to keep the pledge in schools and the phrase "under God" in the pledge.

The day after a Sacramento federal judge revived the controversy by ruling that reciting the pledge in public schools is an unconstitutional violation of the separation of church and state, Banning's efforts became intertwined with the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings for Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr.

Banning publicly urged his confirmation in hopes that he would rule against the case brought by her 11-year-old daughter's father, Michael Newdow, the atheist and amateur lawyer who has argued before the Supreme Court that the pledge should be kept out of public schools. And to help rally support for the Pledge of Allegiance as the case works its way again toward the high court, she's forming a grass-roots advocacy group, the "One Nation Under God Foundation," affiliated with the conservative Traditional Values Coalition.

Banning and other Roberts supporters said they hoped the pledge issue would give an additional boost to his nomination. Roberts, a conservative who has vowed not to be a "judicial activist" who broadly interprets the Constitution, finished four days of questioning Thursday with a strong likelihood of being confirmed by the Republican-controlled Senate.

"A judge's job is to interpret the Constitution and laws, not to be a social engineer who tries to remake our culture by ridding it of traditional values that we, the citizens, hold dear," Banning, 45, said at a previously scheduled news conference with other Roberts supporters. "It is critical that judges such as Judge Roberts be on the Supreme Court bench when the case is heard."

Banning learned of the new pledge ruling when she arrived Wednesday at the airport in Washington. She said the court decision gave her new impetus to push for Roberts' confirmation.

"I've watched some of the hearings. I've watched the interviews. I have confidence in President Bush," said Banning, who later attended the confirmation hearings. During a presidential debate last fall, Bush said, "I wouldn't pick a judge who said that the Pledge of Allegiance couldn't be said in a school because it had the words `under God' in it."

Thursday, the Senate condemned the ruling, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the Justice Department would again "defend the ability of American school children to pledge allegiance to the flag."

Wednesday, two Republican senators mentioned the ruling shortly after the news broke, but Roberts was not asked about his position on the case during this week's confirmation hearings because he has declined to answer questions about issues on which he may have to rule.

Several Republican senators have criticized Wednesday's ruling, saying it showed why Roberts was needed on the Supreme Court.

"I think it highlights one of those moments where the courts overstepped," Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., said in an interview, "and at a time when we're trying to get consideration of this potential justice who's been so clear in his views of not imposing his will, but expressing the law."

Typical of their contentious relationship, which has involved a nasty, long-running custody battle over their 11-year old daughter, Newdow and Banning disagreed on how Roberts would rule.

"He sounds like a very intelligent, thoughtful man, and if he applies the principles underlying the Constitution ... then I have absolutely no doubt he would rule in my favor," Newdow said in a telephone interview.

The case started in 2000 when Newdow, a former Sacramento resident now living in Texas, objected to his daughter's reciting the pledge with her kindergarten class in the Elk Grove Unified School District. He argued that the government was telling her he was wrong to be an atheist because the pledge declares this is "one nation, under God."

Banning, a Christian, opposed his suit. After the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit Court of Appeals stunned the nation in 2002 by agreeing with Newdow that the pledge was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case.

Newdow, a doctor with a law degree, became a legal celebrity, a novice lawyer who received special permission to argue his case before the high court in March 2004. The justices dismissed the case three months later on a technicality, ruling Newdow did not have custody of his daughter when he filed the lawsuit and therefore did not have standing to bring it to the courts.

He re-filed the case on behalf of three unnamed parents from the same school district. After Wednesday's ruling, the case again could be headed to the Supreme Court.

"We won on a technicality. A win is a win. We'll take it," said Banning, who is self-employed provider of administrative support services for various companies. "It's given us at least another year and a half, maybe two, to educate the American public ... kind of stir the pot, if you will, on why these cases are important."

Banning, who never married Newdow, said she has tried to shield their daughter, now in the sixth grade, from the case. The girl, whose name has been kept out of the media, knew her father was in the media Wednesday and asked Banning about it.

"I've reassured her many, many, many times ... reminding her that he has the right as a citizen of this great nation to file these cases," Banning said. "But equally so, mom has the right and, I believe, really the necessity to stand up for cases of this nature."

Justice Dept. Settles Voting Rights Suit (AP-Y2)

The Justice Department said Thursday it has dropped its voting rights lawsuit against Boston after city officials agreed to provide voting materials in Chinese and Vietnamese, and to allow federal observers to monitor polling places.

The agreement comes six weeks after the federal government filed a lawsuit — part of what it said is a national initiative — alleging that Boston's election practices discriminate against Hispanic and Asian American voters who do not speak English.

"The city of Boston is to be congratulated for agreeing to resolve this matter in a constructive and forward-looking manner," Bradley J. Schlozman, acting assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said in a news release announcing the agreement.

When the suit was filed, Schlozman alleged that Boston's violations were "deeply disturbing."

A city lawyer at the time called the claims "unsubstantiated." City officials said they already provide ballots in English and Spanish.

Seth Gitell, a spokesman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said Thursday the agreement does not say the city did anything wrong. "What the city objected to originally was to signing a consent decree and acknowledging wrongdoing," he said.

The announcement Thursday said Boston agreed to provide ballots, registration notices and other forms in Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese. Boston also agreed to provide more training to poll workers regarding the Voting Rights Act.

Also, Boston agreed to a court order appointing federal observers to monitor polling places through 2008, the announcement said.

Hispanic residents comprise 14 percent of Boston's 590,000 residents, while Chinese and Vietnamese residents make up just over 5 percent, according to 2000 Census figures.

Next, Massachusetts (WP)

FOR THE SECOND time in as many weeks, a state legislature has bucked the ugly trend of writing discrimination against gays into state law. Last week, the California Assembly voted to allow same-sex marriage. This week, lawmakers in Massachusetts decisively rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to overturn the state's Supreme Judicial Court decision acknowledging gay marriage rights. The lopsided vote, 157 to 39, provides a kind of backhanded legislative validation of the court's ruling, which had been much derided for usurping the legislative function. Lawmakers have not voted to create same-sex-marriage rights, but they have decided not to take them away. The vote shows that as people grow used to gay marriages, which have been taking place in Massachusetts for more than a year, their discomfort -- and the political impetus for banning them -- diminishes.

The vote certainly overstates support for same-sex marriage in Massachusetts, for the fiercest opponents of gay marriage also opposed the specific amendment under consideration. The amendment would replace full marriage equality with civil unions, and some opponents have thrown their support instead behind a proposal not to recognize same-sex relationships at all. Still, the tide is clearly turning, and minds are changing. Only last year, after all, the Massachusetts legislature passed this amendment. This year, even excluding those who voted against it because they favor something harsher, a clear majority opposed it on the grounds that they affirmatively support marriage equality.

Work remains to be done. Under the Massachusetts constitution, lawmakers are likely to confront the more draconian version of the constitutional amendment, and, even with relatively scant legislative support, it could go before the voters in 2008. But public opinion is moving in the right direction, and the reason is not hard to discern: Since the high court's ruling went into effect, a lot of couples have tied the knot in Massachusetts, and, somehow, the sun has continued to rise in the east. Many people are realizing that it costs heterosexual marriage nothing for same-sex marriage also to exist. The longer people have to absorb that lesson, the more support for banning marriages between committed couples is likely to erode.

Microsoft, AOL Discuss Online Partnership (AP)

By ALLISON LINN, AP Business Writer

AP, September 16, 2005

SEATTLE — Microsoft Corp. and Time Warner Inc. have been discussing potential online partnerships that would help the two companies better compete against rivals Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc., two people familiar with the talks said Thursday.

They two said the discussions have been going on for months and that any possible deal is not imminent.

Microsoft and AOL — who just two years ago settled a bitter antitrust lawsuit over Microsoft's tactics in the Internet browser market — are discussing possible collaboration in search technology, online advertising and instant messaging, said the two sources, one of whom is an executive with Time Warner's America Online unit.

The other source, who works closely with Microsoft and has been involved in company discussions on the possible partnership, said the talks have heated up in the last couple weeks but are not advanced.

Both sources spoke on condition of anonymity.

Time Warner spokeswoman Susan Duffy and Microsoft spokesman Jim Desler declined to comment on the talks, which were first reported in Thursday's editions of the New York Post.

The AOL executive said one aspect of the talks originally centered on using Microsoft's new MSN search engine on AOL, replacing AOL's current relationship with Google.

More recently, the executive said, the two companies have been talking about the possibility of deeper relationships, such as collaborating in the lucrative market of selling advertising online.

Such a collaboration could allow the two companies to benefit from growing interest in search-based advertising, helping them better compete against search leaders Google and Yahoo.

But, the executive said, "the discussions are not advanced."

The person familiar with Microsoft's thinking said the company's MSN unit has always been interested in striking a deal that would allow it to benefit from AOL's market-leading instant messenger program.

AOL's instant-messaging product, AIM, had more than 53 million unique users in August compared to about 29 million for the competing MSN Messenger, according to Nielsen/NetRatings.

Time Warner shares rose 58 cents, or 3.2 percent, to close at $18.50 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange. Microsoft shares were down 4 cents to close at $26.27 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Shares of Time Warner have traded between $15.82 and $19.90 in the past 52 weeks. Shares of Microsoft have traded between $23.82 and $30.20 during the same period.

Redmond-based Microsoft and Time Warner's AOL unit have clashed in the past.

In the spring of 2003, Microsoft agreed to pay Time Warner $750 million to settle an antitrust suit over charges it used strong-arm tactics to make Internet Explorer the dominant Web browser, displacing AOL's Netscape.

Microsoft In Talks On AOL Link: Source (REU)

By Kenneth Li

Reuters, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - Time Warner Inc. (NYSE:TWX - News) and Microsoft Corp. (NasdaqNM:MSFT - News) are discussing ways they could combine their Internet assets, including the possibility of an investment by the software giant, sources familiar with the matter said on Thursday.

"There have been talks on ways Microsoft and AOL assets can be better leveraged and they've taken place over the normal course of business ...," one source said, calling reports of a joint venture "way overblown."

Time Warner declined comment. Microsoft was not immediately reachable.

Shares of the world's largest media company rose 3 percent after the New York Post reported on Thursday the two were talking about a joint venture.

DOJ_NMG_0006021

Talks of a Microsoft stake in the AOL division was one of several scenarios under review, a separate source familiar with the matter said. "There has been discussions about Microsoft investing in Time Warner," one source said, who also said nothing was imminent.

A combination would create the single largest Internet audience pool by unique visitors and forge a formidable online competitor in a field currently led by Yahoo Inc. (NasdaqNM:YHOO - News) and Google Inc. (NasdaqNM:GOOG - News)

AOL and MSN would have a combined unique audience of about 167.8 million, although there would likely be duplicates. This compares to Yahoo's 101.3 million unique visitors and Google's 80.4 million in August, according to Nielsen/NetRatings.

Discussions on search and combining advertising forces began early this year, but have evolved over the past several weeks into finding ways to combine the businesses.

While they could advance further, working out issues such as how much AOL is valued and other structural concerns have been "difficult" and nothing was imminent, a source added.

Broad discussions on how the two companies could work together began two years ago after the companies settled a long-running antitrust suit that America Online, a unit of Time Warner, filed against the software giant, the source said.

One analyst said Microsoft, which debuted its search engine late last year, was likely looking to replace Google as the underpinnings of AOL's search services. About 11 percent of Google's revenue came from AOL in the first half of 2005. "MSN may want to sell search to AOL," said Matt Rosoff, an analyst at Directions on Microsoft, an independent research firm based in Kirkland, Washington.

Meanwhile, Time Warner has been under pressure to boost its stock price, which has fallen 70 percent over the past five years. Corporate raider Carl Icahn this week said he planned to seek one or more shareholder-nominated board seats at the company to force changes.

Icahn has demanded that the company raise its stock buyback program to $20 billion from Time Warner's existing commitments of up to $5 billion and completely spin off its cable division.

One investor was cheered by the discussions and said anything that could add some $4 per share to the stock price from improvements at AOL was a good sign.

"Management is not asleep at the switch," said Larry Haverty, a portfolio manager at Gabelli Asset Management, which has a stake of about $286 million in Time Warner.

"Anything you can do to move the needle in that direction is terrific for shareholders."

Low ball estimates for AOL are about $10 billion with improvements possibly doubling that valuation, Richard Greenfield, an analyst at Fulcrum Global Partners said.

Time Warner shares closed up 58 cents at $18.50 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Trading activity in Time Warner options also spiked up on Thursday. Some 88,014 calls and 43,581 puts traded in Time Warner in the U.S. options market, above its normal volume of 23,824 contracts, according to Track Data.

Microsoft Is In Talks To Buy A Stake In AOL As Google Looms (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin And Robert A. Guth, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Demonstrating its growing concern about Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. has entered talks with Time Warner Inc. about taking a substantial stake in the media giant's America Online unit, said people familiar with the matter.

The conversations have centered on whether AOL would switch to using Microsoft's search engine instead of Google's, these people said, as well as other areas of potential cooperation. AOL and Google shared about $380 million in revenue last year derived from displaying ads on AOL's search results.

The talks, which are described as preliminary, have also included discussions of combining the advertising sales forces of AOL and Microsoft's MSN online service, these people said.

Time Warner and Microsoft spokesmen declined to comment. The talks were reported yesterday by the New York Post.

AOL and Microsoft once were fierce rivals, and the rapprochement indicated by the talks shows how much the Internet landscape has changed. Just a few years ago, AOL and Microsoft battled over dial-up Internet customers and Web browsers.

Now the dial-up business is in decline and the big prize in the industry is advertising revenue, an area in which both AOL and Microsoft lag behind Google and Yahoo Inc.

Internet advertising now is the fastest-growing segment of the media industry, with revenue rising 21.4% to $7.4 billion last year, according to TNS Media Intelligence. Adding AOL visitors to those who use Microsoft's search service would give Microsoft a much larger potential base of people who would see the ads the service displays.

Last year, Yahoo raked in revenue of about $3.6 billion, primarily from advertising. Google was close behind with revenue of about $3.2 billion, also primarily from ads. Meanwhile, AOL garnered ad revenue of only about $1 billion and MSN eked out $1.4 billion in ad revenue in the fiscal year ended June 30.

The talks also signal a strategic shift for Time Warner, which had long resisted pleas from some investors to get rid of all or part of its ailing Internet arm, which came to the company when the old AOL bought Time Warner in 2001 in what became a disastrous merger. Time Warner Chairman Richard Parsons declared last year that the company wouldn't sell or spin off AOL "any time soon," citing the promise of capturing a greater share of the Internet ad market. "Our challenge is to articulate to Wall Street that there is a Yahoo inside of AOL ... so that some of that Internet fairy dust gets sprinkled on AOL," Mr. Parsons said then. The unit also generates a lot of cash, despite an ongoing decline in subscribers.

Since then, AOL has revamped its AOL.com Web site, offering free access to many of the features once available only to AOL's paying subscribers -- in the hopes of winning more advertising revenue. But a person close to the situation says Mr. Parsons would likely be willing to sell a stake in AOL if Time Warner could keep a "sizable" stake for itself, in order to benefit from a turnaround at AOL. A person familiar with the talks says AOL has not discussed selling a stake to other companies such as Google or Yahoo.

People close to the discussions say that the size of Microsoft's possible stake in AOL hasn't been determined and that investment bankers haven't been engaged. And the price of the stake is likely to be a sticking point. In the past, Mr. Parsons has balked at offers for AOL that fell below the price he has put at about $20 billion.

The discussions show how Microsoft now sees Google as a major adversary. Microsoft's MSN unit has built a viable search engine modeled after Google's but isn't making the advances in market share and other measures that executives had hoped for, say people familiar with MSN. These people say that the internal goal for the MSN search team by year's end is to beat Google on the "relevance" of search results. But Microsoft may not hit that goal as it struggles to learn techniques to increase the quality of results, many of which Google likely already uses, and as Google continues to expand its reach.

Google is also encroaching on Microsoft's personal-computer turf. The company last year rolled out free software that makes it quicker and easier to search and find information stored on a PC, including emails contained in Microsoft Outlook and documents in Microsoft Word. Microsoft swiftly moved to protect its flank, rolling out a similar "desktop search" feature that will have the capability to be built into versions of Windows and Office software coming next year.

At Microsoft's annual meeting with financial analysts in July, Chief Executive Steve Ballmer likened his company's pursuit of Google to Microsoft's well-chronicled battle with International Business Machines Corp. in business software more than a decade ago. Microsoft ultimately prevailed in many of those markets. Mr. Ballmer said then that the company will "do what it takes to keep coming and coming and coming and coming on this front."

Relations between Microsoft and AOL began to thaw in 2003, when Microsoft agreed to pay $750 million to settle an antitrust lawsuit brought by AOL's Netscape division. At that time, the two companies also agreed to cooperate on the development of copyright-protection technology.

Since then, the companies have worked together to fight spam and cooperate on other technology issues. In January, Microsoft briefed AOL executives about its new search engine, said a person close to the situation. At that meeting, Microsoft said it would try to make it financially beneficial for AOL to switch to its technology, this person said, adding that the discussions have been "on and off" since January and that many different proposals have been floated.

Although AOL's Internet-access business is in decline, AOL still generates a lot of traffic -- making it a rich prize for search engines that thrive on huge volumes of users. Sites that are 100% owned by AOL collectively drew 112.4 million unique visitors in July, according to comScore Media Metrix.

Since 2002, AOL has been using Google's search engine under an agreement that calls for AOL to keep about 80% of the ad revenue generated by searches by AOL users, according to a person familiar with the deal. In 2004, AOL received about $300 million in revenue from the arrangement.

The contract hasn't expired but people close to AOL say the company has the option to walk away; Google wouldn't comment. "Google and AOL have a healthy global partnership and AOL remains a valued partner," a Google spokesman said.

Time Warner, Microsoft Talk Of Joint AOL-MSN Search Project (USAT)

By Byron Acohido And Laura Petrecca, Usa Today

USA Today, September 16, 2005

SEATTLE — Time Warner and Microsoft are discussing the possibility of combining some aspects of America Online and MSN to become a larger force in Internet search and search-based advertising.

No deal is imminent, said two executives with direct knowledge of the talks, who declined to speak for attribution because discussions are still fluid. It could evolve into a strategic alliance or joint venture, with Microsoft taking a stake in AOL.

The companies declined comment. But industry analysts said, if consummated, the deal could shake up the world of Internet search. Stakes are high in paid search, the practice of aligning topical ads with objective search results. Paid search has become a $6 billion to $10 billion a year business, with 90% of that revenue split roughly equally between Google and Yahoo, says Chris Sherman, editor of trade newsletter SearchDay. Neither company discloses paid search revenue.

If AOL and MSN join forces, AOL would likely dump Google as its behind-the-scenes supplier of search services, says Chris Winfield, president of search marketing firm 10e20. AOL and MSN would shift their combined search audiences — and the advertisers who cater to them — to MSN's fledgling search services, Winfield says.

Microsoft launched MSN Search in February. That allows MSN to stop contracting basic search from Yahoo. MSN continues to contract paid search from Yahoo.

But MSN has begun piloting a cutting-edge paid search service, called MSN AdCenter, in France and Singapore. A worldwide launch is expected by early next year, says Matt Rosoff, analyst at research firm Directions on Microsoft.

Once MSN AdCenter is launched, an AOL-MSN search partnership could be “hugely significant. It's the best way for Microsoft to suck some air out of paid search, the fastest-growing part of the Internet advertising market,” says Rosoff.

Much hinges on how well Microsoft builds a following for MSN Search, a key to persuading advertisers to patronize MSN AdCenter. Nielson/NetRatings' July ranking of search services gave Google a 46% share to Yahoo's 23%, MSN's 13% and AOL's 5.4%.

“Taking a close look at all technical options is the right thing for them (AOL and MSN) to be doing,” says Charlene Li, search analyst at Forrester Research.

At present, Google and Yahoo allow advertisers to associate their pitches with search results without any way to target specific users. But MSN AdCenter can direct ads to search engine users categorized by age and gender.

“AdCenter has been designed from the ground up to allow marketers to target ads more effectively,” says Kevin Lee, chairman of search marketing firm Did-it.com.

AOL and MSN could tap into archived demographic data they already keep on subscribers. “That could be a key driver behind a strategic alliance,” Lee says.

Microsoft Said To Be In Talks On Forming Link To AOL (NYT)

By SAUL HANSELL

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Microsoft and Time Warner have explored a variety of possible combinations of the MSN Internet portal with the America Online operation of Time Warner, including a merger of the two into a new company that would be jointly owned, according to several people involved in the talks.

The discussions were initiated by Microsoft, which has Google, its new archrival, clearly in its sights. Microsoft is trying to focus its Internet operations on its developing Web search product rather than its Web portal and Internet access business, which it no longer sees as strategically important.

Microsoft offered to sell its MSN Internet portal and dial-up subscriber business both to America Online and to Yahoo, according to several people with knowledge of the talks. While Yahoo considered and quickly rejected the proposal, Time Warner, the parent of America Online, expressed interest.

Top executives at the companies discussed a variety of potential transactions as recently as three weeks ago. Those talks, however, are in suspension as Microsoft considers its strategic position, people involved in the discussions said.

Representatives of Time Warner, Microsoft and Yahoo declined to comment.

The most elaborate proposal being discussed would involve combining America Online with the MSN Internet portal and dial-up Internet business, creating the world's largest Internet company. The venture's Web search would be provided by Microsoft. That combination would be a significant blow to Google, which provides the Web search on AOL's services. This year, 11 percent of Google revenue came from advertising it placed on AOL sites.

A combination of AOL and MSN would have 18 percent of the search market in the United States, according to Nielsen NetRatings, making it third after Google, with 46 percent, and Yahoo, with 23 percent.

Indeed, much of Microsoft's motivation to do such a deal is to head off a threat it sees from Google. Microsoft's worry is not so much Google's Web search business.

Microsoft sees in Google the potential to offer a variety of Internet services, using Google's vast network of servers, making it less necessary for people to buy Microsoft software or even computers with the Microsoft Windows operating system. Moreover, Google could offer free desktop software as well, supported by its network of advertisers.

"Ultimately Microsoft knows that the software landscape will shift from the desktop to the hybrid of the Internet and the desktop," said Gene Munster, an analyst with Piper Jaffray. "Google has thrown out warning shots that they will be players in many of the significant areas of software."

Time Warner, meanwhile, has been trying to figure out if AOL fits into its amalgamation of companies, especially because AOL's core dial-up Internet access business, while profitable, is shrinking as customers shift to high-speed service provided by telephone and cable companies.

AOL has been trying to build a free, advertiser-supported portal business. Combining that effort with Microsoft's large MSN portal, along with Microsoft's popular Hotmail e-mail service, could accelerate AOL's progress toward its goals.

The merged company would leap past Yahoo as the biggest Internet portal and have a more credible case to make to advertisers. Another advantage of a deal is that MSN is strong in many countries while AOL has focused mainly on the United States and a few European countries.

Being able to describe AOL as a leader and bring in the backing of Microsoft, Time Warner executives hope, may reverse investors' negative perception of AOL, which they believe has been dragging down Time Warner stock.

If such a deal were successful, the venture might eventually issue shares to the public. AOL's management has long wanted the flexibility of making acquisitions with a separate stock as well as independence from Time Warner, where many executives still resent the terms of the 2000 merger of the two companies.

Michael Nathanson, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein, said such a deal would probably help Time Warner's stock. "The deal will be trumpeted so much that the stock will go up," he said.

The discussions of potential deals are said to have begun early this year, when Microsoft approached AOL in hopes of persuading it to drop Google and use MSN's new Web search service. (Microsoft has been having similar talks with nearly every major company that offers Internet search.) Talks progressed and explored many options, from a combination of ad sales staff to a full merger of AOL and MSN.

The possibility of a deal by Microsoft and AOL was first reported by The New York Post.

A deal with AOL could provide widespread distribution for Microsoft's search system and a platform for developing Microsoft's own Internet-based services. An AOL merger would also provide a graceful exit from MSN's stagnant dial-up Internet service business, which still has several million subscribers.

But Microsoft would also have to give up some control over the future of technology that could be strategically important to its future. Bill Gates, Microsoft's chairman, is not known for giving up control of anything. Indeed, MSNBC, Microsoft's 50-50 joint news venture with NBC, has been a source of friction, because Microsoft executives believe it has limited their ability to make decisions on their own. Indeed, disentangling Microsoft's contract with NBC may well be one of the most difficult parts of pursuing a deal with Time Warner, which owns the rival CNN network.

Some important issues in the talks remain undecided. For example, both AOL and Microsoft want to control a combined instant messaging system, which each company sees as strategically important technology. Another question is how much traffic Microsoft would direct to the combined venture.

Until recently Microsoft was able to use its browser and other software to direct people to MSN by default. But a combination of legal settlements and contract changes have allowed computer makers to set their own default home pages for browsers. The next version of Windows is designed to be even more neutral about Internet services, thus providing less of a boost for MSN. Indeed, that is one reason Microsoft is now interested in getting out of the Internet portal business.

The financial terms of a transaction have not been fully explored because they depend on which assets would be combined. Because AOL is bigger and more profitable than MSN, Time Warner would own a majority of a combined operation, unless Microsoft put up cash to increase its stake. Analysts value AOL at $10 billion and $20 billion.

Mr. Nathanson said he hoped the companies do not create a venture in which the owners have equal control because such arrangements typically become bogged down in wrangling. "There has to be the lead dog," he said, "and someone has to give up control to make it work."

AOL, Microsoft Discussing Possible Internet Joint Venture (WP)

By David A. Vise, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

Microsoft Corp. is considering acquiring a stake in Time Warner Inc.'s America Online Inc. unit, one of a number of possible Internet joint ventures the two companies are discussing, people familiar with the talks said.

While no transaction is imminent, a broad range of options is under review, said sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because the talks are confidential. Those options include combining Microsoft's MSN online service with Dulles-based AOL, establishing a combined advertising sales force and enabling users of their separate instant messaging services to communicate with each other.

The talks, reported yesterday by the New York Post, are part of a broader set of discussions between Microsoft and Time Warner that began following an antitrust settlement between the companies two years ago. As part of that, the corporate giants have been working together closely on the development of digital rights technology that would enable computer users to download motion pictures for a fee.

The prospect of Microsoft acquiring a stake in AOL grew out of a Microsoft proposal earlier this year to make its MSN search engine the main search provider on AOL, replacing Google Inc. "Microsoft is looking to put more eyeballs in front of its search engine," said David Card, an analyst with Jupiter Research.

But AOL turned the offer down. Such a move would have given Microsoft the kind of clout it has been seeking in its fierce battle with fast-growing search engine leader Google, which earned more money from its partnership with AOL last year than from any other relationship.

After AOL rejected the MSN search proposal, the parties began examining other ways to combine forces online that would lead investors to assign greater value to their Internet operations.

"It is no big secret that Microsoft and Time Warner have gotten closer over the last couple of years," said Scott Kessler, an analyst with Standard & Poor's Corp. "The fact that there are these talks is not a surprise. The question ultimately would be how this would be structured, what the price would be and those types of things. A lot of folks observing this are taking a wait-and-see attitude."

DOJ_NMG_0006026

Google, which Wednesday raised more than $4 billion by selling fresh stock to the public, also reaffirmed its close ties to America Online. Google provides search and ads for AOL in the United States and Europe.

"Google and AOL have a healthy global partnership, and AOL remains a valued partner," Google spokesman Michael Mayzel said yesterday.

Officials from Microsoft and Time Warner declined to comment publicly on the prospects for a deal.

In its discussions with Microsoft, Time Warner has made it clear that it wants to continue to own a substantial chunk of AOL, sources said. America Online gives the New York-based media giant an Internet presence. AOL has roughly 20 million subscribers -- and generates a mountain of cash annually. Through the main AOL Internet service and other properties including Moviefone and MapQuest, the entire AOL network has a monthly audience of about 112 million computer users, according to ComScore Media Metrix.

One possible outcome would be for Time Warner and Microsoft to each own stakes in a combined AOL-MSN operation. In that event, sources said, Microsoft probably would also pay Time Warner cash, since AOL has a more robust business than MSN. Both sides are continuing to analyze exactly what businesses they might be willing to put into a combined operation and what each would seek from the other party.

The high-level discussions about a possible transaction have involved senior officials from Time Warner and Microsoft, as well as top executives of their respective AOL and MSN units. They are occurring against the backdrop of shareholder activist Carl C. Icahn pressing Time Warner to spin off its cable television division and take other steps to boost its flat stock price. But sources said the discussions predate Icahn's recent arrival on the scene and are part of Time Warner's continuing efforts to translate its far-flung media holdings, including Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc., People magazine and Home Box Office Inc., into a higher stock price.

Another possibility that has been discussed is putting AOL and MSN into a newly created entity that would sell stock to the public, with Time Warner and Microsoft continuing to be its major shareholders. This move would be aimed in part at ramping up the size of AOL and MSN to compete better with their larger rival, Yahoo Inc., and its 119 million unique users.

One source familiar with the talks said he considered a transaction combining AOL and MSN as complicated and a long shot. But he said that if the parties can figure out how to create more value by joining forces, a deal of some kind remains possible.

The main driver behind the discussions appears to be that AOL and MSN want to participate more fully in the growth in online advertising. "Google and Yahoo are growing faster in ad revenue than the other two," Jupiter's Card added.

ABN Stands Ready To Buy Antonveneta (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn In Rome And Edward Taylor In Frankfurt, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

ABN Amro Holding NV's tentative agreement to buy a 30% stake in Banca Antonveneta SpA from Banca Popolare Italiana Scarl after a bitter battle clears the path for the first-ever takeover of a large Italian bank by a foreign lender and could pave the way for more, a prospect that seemed remote just several weeks ago.

The sale, which values Antonveneta at €8.2 billion ($10 billion) and was agreed to late Wednesday, still faces legal and regulatory hurdles. It would give control of Antonveneta to ABN just two months after ABN's cash offer for the bank failed.

But a criminal probe involving BPI's bid dashed its takeover plans and raised serious questions about the role played by Italy's chief banking regulator, Bank of Italy governor Antonio Fazio. Evidence amassed by Italian prosecutors indicates that Mr. Fazio had a close relationship with BPI Chief Executive Gianpiero Fiorani and that the central banker acted to ensure that BPI's bid won regulatory approval.

If the Dutch bank wins control of Antonveneta, it would mark the first crack in a regulatory wall that has prevented foreign banks from taking over large Italian ones. ABN Amro has held stakes in Antonveneta and in another large Italian bank, Capitalia SpA, for years, but had been frustrated by its inability to gain control of either. Antonveneta, based in the wealthy northern city of Padua, would give ABN a broad new terrain for its retail operations.

ABN Amro's chief executive, Rijkman Groenink, will be under pressure to convince shareholders that acquiring Antonveneta is part of a cohesive growth strategy. In the past, some have criticized him for making scattershot acquisitions with no overall goal. ABN employs 98,000 people and operates in more than 60 countries, including a large presence in retail banking in the U.S. Midwest.

The Dutch bank is expected to offer €26.50 a share -- the same price it made in its failed public offer this summer, according to people familiar with the negotiations. The bank already has raised €2.5 billion to fund the Antonveneta transaction by issuing 135 million new shares. ABN Amro already held a roughly 30% stake in Antonveneta, and should the BPI sale go through, ABN would control more than half of Antonveneta's shares. Under Italian law, ABN Amro will have to launch another all-cash offer for the remaining shares once it receives regulatory approval.

"BPI has expressed its intention to sell their shares to us. We have the intention to buy that stake, although an agreement has yet to be signed," an ABN Amro spokesman said. BPI said in a statement that it wanted to complete the deal by Wednesday.

ABN Amro would be the first foreign bank to own more than 15% of the voting shares in a large Italian bank, a precedent that could see more foreigners seeking a greater presence in Italy, one of Europe's most fragmented banking markets, analysts say. European banks have long eyed the Italian banking sector, which is potentially lucrative because of the high fees banks charge their customers. In the 1990s, Deutsche Bank AG acquired a small local lender called Banca Popolare di Lecco.

"We will see more foreigners coming back to Italy," said Marcello Zanardo, an analyst with Keefe Bruyette & Woods.

There are many foreign banks with stakes that, in time, could be expanded to controlling positions. Spain's Banco Santander Central Hispano SA has an 8.5% stake in Turin-based Sanpaolo IMI. France's Crédit Agricole SA has a 17.8% stake in Banca Intesa SpA, and Germany's Commerzbank AG has a 2.8% stake in Intesa, as well. ABN Amro's success could also hasten consolidation among banks in Italy, said Mr. Zanardo.

Hurdles remain. Many Italian banks have shareholder pacts that lock up ownership and make hostile bids problematic. ABN Amro's bid, though among the most aggressive ever by Italian standards, was endorsed by Antonveneta's board.

This year, Spain's Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA launched a bid for Rome-based Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA, but was beaten back at the last minute by a counteroffer from midsize Italian insurer Unipol Assicurazioni SpA. BBVA complained that the Bank of Italy had thrown up obstacles to its bid, and prosecutors have been looking into that deal as well.

The climate for foreign banks remains highly uncertain, said Stefano Caselli, professor of banking and finance at Milan's Bocconi University. ABN's apparent victory came only as a result of an unusual investigation, not because of a change in the regulatory environment. "The whole regulatory framework is up in the air right now," Mr. Caselli said.

Mr. Fazio's alleged role in aiding BPI has prompted calls for his resignation, but he has clung to his post. Still, if another foreign bank were to try to buy an Italian lender, Mr. Fazio's actions would be watched closely.

The widening criminal probe left BPI with little choice but to sell out. Last month, a judge impounded BPI's stake after prosecutors alleged it acquired the shares improperly. Though BPI and allies held a majority of Antonveneta, the judge's ruling effectively froze BPI's plans.

Before the sale can be completed, a judge must formally unfreeze the BPI shares. In addition, both the Bank of Italy and Italian stock-market regulator Consob must void BPI's public offer for the bank. Before its board voted to back the stake sale, BPI held informal talks with both Consob and the Bank of Italy to ensure that the sale would be allowed to proceed.

Could Airlines Merge? Little Route Overlap For Delta, Northwest (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams, Usa Today

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines entered bankruptcy court together this week, and few will be surprised if they emerge together — as a single combined carrier.

The twin Chapter 11 bankruptcy filings Wednesday night, almost simultaneous and in the same New York courthouse, are leading many industry experts to believe the carriers may be exploring a merger within bankruptcy protection.

"I wouldn't be at all surprised," Benchmark analyst Helane Becker said Thursday. "In the past, these two airlines have talked and they have very little route overlap."

JPMorgan Chase analyst Jamie Baker said his firm "already has coined the term 'Delta Orient,' " a play on Northwest's former brand name, Northwest Orient.

Atlanta-based Delta is concentrated in the East and launches more daily flights across the Atlantic than any other carrier. Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest is concentrated in the Midwest and has a strong route structure in Asia.

The minimal route overlap is considered an advantage with federal regulators.

Airlines proposing a major merger would have to convince government regulators that the combination would not significantly reduce competition, or that one or both of the airlines would fail without the merger.

Northwest declined comment when asked about a merger with Delta. In a conference call Wednesday, Northwest CEO Doug Steenland said the timing and location of the filings was coincidental. He added he has long believed consolidation among airlines is likely.

Delta spokeswoman Chris Kelly said Delta "expects there will be more consolidation in the industry. Right now, Delta is focused on its own restructuring efforts."

The twin filings, outrageously high fuel prices and declining hope for financial relief from the government could spark a round of merger talks as the remaining big troubled airlines scramble for partners.

A judge today is expected to approve a merger between US Airways and America West Airlines. Five big potential partners remain: United Airlines, Delta and Northwest, all of which are now in bankruptcy protection, as well as American Airlines and Continental Airlines.

A merger of No. 3 Delta and No. 4 Northwest would propel the combined airline to the front of the industry pack. It would pass American and United and become the biggest airline in terms of revenue passenger miles, according to an analysis by Back Aviation Solutions.

Draft Legislation Aims To Aid Competition In Broadband Services (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

A key House committee released draft legislation yesterday requiring broadband providers to allow their subscribers to view any legal online content, a policy aimed at keeping big Internet companies from restricting access to competitors' Web offerings.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee draft is a victory for advocates of "net neutrality" -- the idea that Internet providers have to stand aside and allow customers to access any Web pages as long as the content is legal. The principle is considered crucial to preserving the open nature of the Internet and preventing big broadband providers from squeezing out smaller competitors that offer voice, video or other services.

Another provision in the proposed law also makes it easier for telephone companies to offer television over high-speed lines. It seeks to free cable and telephone companies from having to negotiate video franchises with numerous local authorities around the country, instead giving the Federal Communications Commission more authority over the process.

That would largely benefit the major telephone companies like Verizon Communications Inc., SBC Communications Corp. and BellSouth Corp., which hope to offer television over fiber-optic lines. Yesterday, officials at those companies reacted favorably to the legislation.

Other aspects of the draft legislation are aimed at making sure cable and telephone companies get equivalent regulatory treatment as they offer broadband Internet access.

The draft is a first salvo from the committee, which is led by Texas Republican Joe Barton, in what is likely to be a lengthy battle in Congress over any rewrite of the 1996 Telecommunications Act.

Kroes: EU Inquiry May Lead To Changes (AP)

By AOIFE WHITE, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0006029

Sep. 15, 2005 - A European Union antitrust inquiry into retail banking may lead to changes in the way European banks are regulated, EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Thursday.

She said an ongoing investigation may be widened to see how regulation affects customer choice.

"Do public rules that may have a legitimate objective end up making markets more rigid and limit competition and consumer choice?" she asked European regulators at a twice-yearly meeting in London. "We want government to protect the consumer, but we also need to protect the consumer from the government."

The EU launched its investigation earlier this year, saying it wanted to look at areas where it thought competition was not functioning as well as it might.

Kroes said it was hard for consumers to get clear comparative information about products to allow them to make informed choices.

The head of the Irish Competition Authority, John Fingleton, said a national investigation into problems in Ireland's banking sector showed that banks often had customers for life.

"No company ever wants to give their customers information that could help them switch," he said.

There was nothing illegal in banks or insurance companies dragging their heels when customers asked for information, he said. But such "perfectly rational competitive behavior" led to a static banking market with few new providers.

The Irish government has made changes to help customers change banks, although Fingleton said people were still slow to switch over.

Sir Callum McCarthy of Britain's Financial Services Authority warned that consumers' ability to make financial decisions is "too often inadequate" because of basic literacy and math problems.

"We live in a society where individuals are being asked to make more and more financial decisions, many of which were previously taken for us," he said.

Poor math skills pose a problem for regulators because they assume that consumers are able to make an informed choice, have access to information they can understand and are dealing with financial providers who behave responsibly.

"In the retail market for financial services, all three of these conditions pose problems, particularly for investment products," he said.

Financial companies sometimes feed the problem. McCarthy cited one example of jargon-filled mail to customers which told them about "negative retrospective augmentation."

DaimlerChrysler Wins Reduction In EU Antitrust Fine (Update3) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 16, 2005

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- A European Union court today annulled most of a 72 million-euro ($88 million) antitrust fine against DaimlerChrysler AG, ruling that the regulator was wrong to say the automaker broke EU law in Germany and Spain.

DaimlerChrysler, the world's fifth-largest carmaker, was fined in 2001 for breaking EU free-trade laws by instructing dealers in Spain, Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium not to sell to bargain hunters from other EU nations between 1985 and 1996.

The European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg cut the fine to 9.8 million euros, saying in a statement today that DaimlerChrysler acted ``unilaterally'' in Germany and therefore didn't break EU rules. In Spain, the automaker acted in line with national legislation, the court said. The tribunal upheld the EU's decision about the company's Belgian operations.

The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, has sought to bring down car prices by dissolving the exclusive ties between carmakers and dealerships. Starting in October 2002, the EU rules broke carmakers' lock on sales networks, permitting dealers to expand and sell different brands in the same showroom.

A spokeswoman for the Stuttgart, Germany-based automaker said today's decision showed that it had acted lawfully. The company may appeal the part of the ruling about Belgium, said the spokeswoman, who declined to be identified.

Appeal Considered

Either side of the case can appeal the judgment to the European Court of Justice, Europe's highest court. Such an appeal can only be made on points of law and not on the facts of the case.

``We will see over the course of the next two months whether there are points of law where we want to go to the Court of Justice," commission spokesman Jonathan Todd told reporters at a daily briefing in Brussels. The commission welcomed the Belgian part of the ruling and will ``very carefully" study the parts of its decision that were overturned, he said.

Former Competition Commissioner Mario Monti said that during the five-year investigation, DaimlerChrysler refuted initial suspicions that it had a ``general strategy" to interfere with trade across EU borders.

The commission said the decision was based on documents seized when the company's headquarters were raided in 1996, as well as subsidiaries in Spain, Belgium and the Netherlands.

The commission highlighted three sets of violations by DaimlerChrysler. The company told dealers to require non-Germans to put a 15 percent deposit on Mercedes-Benz cars bought in Germany. Germans were exempt from this practice.

DaimlerChrysler also restricted competition between its own leasing companies and independent leasing companies by refusing to sell cars to the independents until they had found customers.

The automaker also sold fewer cars to dealers in Belgium who wouldn't comply with an order to restrict rebates to no more than 3 percent of the purchase price, according to the commission.

The case is T-325/01 DaimlerChrysler AG v Commission.

EU Court Reduces Antitrust Fine Against DaimlerChrysler On Competition Rules (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - BRUSSELS, Belgium-The European Union's Court of Justice reduced an antitrust fine against automaker DaimlerChrysler AG on Thursday to â,¬9.8 million (US$12 million) from â,¬71.8 million (US$88.2 million), annulling a decision by EU regulators that it violated competition rules in Germany and Spain.

The EU judges, however, upheld a decision on DaimlerChrysler's conduct in Belgium, where they said the company participated "in an anti-price-slashing agreement with the Belgian dealers."

The European Commission found DaimlerChrysler guilty in 2001 of infringing EU rules by preventing cross-border sales of the Mercedes-Benz brand, restricting price competition between dealers.

The EU court said, however, that under EU competition rules DaimlerChrysler could not be found guilty in Germany because it acted alone there.

The Commission had considered German dealers independent. Under EU rules, two companies have to coordinate "anticompetitive conduct" for a cartel violation to occur, the court ruled.

The Court in this case scrapped the Commission's initial fine of â,¬47.025 million (US$57.9 million).

In Spain, the EU court said DaimlerChrysler followed local law by forcing leasers to link each car with a contracted customer. The Commission had argued that this prevented local dealers from stocking up on Mercedes vehicles and created an artificial shortage. But the court said the Spanish law was "not contrary" to any EU law and overturned the â,¬15 million (US$18.47 million) fine.

Thursday's ruling follows earlier EU court decisions to reduce fines against car companies. Volkswagen AG had its antitrust fine reduced in 2003, from more than â,¬100 million (US$123.14 million) to â,¬90 million (US$110.83 million).

The Commission overhauled its auto-market competition rules in 2002. Manufacturers no longer are allowed to force dealers to sell only one brand, and for the first time, they are able to sell cars outside their home country.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Spitzer's New Target: Tree-Eating Beetles (LAW/AP)

By Michael Gormley, The Associated Press

Law.com, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006031

Four states sued the Bush administration Thursday over an invasive, tree-eating beetle that has entered the U.S. as a stowaway on cargo ships.

The Asian long-horned beetle, along with the emerald ash borer and the pine shoot beetle, are the culprits named in the lawsuit by attorneys general from New York, California, Connecticut and Illinois.

The states are seeking a court order to require the Agriculture Department to examine more effective and less environmentally harmful ways to prevent the insects from entering the country, said New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

State officials say the insects would cause extensive economic and environmental damage if they move from cities like New York and Chicago to working forests.

The pests enter the country in wooden pallets and wood-based packaging. The state officials contend that federal officials use a "marginally effective" pesticide, which is being phased out under an international treaty as unsafe to humans.

Also, they said the USDA is following a new rule that requires wooden shipping pallets and other wood packaging material carrying imports to be treated with heat or sprayed with methyl bromide, a chemical the state officials say depletes the ozone and could be a cancer risk.

"It simply doesn't follow that USDA officials are proposing to ramp up its use, and endanger air quality and public health, especially when there are proven non-chemical alternatives," said California Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

One option would be to replace raw wood pallets with pallets made from plywood, processed wood or recycled plastic, a potentially expensive remedy.

The USDA is abiding by international treaties and is reviewing the lawsuit, said department spokeswoman Kristin Scuderi.

The Nuclear Waste Site In Utah (NYT)

While few people outside Utah were paying close attention last week, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission authorized the licensing of a private storage plant for spent nuclear fuel rods on an Indian reservation some 50 miles southwest of Salt Lake City. Utah's outraged political leaders pledged to use every legal and political trick available to block the project even though, as representatives of a very conservative state, they supposedly abhor bureaucratic or judicial interference with private corporate decisions. Their contention - that the storage site, backed by a consortium of eight utilities, would pose a safety hazard - seems overblown. If the project should clear all of the remaining regulatory, legal and commercial hurdles, it could provide a useful interim storage site while the nation seeks a more permanent burial site deep underground.

The government's long-term goal is to bury the waste in stable geologic formations that will be resistant to leaks for eons to come. Unfortunately, progress has been slow. The only site approved for evaluation - at Yucca Mountain in Nevada - has been hobbled by technical problems and legal challenges. Meanwhile, spent fuel rods have been piling up in cooling pools and in dry-storage casks at nuclear reactor sites around the country.

So far as is known, the used fuel rods can be left there safely for decades. But it becomes awkward and costly to guard and maintain the storage casks after the reactors themselves have been retired from service. Several reactors have already been shut down, and more are apt to follow. In some cases, the spent fuel rods sit on land that might have more valuable uses. Unless these used fuel rods can be sent to Yucca, a destination that has not yet been approved to receive them, it seems desirable to have a backup site.

The question of whether Utah is the best place for such a site has never been addressed. Private Fuel Storage, a company set up by the utilities, simply negotiated a deal with a small, poor Indian tribe, the Skull Valley Goshutes, for an undisclosed but presumably substantial amount of money. The site seems safe enough. The Atomic Safety and Licensing Board and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission - both charged with protecting the public from nuclear hazards - approved the project after an exhaustive eight-year process.

There are still hurdles to clear before the site can be developed. The state plans to appeal the decision in federal courts. It will also try to persuade the Bureau of Indian Affairs to withhold approval of the lease and will ask the Bureau of Land Management to deny a right of way needed for a rail spur to haul spent fuel to the site. So there is plenty of room for political interference should the Bush administration wish to do Utah a favor.

Meanwhile, Private Fuel Storage will need to sign up enough customers to make the project financially viable. Some utilities in the consortium are reported to be in no great rush to ship fuel rods to the site only to then ship them a second time, to Yucca.

We remain hopeful that Yucca can qualify as a permanent disposal site. But if Yucca fails to pass muster with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the nation will need a centralized surface site to fill the gap until a safe burial location can be found. The Indian reservation in Utah can fill that purpose.

Hearing on Indian Trust Judge Delayed (WP)

A federal appeals court panel has decided it will not hear arguments today about whether U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth has lost the appearance of impartiality in overseeing a lawsuit involving billions of dollars the government may owe Native Americans.

The appeals court panel was scheduled to consider another dispute in the case along with the government's unusual July request to remove Lamberth as the presiding judge. Lamberth has repeatedly ruled that the Interior Department has refused to properly account for property, rent and gas and oil royalties owed to Indians, a duty the government took on when it seized management of Indian lands more than a century ago.

But the three-judge panel issued an order late yesterday saying they will instead refer the issue of Lamberth's perceived fairness to a later panel of judges considering another appeal dispute in the case, Cobell v. Norton . That means that the Justice Department is not likely to hold a hearing on its complaints about the judge until spring, based on the appellate court's already full schedule this year.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Top Attorney To Admit Guilt In Pot Conspiracy (MH)

By JAY WEAVER

The Miami Herald, September 16, 2005

In February, federal agents rustled a prominent lawyer out of bed to bust him at his Miami Beach waterfront home.

Today, Samuel I. Burstyn is scheduled to plead guilty to scheming with his former clients to obstruct a federal grand jury's investigation into their drug-trafficking operation and himself.

Burstyn -- once a defense attorney in demand who counted bad Miami cops, tennis star Boris Becker's ex-wife and former Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega's right-hand man among his clients -- faces five years in prison.

He must forfeit about $200,000 and is expected to lose his law license.

U.S. District Judge William J. Zloch has insisted on a "full confession" from Burstyn at the Fort Lauderdale plea hearing, according to a court document filed Tuesday. Normally, federal judges leave it up to the defendant to decide whether to say anything at such hearings.

Burstyn's lawyer, Fred Haddad, and Assistant U.S. Attorney Brian McCormick declined to comment on Thursday.

Burstyn, 52, has been held without bond in the Miami Federal Detention Center since the morning of Feb. 23, when agents from the FBI, Internal Revenue and local law enforcement arrested him at his $4.5 million Miami Beach home on Sunset Island.

He pleaded not guilty to 12 counts of conspiracy, money laundering, obstruction of justice and making a false declaration to a federal grand jury. In his deal with prosecutors, he is expected to plead guilty to one count of conspiring to obstruct justice.

The other 11 counts would be dismissed.

McCormick and fellow prosecutor Michael Dittoe have said Burstyn acted as "house counsel" for marijuana smugglers Jeffrey Tobin, David Tobin and others.

Burstyn allegedly loaned money to a Tobin business associate, advised the Tobins to invest their drug proceeds into diamonds, instructed them to lie to the grand jury and, in one case, urged Jeffrey Tobin to flee from justice.

Prosecutors made their case against Burstyn by first targeting the Tobins, who eventually provided incriminating information about the lawyer in exchange for more lenient sentences.

In 2003, Burstyn allegedly contacted a business associate to help Jeffrey Tobin hide more than $600,000 in drug proceeds through the purchase of diamonds, according to the indictment. Tobin wired the money for the diamond purchase that October.

The following year, a Fort Lauderdale federal grand jury indicted the Tobin-led ring. David Tobin and others were arrested that January, but Jeffrey Tobin became a fugitive. FBI agents caught up with him in March 2004 in New York City, where Burstyn represented him at a bond hearing.

In less than a year, Burstyn was charged, along with the Tobin organization, with trying to obstruct justice. Prosecutors dubbed them the ``Enterprise."

Among the allegations: ``Burstyn would organize meetings with potential witnesses in order to convince them to provide false and misleading information to a federal grand jury and law enforcement officials."

Coast Guard Seizes Cocaine In Pacific (AP)

BOGOTA, Colombia - The U.S. Coast Guard, acting on Colombian intelligence, intercepted a ship towing an unmanned submarine-like vessel that held more than 2 tons of cocaine, Colombia's anti-narcotics police chief said Thursday.

The boat was raided Wednesday off the coast of the Ecuadorean-owned Galapagos Islands, Gen. Alberto Gomez told reporters. The underwater capsule, which was attached by a metal cable, was designed so smugglers could tow it below their boat and escape detection if drug agents searched the ship.

Although similar capsules have been seized in the past, Gomez said that increased vigilance in the Pacific has forced drug smugglers to come up with increasingly creative ways to hide their illegal shipments.

Separately, 2.5 tons of cocaine were discovered Wednesday hidden in the oil tanks of a ship docked in the Colombian Pacific port of Buenaventura, Adm. Jairo Pena, commander of Colombia's Pacific fleet, said in a statement. Eight suspects were arrested.

He said the cocaine was likely going to be taken to Central America from where it would be shipped on to the United States.

Colombia is the world's biggest produce of cocaine and a major supplier of heroin to the United States. The Colombian navy has this year seized a record 46 tons of cocaine.

Also Thursday, authorities seized $4.5 million worth of counterfeit American currency during a raid on a clandestine printing workshop in south Bogota, police said in a statement. The network had been sending the money to Ecuador and Venezuela, where the U.S. dollar is widely accepted as legal tender.

Police have so far this year seized $20 million in counterfeit bills, compared with a total of $7.4 million in 2004.

Plea Deal Goes Awry (PROJO)

By W. Zachary Malinowski And Mike Stanton, Journal Staff Writers

The Providence Journal, September 16, 2005

PROVIDENCE -- Mob associate Alan Blamires was set to plead guilty yesterday to charges that he guarded a large shipment of cocaine that was passing through Rhode Island last winter.

At least that's what the judge, prosecutor and Blamires' defense lawyer thought.

But in an unusual and unexpected development, the plea agreement fell apart. Blamires told Chief U.S. District Court Judge Ernest C. Torres that he was "fuzzy and blurry" from medication to control his violent tendencies and did not understand the charges against him.

Suddenly, Blamires blurted out, "I have pertinent information about Joseph Bevilacqua that I'm trying to get to the prosecutors."

Torres told him that he should talk to the prosecutors.

"They won't let me," said Blamires.

Torres canceled the hearing and put Blamires' case on the trial calendar for October.

Afterward, in the hallway outside the courtroom, First U.S. Attorney Kenneth P. Madden said that he would be willing to talk to Blamires, but he would have to plead guilty, first.

"I have no idea what he wants to say," Madden said.

Last Friday, Bevilacqua, a prominent defense lawyer from a politically influential family, was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison for lying about his role in providing a surveillance videotape to TV newsman Jim Taricani.

Taricani was ordered to serve a sentence of six months of home confinement for refusing to disclose Bevilacqua as his source.

Bevilacqua also has been the target of a Drug Enforcement Administration investigation. DEA agents have spoken to Courtney Calenda, an East Greenwich teenager, who has accused Bevilacqua of sexually assaulting her and supplying her with cocaine.

Last week, Calenda and her parents sued Bevilacqua in Kent County Superior Court.

In January, Blamires, 49, was arrested with mobster Matthew L. Guglielmetti and Anthony P. Moscarelli in an FBI sting operation. Guglielmetti reached an agreement with an undercover FBI agent that he would protect 67 kilograms of cocaine that was passing through Rhode Island.

Guglielmetti, who recently was sentenced to more than 11 years in federal prison for his role in the scheme, recruited Blamires and Moscarelli to guard the cocaine in a hotel.

Moscarelli also has pleaded guilty to criminal charges and is awaiting sentencing.

Yesterday, Madden detailed for the court Blamires' role in guarding the drug shipment, which was kept in a local hotel. The prosecutor said that the government was willing to request a shorter prison term -- still a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison -- based on Blamires' willingness to plead guilty and his "minor role" in the affair.

But when Torres quizzed Blamires about whether he was able to comprehend what he was admitting to, the defendant, who appeared disoriented, said that he couldn't, because of three different medications he was taking for "posttraumatic stress," a condition for which he has been treated at the Johnston Mental Health Center.

"It makes you fuzzy and blurry," he told Torres. "It doesn't make you sharp. They give [the medication] to me in the morning, so I don't get violent and worked up."

Blamires' lawyer, Richard K. Corley, then asked his client a series of questions in an effort to clear up the confusion.

That prompted an agitated Blamires, a large, burly man, to tell Corley: "You told me that all I was admitting to was that I went to a hotel room to guard something. That's the truth."

Madden told Torres, "I don't think the drugs are affecting him, but I think his view of how criminally culpable he is, is different from the government's."

Still, under the circumstances, Torres said that he had no choice but to refuse to allow Blamires to plead guilty.

After the hearing, marshals shackled Blamires with a chain around his waist, in addition to the usual handcuffs and leg irons. He quietly shuffled from the courtroom.

Local Men Plead Guilty (STANDEM)

Standard Democrat, September 16, 2005

CAPE GIRARDEAU - Two Southeast Missouri men entered guilty pleas on drug charges in federal court.

Adrian L. Lewis, 25, of Charleston pled guilty to one felony count of distribution of cocaine base and one felony count of distribution of five grams or more of cocaine base. He appeared before United States District Judge Charles A. Shaw.

With the plea, Lewis admitted that on July 10, 2002, and Dec. 16, 2002, he sold a total of 9.2 grams of “crack” cocaine to a Southeast Missouri Drug Task Force officer.

Lewis now faces a maximum punishment on count one of 20 years imprisonment and a $1,00,000 fine. He faces a maximum punishment on count two of 40 years in prison and a $2,000,000 fine. Sentencing is set for Nov. 21.

Joe Lenzie Turner, a Scott County resident, entered a plea of guilty to one felony count of distribution of cocaine base. He appeared before U.S. district Judge Charles A. Shaw on Tuesday.

Turner now faces a maximum of 40 years imprisonment and a $2,000,000 fine, followed by a period of supervised release of at least four years. Sentencing is set for Nov. 22, in Cape Girardeau.

With his plea, Turner admitted that on May 20, 2005, he distributed a substance containing base (also referred to as "crack") to a confidential informant. Specifically, Turner gave the informant 5.4 grams of cocaine base in exchange for $300. The sale occurred at a location on County Road 427 in Scott County.

United States Attorney, Catherine L. Hanaway commended the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Sikeston Department of Public Safety for their combined efforts to prosecute the case.

Meth Dealer Gets Prison Time (LYNNA)

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, September 16, 2005

Despite several tearful pleas from friends and family, a Lynchburg federal judge blasted a Rustburg man Thursday for his role in the selling of methamphetamines.

"You don't know how many lives were destroyed … Generations of others will be coming through this courtroom because of his actions. You're old and in pain. That's not an excuse," U.S. District Judge Norman K. Moon said.

Moon didn't believe Clayton "Sonny" Keyes' story that he only started using meth in 2001 because his back pain had become so painful, and that he began selling the drug only to support his addiction.

Keyes, 55, pleaded guilty in April 2004 to conspiracy to distribute more than 15 kilograms of methamphetamine and possession of a firearm. He has already served two years in jail since his arrest.

On Thursday, Moon gave Keyes nearly 10 additional years in prison, despite calling the prosecutor-recommended sentence "overly generous."

Moon agreed with prosecutors, describing Keyes' role in the drug ring as a leader, saying it was "absurd" to say Keyes was selling only enough to support his own needs.

"Very few drug dealers are making a profit while supporting their habit," he said.

Keyes is one of dozens of Central Virginians convicted after a three-year investigation by the FBI and Central Virginia Drug Task Force, which includes federal, state and local law enforcement officials.

The investigation has resulted in more than 30 arrests, nearly $4 million in court-imposed judgments and the seizure of large amounts of cash, drugs and firearms.

More than 20 friends and family members crowded into the courtroom Thursday morning. The room echoed with muffled cries and sniffles and people shook violently as they wept, including Keyes himself.

Witnesses repeatedly smiled at Keyes as they walked by, reaching for his hand and whispering, "I love you."

"He's a wonderful husband. He always took care of me," wife Rose Keyes testified.

Keyes' daughter called her father an inspiration who worked hard to make a life for his family.

Several people said Clayton Keyes was in constant pain after falling off a dock at work several years earlier and that, even with painkillers, the pain only worsened.

Keyes, his eyes puffy and red-rimmed from crying, sobbed as he read a prepared statement on the stand.

"In 2001, my brother gave me meth. He told me it would make me forget I had a back. He was right. For the first time in years, I didn't feel any pain," Keyes said.

"I had the energy to play with my grandkids. I liked to work on cars and I could do so for hours. It really was a miracle drug for me."

Keyes said he didn't realize what he had done until his arrest.

"Jail broke me down. I'm a broken man," he said. "If you give me 10 years (in prison), you give me a death sentence. I've seen what meth did to me and my family. I will do 100 years of probation. I will do a million years of community service. I will talk to others about this evil drug."

DOJ_NMG_0006036

Defense attorney Carter Garrett called his client "a pawn" in the conspiracy and told the judge Keyes got swept up in the drug use and was as much a victim as the people he sold to.

"He just lost his mind in his addiction. He's not a criminal at heart," Garrett said.

Garrett started to ask the judge how many drug dealers come into court at his client's age with no prior record and a 30-year marriage and having worked a steady job, but the judge cut him off.

"By far, more and more people. He's not the oldest to (come before me)," Moon said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim Heaphy said Keyes was fortunate to have such a supportive family, but that they only knew one side of Keyes.

He pointed out that in addition to methamphetamines, investigators found cocaine, 29 firearms, $60,000 in cash and a closed-circuit surveillance setup installed at Keyes' house.

"He was a significant methamphetamine trafficker in this area. He was a supervisor, a manager, who enriched himself by exploiting the weaknesses of others," Heaphy said, adding that Keyes received numerous meth packages from California suppliers at his house.

After court, Heaphy said the case was another example of the dangers that come with using meth.

"People who are upstanding and productive, it takes over their lives," he said. "People like Keyes, they take it a step further. They see the potential of making money and that's when we get involved."

Borderline Crime (MISSIND)

By Jessie McQuillan

Missoula Independent, September 16, 2005

Loretta Nall, founder of the U.S. Marijuana Party and Alabama gubernatorial candidate, collects donations at Missoula's Hempfest Sept. 10 in Caras Park. Nall, who spoke to the crowd about Marc Emery, a Canadian fighting extradition to the United States on marijuana charges, says the money will help fund Emery's legal defense. BC's Prince of Pot faces extradition

While 4,000 people gathered in Caras Park Sept. 10 to support industrial hemp at Missoula's Hempfest, worldwide Smoke Out America protests calling for an end to the U.S. drug war drew thousands more. One protest, at the U.S. Consulate in Vancouver, British Columbia, had special urgency and a special guest. Marc Emery, aka "the Prince of Pot" who founded the British Columbia Marijuana Party [BCMP] as well as Cannabis Culture magazine and Internet-based Pot TV, showed up to rally for his own cause.

At the request of the U.S. government, Emery and two of his employees—Greg Williams and Michelle Rainey-Fenkarek—were arrested July 29 by Canadian police on U.S. charges of conspiring to distribute marijuana and marijuana seeds and money laundering. The charges stem from Emery's marijuana seed-selling business, Mark Emery Direct Seeds, reputedly the world's largest marijuana seed business, which had been in business for nearly a decade. According to the Drug Enforcement Agency, an 18-month investigation traced Emery's seeds to busted growing operations in nine states, including Montana, and the charges seek to hold the defendants responsible for those plants. The process of extraditing the "B.C. Three" is underway and each of the three charges could carry penalties of 10 years to life in prison. While Emery and his lawyer, John Conroy, are hopeful they can fight extradition successfully, they're also nervous because Canada and the United States have a long history of granting one another's requests.

Still, many factors besides Emery's alleged crimes feed into the issue—Canadian sovereignty and political persecution, to name two. Although selling seeds is technically illegal in Canada, the government there has deliberately ignored Emery's business—and dozens of similar ones—for several years, Emery says. Since 1999 he's paid $578,000 in income taxes openly generated by the seed business, Emery claims, and the Canadian health department even referred medical marijuana patients seeking seeds to his website.

"I've been selling seeds untouched for seven years, every day of my life," says Emery, who's out on bail. "Seeds have become so acceptable here, and the last time anyone was fined it was like a $500 fine in 2000."

He says he was surprised to find that the charges came from the States. Emery hasn't left his home country in eight years because he knows the DEA might arrest him overseas, but he figured he was safe in Canada.

Conroy says the fact that Canadian citizens may be harshly punished for something their own government chooses to ignore irks Canadians. A poll by the Canadian newspaper Globe and Mail backs that claim, showing that a majority of Canadians oppose extraditing Emery, and their interviews reveal concerns about Canadian sovereignty as well as the disparity between how Canadians and Americans enforce and sentence marijuana crimes.

Conroy says the main argument in Emery's favor is that the U.S. prosecution is politically motivated. Though DEA agents paint Emery as a greedy drug trafficker, Emery says he's dedicated the last 15 years to the cause of marijuana legalization and has donated all business proceeds—$4 million—to the movement and its activists, both in Canada and the United States.

A statement issued by DEA Administrator Karen Tandy the day of Emery's arrest goes a long way toward showing the true aims of U.S. prosecutors, Emery and Conroy say.

"Today's DEA arrest of Marc Scott Emery, publisher of Cannabis Culture Magazine, and the founder of a marijuana legalization group, is a significant blow not only to the marijuana trafficking trade in the U.S. and Canada, but also to the marijuana legalization movement… Hundreds of thousands of dollars of Emery's illicit profits are known to have been channeled to marijuana legalization groups active in the United States and Canada. Drug legalization lobbyists now have one less pot of money to rely on," the statement reads.

"That's revealing," says Emery. "It mentions the movement in four places. The whole thing is about politics…There are dozens and dozens of seed distributors in Canada but I'm the only one who's a political activist."

Though the timing of Missoula's Hempfest in relation to Smoke Out America was a coincidence, according to organizer John Masterson, the Caras Park appearance of U.S. Marijuana Party founder Loretta Nall was not. Nall, who's worked with Emery, Cannabis Culture and Pot TV since 2002, spoke to the crowd about Emery's case and collected more than $200 in donations for his legal defense.

Kirk Tousaw, the BCMP general counsel who's coordinating Emery's legal team, says the extradition process will likely take at least two years, and both the British Columbia Supreme Court and Justice Minister Irwin Cotler would have to approve the surrender of the B.C. Three.

Cotler could deny approval if he believes the crime's potential punishments would "shock the conscience" or that the prosecution is politically motivated. In addition to the political persecution argument, Conroy will argue before the BC Supreme Court that the disparity between the countries' sentences is shocking: "In the States it's 10 to life without parole—up here it's a fine…The maximum for production up here is seven years for any amount," he says. "We got rid of a mandatory seven-year minimum for import/export because it was cruel and unusual."

Tousaw says both Canadians and Americans should call upon Cotler to deny extradition. Emery's first extradition hearing is Sept. 16.

"It is a unique situation in this sense: We're talking about nonviolent, nonharmful people who have not set foot in the U.S., whose alleged activities were conducted in the open for political reasons, and who were not impeded in any way by the Canadian government," Tousaw says.

US Takes The War On Drugs To Canada's Prince Of Pot (GUARD)

Guardian (UK), September 16, 2005

One of the world's leading cannabis legalisation campaigners, a magazine publisher known as the "Prince of Pot", faces an extradition hearing today in Vancouver as American drugs agencies seek to put him on trial in the US. His supporters claim the move is a first step by US authorities to prosecute foreigners who challenge the US laws on cannabis.

Marc Emery, publisher of Cannabis Culture, faces charges of trafficking in marijuana seeds and money laundering. His supporters have been demonstrating outside Canadian embassies in more than 30 countries during the past week to urge Canada's authorities not to yield to pressure from the US and hand him over, arguing he could face a lifetime in prison if they did so.

Article continues

A former bookseller, Mr Emery became a cannabis campaigner 15 years ago, angered by a ban on selling publications that promoted cannabis use. He has since become one of the best-known figures in the cannabis debate worldwide and operates the small television station Pot-TV. His magazine, Cannabis Culture, founded in 1994, promotes the sale of marijuana seeds.

Mr Emery has paid C$578,000 (£267,000) in personal taxes between 1999 to 2005 on income that was explicitly from the sale of such seeds. He describes himself on his tax returns as a marijuana seed vendor and sends a free copy of his magazine to every Canadian MP.

The main charges he would face in the US are for selling the seeds - considered international drug trafficking. Money laundering charges might be levelled because the profits he makes from the sales are used to promote the legalisation of cannabis.

"I have always been very, very transparent in the way I have conducted a career," Mr Emery said in a message posted about his arrest on his website. "I have often described [what I do] as 'revolutionary retail' or 'capitalist activism'." He suspected the US authorities wanted to make an example of him.

"If I were to be extradited and prosecuted in the US, [I would face] probably life imprisonment," he said. "Under 'Drug Kingpin' legislation, selling over 60,000 seeds qualifies for the death penalty. I would be the first person under this recent law who could qualify to be executed for the activity I have clearly done with the tacit approval of everyone in Canada."

When the US drug enforcement administration undercover agent "tried to get me to sell her 10lbs of pot over the phone, I refused and told her that I always assumed my cell phone was monitored, so how could she be so foolish and naive. When she asked again at a later time, I lectured her at length. Not only did I not sell pot, but she was foolish to even think about importing pot to the USA."

The US authorities say that the action is a joint venture with the Canadians.

United States Decertifies Venezuela As Ally In War On Drugs (TD/KRT)

By Steven Dudley And Pablo Bachelet

Tallahassee Democrat, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - President Bush has taken Venezuela off his list of allies in the war on drugs, saying that the government of President Hugo Chavez spurned anti-drug cooperation with U.S. officials and fired its effective law enforcement officers.

But the White House waived the cuts in U.S. foreign aid usually attached to the "decertification" so that it can continue to support Venezuelan pro-democracy groups that oppose the leftist Chavez.

Bush's decision is expected to sharply exacerbate already bitter U.S.-Venezuelan relations roiled by Washington's charges that Chavez is promoting subversion around the hemisphere and the Venezuelan president's allegations that Bush is out to kill him.

The U.S. State Department's No. 3 official, Nicholas Burns, announced the Bush administration decision Thursday in New York City around the time Chavez was arriving there for a U.N. summit gathering. The only other nation decertified this year was Myanmar, formerly known as Burma.

Accompanying Burns, U.S. drug czar John Walters said that in the past Venezuelan cooperation on drugs was "quite successful and extensive" but that now it seemed that Chavez "no longer wants a productive relationship."

Venezuelan Vice President Jose Vicente Rangel said of the annual certification process required by U.S. law, "We reject it. ... it's infantile."

The White House said Venezuela had "failed demonstrably" to stem the flow through its territory of some 150 tons of cocaine and growing amounts of heroin, mostly coming from neighboring Colombia and bound for U.S. and European streets.

Venezuela's national counternarcotics director, chief narcotics prosecutor and head of the financial intelligence unit "were fired and replaced with Chavez loyalists who lack the necessary training," the statement added.

Caracas had failed to eradicate coca and poppy fields near its border with Colombia, it continued, and did little to stop corruption in law enforcement and the military.

Only last month, Chavez ordered his government officials to stop cooperating with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), accusing it of espionage and drug trafficking. U.S. officials denied the charges, and the Venezuelan investigators continued to work with the DEA.

DEA's activities in Caracas turned particularly sensitive last year amid complaints that high-ranking officers of the Venezuelan National Guard are involved in a drug-trafficking "Sun Cartel" named after the sun insignia that Venezuelan generals use on their epaulets instead of stars.

Guard officers earlier this year withdrew from an anti-drug task force that included the DEA, and took thousands of dollars of U.S. donated surveillance equipment. The equipment was returned later at the behest of the government's principal anti-drug office, known as CONACUID. But then the head of CONACUID was fired.

The U.S. government later revoked the visas of three National Guard officers for suspected involvement in drug trafficking, including Gen. Frank Morgado, former head of the Guard's anti-drug unit.

Venezuelan Interior and Justice Minister Jesse Chacon earlier this week proposed formally renewing the partnership with the DEA, and presented a written proposal to the U.S. Embassy in Caracas. But he added that the new proposal, among other provisions, prohibits DEA agents from participating in police operations there.

The Bush administration has repeatedly expressed concern about the alleged deterioration of democratic institutions in Venezuela, citing Chavez's control of the judicial and electoral systems and threats to the independent news media. Chavez insists that he's carrying out a radical but peaceful revolution on behalf of the nation's poor.

The waiver of the decertification sanctions - officially for national security interests - will allow the U.S. government to support democratic institutions there and "strengthen Venezuela's political party system," the White House said. The two nations remain dependent on each other since Venezuela provides 12 to 15 percent of U.S. oil imports.

A State Department official said Venezuela's refusal to sign a bilateral data-sharing agreement has made it impossible for Washington to show Caracas evidence that an increasing number of aircraft suspected of carrying drugs were flying in and out of Venezuela.

Venezuela also has long banned U.S. anti-drug surveillance overflights of its territory and more recently curtailed military-to-military cooperation on drugs, the White House announcement stated.

In anticipation of the decertification decision, Chacon announced earlier this week that Venezuelan authorities had seized a record 18.7 tons of cocaine in the first eight months of 2005, compared with 19.6 tons throughout 2004. Failure to recognize the government's anti-drug efforts showed Washington was acting for political motives, he said.

But U.S. officials told The Herald in Caracas that Chacon's numbers were vastly exaggerated because they included at least four tons seized aboard Venezuelan ships - by French and Dutch authorities in the Caribbean.

Bush Assails Venezuelan Anti-drug Efforts (TSSC)

By George Gedda

The State (SC), September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - President Bush said Thursday that Venezuela "failed demonstrably" to make a concerted effort to block shipments of illicit narcotics to the United States and Europe last year.

The designation is certain to strain further U.S. relations with Venezuela's populist president, Hugo Chavez.

Venezuela could have been subjected to a cutoff of U.S. assistance, but Bush decided to waive the provision because of national security interests.

The United States has programs to support Venezuela's democratic institutions, establish community development projects and strengthen the country's political party system.

The administration decided not to cut these programs because they promote democracy in Venezuela, a key U.S. goal in a country where, officials say, the commitment to democratic norms has been eroding under Chavez.

Myanmar was the only other country listed as having failed to meet its obligations under international counternarcotics requirements. But it has received that same designation in previous years.

Chavez had no direct comment Thursday on Bush's action but used the occasion of his presence at the United Nations summit of world leaders to take a verbal swipe at Bush.

"Mr. Bush represents the most crude and savage imperialism that threatens the world," Chavez said.

A White House "statement of explanation" about Venezuela said 165 tons of cocaine moved through the country last year along with increasing quantities of heroin.

"Despite an increase in drug seizures during the past four years, it is our assessment that the government of Venezuela has not addressed the increasing use of Venezuelan territory to transport drugs to the United States," the statement said.

In early August, Chavez accused the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration of using its agents in Venezuela for espionage, and said Venezuela was suspending cooperation with the agency. The Bush administration denied the espionage charge.

Venezuelan Vice President Jose Vicente Rangel said Thursday that Venezuela "doesn't recognize" Washington's authority regarding drug classification, but remains willing to cooperate with the United States in fighting drug trafficking.

He said DEA agents would be welcome back in Venezuela under certain conditions.

Chavez claims that Venezuelan authorities have been very successful in detecting shipments of illegal drugs. He has said the United States, as the world's top consumer of drugs, does little to decrease consumption.

Bush's designation on Thursday adds to the growing list of issues between the United States and Venezuela. The administration is concerned about the close ties Venezuela maintains with Cuba and Chavez's perceived efforts to expand Venezuelan influence in other Latin American countries.

The administration also has strong doubts about whether Chavez will uphold Venezuela's tradition of free and fair elections.

Venezuela was included on a White House list, issued annually, of major drug transit or drug-producing countries. The others are Afghanistan, the Bahamas, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Jamaica, Laos, Mexico, Myanmar, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay and Peru.

U.S. law requires that the administration issue an annual list of countries with drug production or trafficking problems. Almost all the countries named this year are repeaters.

The designation is not necessarily an adverse reflection of a country's commitment to combat drugs.

Colombia has been the world's principal source of cocaine over the years, but the United States has consistently given high marks to President Alvaro Uribe for his counternarcotics efforts.

Program To Battle Colombian Drug Trafficking Gets Fresh Scrutiny (KRT)

By Shannon Mccaffrey

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

BOGOTA, Colombia - (KRT) - The six puppies looked fine at first. But when Colombian police gave them a closer look they found fresh scars on their bellies that told a different story.

The tiny Labradors and Rottweilers had been surgically converted into drug couriers: cut open with several plastic packets of heroin stitched into their abdomens.

Even the hardened Colombian police, who discovered the puppies at an abandoned house in a rural area outside of Medellin, had never seen anything like it. Traffickers were apparently going to ship the dogs to the United States saying they were pets. It's almost certain they would have been discarded as soon as their valuable cargo was removed.

"The better we get at catching them the more creative they get," said Mark Styron, supervisor of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Heroin Group in Bogota. "That's always the problem."

Much of the cocaine and heroin that ends up for sale on the street corners of the United States begins in the rich soil of this conflict-ridden South American country. And staying ahead of the smugglers is expensive. Since 2000, the United States has sent $4.5 billion to Colombia to help battle drug trafficking.

That six-year program, known as Plan Colombia, is set to expire at the end of this year.

Although the Bush administration and Congress have signaled a willingness to continue funding at current levels for at least another year, some are questioning whether the money has been effective in stemming the tide of drugs to the United States.

The Colombians point with pride to the hundreds of thousands of acres of coca and poppy fields they've destroyed and the tons of drugs seized at their airports and borders. Kidnappings and murders are down.

But a report from the United Nations showed that while coca cultivation in Colombia is down, it has risen in neighboring Peru and Bolivia.

And the efforts in Colombia seem to have had little measurable effect on the drug supply in the United States. The Justice Department's National Drug Threat Assessment for 2005 found that heroin and cocaine were still readily available throughout the United States. Data from the Drug Enforcement Administration shows that the purity of wholesale cocaine being smuggled in from South America has actually increased slightly.

But, at least with heroin, there is some evidence that a crackdown begun in 2002 is showing results. DEA tests show that purity has dipped 14.5 percent since 2000.

It is generally believed that if a drug is in short supply purity decreases, and prices increase.

Colombia remains the world's largest producer of cocaine and the nation's image remains closely linked to the drug.

Yet in America concern is running high about heroin. Although the opiate is not used with the frequency of cocaine or marijuana, it's highly addictive and leads to a disproportionately high number of overdoses and deaths, according to emergency room data.

Colombia produces only 2 percent of the world's heroin but it's generally believed to be among the best, often so pure that users can snort it, rather than injecting it. And almost all Colombian heroin flows into the United States. Ninety percent of the heroin on the East Coast is Colombian, according to the DEA.

The Justice Department reports that heroin use was up among American college students in 2003, the most recent year for which data was available, after several years of steady decline.

Evidence of the problem's reach came recently when a delegation of 10 American police officers arrived in Bogota to study the heroin problem at its source. The narcotics cops from Pennsylvania and Maryland are battling a rising heroin trade on the street corners at home.

They soon learned that, in Colombia, the war on drugs is not just a figure of speech. Hustling through Bogota in armored SUVs, they were surrounded by their Colombian counterparts, who cradled M-15s and dressed more like commandos than cops.

At a hospital in Bogota - set up by the government just for the nation's police - they met Carlos Mira. The 30-year-old had his leg shattered in an ambush by guerrillas armed with rifles and hand grenades. His doctors say he may never walk normally again. He's the lucky one. His partner was killed.

"Tell the Americans that this is what the drugs do," he said simply, no malice in his voice.

Fifteen Colombian police officers on patrol in a remote area near the border with Venezuela were killed by a bomb just days before the Americans arrived, bringing the total police deaths so far this year to 120. In the early 1990s some 600 police officers were killed each year by heavily armed guerrilla and paramilitary groups.

Plan Colombia was launched under the Clinton administration as a way to fight drugs. After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress said the funding could be used for counterterrorism as well.

In Colombia, the two are inseparable, officials say.

"The drugs are the terrorists' juice," said William Wood, U.S. ambassador to Colombia.

The drug pipeline to the United States often begins in the camps of the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia. Known the by its Spanish acronym, the FARC controls swaths of rural coca and poppy growing territory. Colombian police and intelligence officials say the FARC supports itself and its insurgency against the government with millions of dollars from the drug trade.

One FARC defector, "Jose," said in an interview with Knight Ridder that he abandoned the group because of its brutality. Leaders in his front ordered his brother to kill his girlfriend after she violated the rules and killed a civilian. Jose, who declined to use his real name out of fear of retaliation, said he grew up in the FARC, and that drugs were a constant presence.

"To end the drug war you have to end the guerrillas. As long as there are guerrillas there are drugs. They exist together," he said.

The FARC is believed to have recently executed 14 peasants who were growing coca and selling it to their right-wing paramilitary foes. The ongoing fighting in remote regions means that Colombia has the third highest number of displaced people in the world, trailing only the African nations of the Sudan and the Congo.

The Mineros Block of the United Self Defense Force - or AUC - a right-wing paramilitary group, is disbanding as part of an ongoing peace process with the government. That has helped drive down violence in Colombia.

But in Washington, some lawmakers are hesitant about funding demobilization efforts because of concerns that those who have committed human rights will escape punishment.

Everywhere in Colombia there is evidence of American money and influence: Blackhawk and Huey helicopters, twin-engine Otter police planes, fixed wing fumigation planes. At a rural training site southwest of Bogota, American Special Forces help the Colombians train for dangerous raids to destroy drug labs.

"It would be much worse without the U.S.," said Gen. Jorge Daniel Castro, chief of the Colombian National Police. "This is a long and difficult battle and the United States has been our strongest ally."

But over the last 10 years Colombia has lost 40 U.S.-supplied aircraft battling the FARC and AUC. The additional aid is needed to keep the fleet operating, the Colombians say.

Colombian and American officials agree that drug seizures reached record levels last year and the eradication of coca and poppy plants through herbicide spraying is at an all-time high.

Col. Jamil Moreno, who heads up tactical anti-drug operations for the Colombian National Police, said poppy plants, in particular, are difficult to spray because they are able to grow at high elevations, nestled into the sides of mountains. Moreno said police pilots have sustained bullet holes to the canopies on top of their planes.

"The guerrillas are above us on the mountains. It is very dangerous," he said.

Moreno's experience fighting poppy crops in Colombia has put him in demand. Negotiations are underway to have the Colombian travel to Afghanistan to help develop a strategy for battling poppy crops there.

U.S. Ambassador Wood said that more people die every year in the United States from Colombian drugs than in the Sept. 11 attacks. U.S. aid will eventually decline as the situation stabilizes, he said. But the drug problem will never go away entirely and the United States - as the primary consumer of American drugs - will likely always have a role in Colombia.

"It's like asking when is crime over. It's never going to be over," Wood said.

Still the continuing costs of the war in Iraq and the huge budget deficit have caused the aid to Colombia to come under more than the usual scrutiny this year. And the foreign policy landscape has changed since the Sept. 11 attacks so that the Middle East has consumed most of America's attention.

A telling symbol of that comes in real estate. The fortresslike U.S. Embassy in Bogota is the largest in the world. But it will eventually be surpassed by an even more massive new facility planned for Iraq.

The 'Good Death' Dilemma (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

BABY BOOMERS FACING THEIR OWN mortality have pushed issues of aging and dying into the public eye. As with so many boomer issues, there's a certain self-centeredness to attempts at control of the most uncontrollable human event, but at least issues of infirmity and the end of life are no longer whispered, as "the C-word" — cancer — used to be. Among the demands being raised is better control of pain, which has caught doctors between a desire to alleviate suffering and the U.S. war on drugs.

A corollary and less-visible policy struggle goes on very close to death, when the opiates that relieve suffering are also likely to hasten dying. A doctor in Redlands who used a very high dose of morphine on a dying patient and may now lose his medical license is merely the latest example.

Most such cases fall in a gray area, involving doctors who may have crossed a legal or ethical line, whether out of compassion or greed. The larger problem is the message that all doctors receive from aggressive efforts to curb opiate abuse, and their resulting reluctance to sufficiently treat severe pain and other suffering.

In Redlands, Dr. Harold Luke's terminally ill 76-year-old patient died soon after getting a very high dose of morphine in 2002. The state medical board last month voted to strip Luke of his license, and his final appeal is likely to be decided today. The patient's family still stands strongly by the doctor, as does a patient advocacy group that is supporting his appeal.

Luke's case hinges on whether he deliberately shortened the patient's life in an act of euthanasia. If he did, which he strongly denies, he would not be the only doctor to have done so. A 1998 mail survey of U.S. doctors in specialties in which patients would be most likely to request euthanasia found 11% willing to provide it. A 1997 survey found similar numbers among critical-care nurses. A report on a similar survey in Australia aptly described the more usual situation: "Doctors sometimes give large doses of potentially lethal drugs to terminally ill patients to treat symptoms, foreseeing but not necessarily intending a medically hastened death."

Federal criminal prosecutions have usually involved a different issue — charging pain management specialists, who often handle very tough cases, with overprescription or outright sale of controlled drugs, including the widely abused OxyContin. Again, most such cases are far from clear-cut, except perhaps in the eyes of federal prosecutors.

The debate over what constitutes a "good death" is ever more public. What hasn't kept pace is government drug policy and honesty about the blurred line between compassionate treatment and medical euthanasia.

Carpenter Smiles His Way To Federal Detention For Pipe Bomb Possession (RRDH)

Roanoke Rapids (NC) Daily Herald, September 16, 2005

JACKSON - Hamming it up for the camera, Michael Thomas Carpenter was taken into federal custody Tuesday for possessing pipe bombs and a cache of guns in his house outside Garysburg.

Led to a blue Ford Expedition by an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the 34-year-old, upon seeing a photographer, exclaimed, "What a wonderful justice system we have in America."

He asked the agent escorting him if he would slow down so he could pose for the camera and at one point gave a cheesy grin.

Asked if he was surprised to be federally charged for having three pipe bombs, Carpenter said, "No, sir. The feds have to do their jobs so we're going to go with them as calmly and peacefully as we can. God bless America."

Since his arrest on local charges in July, Carpenter was being held in the Northampton County Jail for possession with intent to sell and deliver marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia and possession of a weapon of mass destruction.

Capt. George Reed of the Northampton County Sheriff's Office said Carpenter was trying to run the jail while he was there, first being held on $525,000 bond for the local charges and then under no bond on a federal detainer.

ATF agents Tuesday took Carpenter to Greenville, where he would appear before a federal magistrate.

ATF charged Carpenter with possession of a destructive device and possession of firearms by a convicted felon. The federal agents said anyone in possession of explosive weapons must have them registered. The three pipe bombs State Bureau of Investigation agents detonated behind Carpenter's house off Taylor Road in July were not registered.

Officers also found some 25 rifles and shotguns and five handguns in the residence, one of the loaded weapons was found in a baby crib.

The pipe bombs were discovered while local officers were looking for marijuana plants at Carpenter's residence.

Federal agents Tuesday said they had uncovered no other reason why Carpenter had the pipe bombs than the reason he gave in July. Carpenter told the Daily Herald when he was arrested July 12 that he had used pipe bombs in Edenton to blow up beaver dams.

Reed said local charges against Carpenter were dropped in lieu of the federal charges.

Soldiers, ATF Find 'explosives' In Deserted New Orleans Home (AP)

By MARY FOSTER, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - National guardsmen and ATF agents patrolling the dark, deserted streets of New Orleans early Thursday found what appeared to be a bomb inside one of the homes vacated when Hurricane Katrina ripped through the city.

DOJ_NMG_0006044

The guardsmen found what looked like six sticks of dynamite and a detonator along with a bag of ammunition and marijuana. They notified the New Orleans Police Department which, in turn, asked the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to respond because their own bomb squad equipment was flooded in the wake of the storm.

"It had all the characteristics of a real device," ATF explosives specialist Johnnie Green said of the suspect device.

His agents placed an "interrupter" device on the one in question to try to detonate it and found out it was a hoax. "It was a good one," Green said, "especially in these conditions," referring to the blacked-out street.

The guardsmen were in the neighborhood as part of a routine security sweep and noticed a house with an open door. When they went inside to check it out, they found what looked like a bomb.

Todd Morrell of the New Orleans Police Department said the questionable device was found on a shelf in a bedroom. "It looked real to everybody," he said. "It was real enough for us to not want to mess with it."

Charlie Smith, an ATF special response supervisor, said finding the device should serve as a "wake-up call for every guy going through these houses."

Earlier in the week, he said they found a house with nine devices, 50 guns and a photo of the owner wearing a German uniform and Hitler-type mustache. "He evidently was a collector. He had a ton of stuff," Smith said.

MIAMI — Nine federal inmates and two U.S. Marshals were taken to area hospitals Thursday after their van was forced off Interstate 95 and rolled at least twice — an incident allegedly caused by a hit-and-run driver.

Marshals were taking the inmates southbound on I-95, from the federal courthouse in Fort Lauderdale to a federal detention center in Miami when a vehicle hit a Geo Tracker, said U.S. Marshals Service spokesman Barry Golden.

The Geo spun out of control, hitting the Marshals' van and forcing it off the road. No one inside the van was critically injured, although one inmate was hurt more seriously than the others, Golden said.

Golden said security was never an issue.

"All the prisoners were leg-shackled with waist chains, and handcuffed," he said.

There were no escapes, Golden said no description of the vehicle that struck the Geo was available.

IMMIGRATION:

ICE Pick's Ability To Do Job Doubted (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Senators yesterday told the president's choice to lead immigration law enforcement that they still are weighing a plan to reorganize her agency -- and one Republican expressed doubt that she was qualified for the job.

Julie Myers was nominated by President Bush to head Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the agency that is charged with hunting down money launderers, sanctions busters and human traffickers and that is the sole enforcer of U.S. immigration laws.

Yesterday, she faced a confirmation hearing before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs.

"I'm really concerned about your management experience," Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, told her, pointing out that ICE, with 20,000 employees, is the second-largest investigative agency in the federal government.

"I think that we ought to have a meeting with [Homeland Security Secretary] Mike Chertoff ... to ask him ... why he thinks you're qualified for the job," Mr. Voinovich said. "Because based on your resume, I don't think you are."

Miss Myers has worked as an assistant U.S. attorney in Brooklyn on money laundering and export control issues at the Departments of Treasury and Commerce, and was chief of staff for Mr. Chertoff when he ran the Criminal Division at the Department of Justice.

Miss Myers said her experience "will serve me well." She said she had worked with agents who once were part of the Customs Service and the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Parts of those agencies were melded into ICE with the formation of the Department of Homeland Security in March 2003.

Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican, raised the issue of merging ICE with another agency founded from the breakup of the Customs Service and INS -- Customs and Border Protection (CPB), which polices the nation's ports of entry.

Mrs. Collins said a report by the department's inspector general, which the committee commissioned last year and which would be "released shortly," would "recommend the merger."

"What I have found," she said at the hearing, "and the [inspector general's] report confirms, is that many field employees of the two agencies are very frustrated at what they see as the unnatural separation between the two organizations."

TAX:

Tax Inquiry Is Moving Past KPMG (NYT)

By LYNNLEY BROWNING

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Ever since the accounting firm KPMG reached a $456 million settlement of a federal investigation into abusive tax shelters nearly three weeks ago, the question has been who may be next.

Federal prosecutors have said that their criminal investigation is widening, and attention is increasingly turning to the role played by banks, financial advisers and law firms that worked with KPMG and other accounting firms to create and sell such shelters.

Among those companies, Deutsche Bank in particular has been a target of lawsuits from wealthy investors who sought to shield millions of dollars from taxes and bought shelters that did not pass muster with the Internal Revenue Service.

Senate investigators have previously criticized the role of Deutsche Bank and other banks in making the loans and handling the currency trades and other transactions that made up the abusive shelters, saying that senior executives and managers at the banks knew the shelters were improper.

Now, a barely noticed lawsuit indicates that Deutsche Bank had a much deeper involvement in creating and helping to sell a questionable tax shelter known as Cobra, for "currency options bring reward alternatives."

The lawsuit, filed by 12 wealthy investors in a Texas state court in Fort Worth, contends that in late 1999 at least one Deutsche Bank employee contacted the law firm of Jenkens & Gilchrist about creating a highly aggressive tax shelter using options on foreign currencies.

The shelter, which later acquired the Cobra name, was never considered valid for deductions by the I.R.S., which issued several warnings to investors in 1999 as it became aware of its use. The agency formally banned it in fall 2000.

Many accounting firms sold similar questionable shelters in the late 1990's and early 2000. The Cobra at the heart of the Texas state lawsuit was sold by the accounting firm Ernst & Young, which had already been developing a similar shelter through an internal unit called Viper, for "value ideas produce extraordinary results." Viper was responsible for marketing aggressive tax shelters, including Cobra, to wealthy individuals who were clients of Ernst & Young, the complaint says.

Ernst & Young declined to comment on the lawsuit but said that Viper was not dissolved until early 2003. Last year, the firm said that federal prosecutors were investigating tax shelters it had promoted and that it was cooperating with the inquiry. In 2003, Ernst & Young reached a $15 million settlement with the Internal Revenue Service over its shelters. It says that it has stopped selling the shelters that the I.R.S. considers abusive.

Around 1,200 investors who bought Cobra and other similar shelters have come forward under a settlement offer with the I.R.S. and paid more than $3.7 billion in back taxes, interest and penalties.

The lead plaintiff in the Texas lawsuit, which names Deutsche Bank as a defendant, is Henry N. Camferdam Jr., an Indiana businessman who has been a vocal critic of the accounting, law and financial firms that he contends created and knowingly sold him a bogus shelter in 1999.

The amended complaint, filed by Mr. Camferdam and 11 other wealthy investors on July 1, contends that fraud and breach of fiduciary duty occurred, and it seeks a jury trial.

There is no public indication that Deutsche Bank is a subject of the federal investigation. But prosecutors have told defense lawyers for eight former KPMG partners and a lawyer who have all been indicted that they have gathered about 300 boxes of documents from different firms, including Deutsche Bank, in the course of their investigation.

In connection with two other KPMG tax shelters, Opis and Blips, Deutsche Bank has said it did nothing improper and only carried out ordinary and routine, if complex and arcane, financial transactions for investors in those shelters. Blips and Opis are similar to the Cobra shelter at the heart of the Texas lawsuit.

But David Deary, a lawyer in Dallas who filed the complaint on behalf of Mr. Camferdam, said that those and other roles played by the bank, including setting up trading accounts, meant that "Deutsche Bank was extremely involved in every aspect of designing and implementing this tax shelter."

The allegations in the Texas lawsuit, if proved in court, suggest that Deutsche Bank could be shown to be a promoter of abusive tax shelters, which could subject it to fines and discipline from federal regulators.

Scott Schumacher, an assistant professor of tax law at the University of Washington school of law and a former trial lawyer in the criminal tax division of the Justice Department, said that in carrying out financial transactions for tax shelters, "if Deutsche Bank knew that it was bogus and what they were doing was aiding and abetting tax evasion, then they're potentially part of the conspiracy."

A spokeswoman for Deutsche Bank declined to comment yesterday on the allegations in the Texas lawsuit or on the wider federal investigation.

According to the Texas lawsuit, Mr. Camferdam bought a Cobra from Ernst & Young, his longtime accountants, in 1999, after he was told that the shelter would legitimately shelter about $70 million in income from taxes. The shelter, which cost him around $7 million in fees, did not pass muster with the I.R.S., which later sought millions of dollars in back taxes plus penalties and interest from Mr. Camferdam.

The lawsuit contends that a Deutsche Bank foreign-exchange salesman based in New York, Dan Brooks, approached a lawyer at Jenkens & Gilchrist in Chicago in the fall of 1999. Mr. Brooks flew to Chicago to explain to the senior Jenkens tax lawyer, Paul Daugerdas, complex options strategies that Deutsche Bank had developed.

According to the complaint, Mr. Brooks told Mr. Daugerdas that Deutsche Bank "had significant experience designing and implementing" such strategies, which lie at the heart of Cobra, and that "Deutsche Bank had a strong desire to design and implement a tax shelter with Jenkens using foreign currency digital options."

Mr. Daugerdas already had a close link to Deutsche Bank. David Parse, a broker-dealer with Deutsche Bank based in Chicago, was his personal stockbroker, according to the complaint, and personally requested that Mr. Brooks make the trip.

The complaint also contends that in November 1999 Mr. Parse asked Mr. Daugerdas to e-mail to an unidentified client of Deutsche Bank a legal opinion blessing Cobra and a contract for the tax shelter - moves that might appear to put the bank in the role of a promoter of questionable tax shelters.

Within Deutsche Bank there were even "turf battles" over which brokers would carry out trades for the shelters, with the brokers competing for bonuses stemming from the trades, according to the complaint.

Mr. Brooks, who left Deutsche Bank in spring 2001 to form his own trading firm and who has no training in tax or accounting matters, declined to comment.

A spokesman for Jenkens declined to comment yesterday on behalf of the firm and Mr. Daugerdas.

Ernst & Young and Jenkens & Gilchrist are not defendants in the lawsuit because the investors are in arbitration with the two firms. Another law firm, the former Brown & Wood, which is accused of issuing boilerplate opinion letters that blessed the validity of Cobra, is a defendant, as is a former lawyer there, Raymond J. Ruble, who is among nine individuals indicted in the KPMG case.

A third law firm, Scheef & Stone of Dallas, is a defendant, with the complaint stating that it introduced Ernst & Young to Jenkens & Gilchrist when the accounting firm wanted legal opinions for Cobra, earning fees for its referrals that were not disclosed to investors.

John Scheef, a lawyer at Scheef & Stone, said yesterday that there was nothing improper about its referrals. Calls to the former Brown & Wood, now Sidley Austin Brown & Wood, were not returned. A lawyer for Mr. Ruble declined to comment.

Mr. Camferdam has also sued Deutsche Bank and Ernst & Young in other courts, and has simultaneously challenged the I.R.S.'s determination that his Cobra shelter was invalid.

While that move has led some tax lawyers to suggest that Mr. Camferdam knew what he was doing when he bought Cobra, Mr. Camferdam said that he thought Cobra was valid. "I wouldn't have bought it otherwise," he said.

His most recent lawsuit cites transcripts of conversations and internal e-mail among Ernst & Young executives. The lawsuit says that several Ernst & Young tax experts raised doubts about the validity of Cobra in fall 1999, at the time that the firm greatly relaxed the standards it had been using to approve of tax shelters before offering them for sale.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Pledges To Be Chief Justice Who Respects The Law, Not An Ideologue (NSDY/AP)

The Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Chief Justice nominee John Roberts wound up two days of sometimes-contentious Senate testimony Thursday by telling wary Democrats that ideologues don't belong on the Supreme Court. He said his record shows he will rely on the law, not personal views.

Persistent grilling by Democrats on the Judiciary Committee made no apparent inroads in Roberts' support among the Senate's majority Republicans, who plan to vote the week after next to make him the nation's 17th chief justice.

Roberts tried to reassure Democrats that he would use the "rule of law," not his personal beliefs, to judge cases that come before the high court.

"I think if you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath, that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," Roberts said after an impassioned plea by Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California and Charles Schumer of New York for him to explain what kind of chief justice he would be. As for ideologues, he said, "you and I agree that that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

Roberts pointed to his two-year record as a federal appeals court judge in Washington and said, "Look at my briefs and you'll conclude that's a person who respects the law."

Roberts cleared one of his last hurdles when committee chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and top Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont announced that an FBI background check had found nothing that would disqualify. The American Bar Association also confirmed its "well-qualifed" rating.

Republicans were confident that Roberts would win the committee's majority approval next week and then Senate confirmation, with the backing of some moderate Democrats, before the Supreme Court term begins Oct. 3.

Committee Democrats have yet to commit to vote for Roberts, but they know they cannot stop him and President Bush will soon follow with yet another nomination to the court.

"It's going to take some time of real careful thinking about what to do" on the vote, Schumer said after the hearing.

Bush selected Roberts to succeed the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist as chief justice. The conservative judge could, at age 50, shape the high court for at least a generation.

The vote to confirm him "isn't just rolling the dice it's betting the whole house," Schumer said.

"I don't know what I'm going to do," said Feinstein, who said his testimony showed "this very cautious, very precise man, young, obviously with staying power. ... I'm convinced you will be there, God willing, for 40 years. And that even concerns me more because it means that my vote means more."

Feinstein voted to confirm Roberts for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; Schumer voted against him.

Frustrated Democrats tried to elicit a sense of John Roberts the man rather than the judge who was a political appointee in the Reagan and first Bush administrations and a multimillion-dollar lawyer in private practice

Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., wondered whether Roberts would treat society's less fortunate the same way he would deal with the wealthy who often have better lawyers, better legal briefs and an advantage in the court system.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, then the little guy's going to win in the court before me," Roberts said. "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well then the big guy's going to win because my obligation is to the Constitution."

Schumer questioned whether Roberts would be "a truly modest, temperate, careful judge," one "who will impede congressional prerogatives but does not use the bench to remake society," or, as some Democrats fear, one who "will use your enormous talents to use the court to turn back a near century of progress."

Democrats have complained that Roberts avoided many of their questions by saying he couldn't comment on issues that could come before the Supreme Court.

Early on in his third -- and abbreviated -- day of testimony, Roberts said Congress has the authority to pass laws barring discrimination based on race, gender and disability, and he defended his record on minority issues.

He said he had argued cases in favor of and against affirmative action and noted that he had participated in a program to assist minority students considering law school.

"Yes, I was in an administration that was opposed to quotas," Roberts told Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass. "Opposition to quotas is not the same thing as opposition to affirmative action."

Several Democrats have criticized Roberts for assailing the Supreme Court's 5-4 ruling in Plyler v. Doe, which struck down a Texas law and said the state had to provide free public education to illegal immigrant children.

Roberts, then working for the Reagan administration, criticized the ruling and argued that the administration should have gotten involved in the case.

Feinstein asked if Roberts, as a person, believed illegal immigrant children should be educated. Roberts offered legal responses, before saying, "My own view, every child should be educated."

As chief justice, Roberts would assign the writing of opinions in which he was with the majority. He could keep the best cases for himself, or dole them out to other justices.

Rehnquist's predecessor, Warren Burger has been accused of being manipulative in the assigning of opinions, even joining the majority, though he disagreed, so he could assign the opinion to himself and try to limit the outcome.

Roberts rejected the idea of assigning himself cases as a strategic move.

"Trying to use that assignment power in a tactical way -- it causes tension on the court and I think undermines the ability of the chief justice -- to the extent he has that ability, and it's obviously limited -- to act as a force to help bring about some cohesiveness and collegiality," he said.

With Roberts Hearings Complete, Democrats Wrestle With Their Votes (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - His grilling over, Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. now waits for the Senate to render its verdict.

His performance during four days before the Senate Judiciary Committee wowed even many Democrats, who conceded they were torn between admiration for his intellect and his modest judicial demeanor versus his reluctance to reveal more about his views on legal issues.

In his final day of taking questions, Roberts tried to assure senators that he isn't an ideologue, describing himself instead as a strict follower of the "rule of law." He said his work as a lawyer had made him an advocate of the law no matter the cause.

He admitted, for instance, that while he helped a gay-rights group prepare for a Supreme Court case, he would just as easily have agreed to argue the opposing side.

"To some, they may say, well, that sounds like you're a hired gun," he said. "I think that's a disparaging way to capture what is, in fact, an ennobling truth about our legal system, that lawyers serve the rule of law above and beyond representing particular clients."

Republican strategists predicted a near straight party-line vote next week in the Republican-run committee, which includes some of the Senate's most liberal and most conservative members. But even there, some Democrats were struggling with their votes.

"I don't really know what I'm going to do," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "You've gone through this in a remarkable way. I'm convinced you will be there, God willing, for 40 years. And that even concerns me more, because it means that my vote means more."

In the full Senate, signs emerged of bipartisan support for Roberts, especially from so-called "red-state Democrats."

"If you look at his performance, his education, his attainments, that is the kind of person who has the quality to be in the Supreme Court," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., whose state voted 63 percent for President Bush last year. Conrad faces re-election next year. "This man has a mind like a jewel."

Even Roberts' most ardent opponents, such as Nan Aron of the liberal Alliance for Justice, acknowledged that he didn't seem cast from the strict-constructionist mold of Justice Antonin Scalia.

There's little question that Roberts, boosted by an unflappable presentation before the committee, will be confirmed to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist. The issue is whether the Senate will confirm Roberts by an overwhelming margin, as it did Scalia in 1986 and liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg in 1993, or whether the vote will split along party lines.

While Roberts would become chief justice whether the vote is 100-0 or 51-49, the margin could be an important benchmark when Bush nominates a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

All 55 Republicans are expected to support Roberts. Some Democrats say a close vote would signal Bush that a more conservative nominee would face a more difficult time. Others say a bipartisan vote would free Democrats from an obstructionist label and make it easier for them to stand against a more conservative replacement for O'Connor.

"What kind of justice will John Roberts be?" Schumer mused aloud. "Will you be a truly modest, temperate, careful judge? ... Will you be a very conservative judge who will impede congressional prerogatives but does not use the bench to remake society, like Justice Rehnquist? Or will you use your enormous talents to use the court to turn back a near-century of progress and create the majority that Justices Scalia and (Clarence) Thomas could not achieve?

"That's the question that we on the committee will have to grapple with this week."

Roberts Gains Respect, If Not Converts (LAT)

By David G. Savage And Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — "I'm not an ideologue," John G. Roberts Jr. told the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday. And with that comment, he aptly summarized the case he made for himself during four days of hearings on his nomination as the Supreme Court's chief justice.

Based on his self-portrait, the Roberts court would not be the place where those in search of new legal rights and protections would find them. Nor, however, would the high court under his leadership press a conservative counter-revolution.

Roberts, in short, presented himself as a mainstream conservative, not a right-wing activist who was eager to roll back the liberal decisions of decades past on civil rights, women's rights and the environment.

He said he was devoted to precedent and stability in the law, even if that meant upholding rulings he may have disagreed with years ago.

He said he aspired to be a "modest" judge, someone who followed the law and did not promote a political agenda.

Thursday, the committee intends to vote on whether to recommend Roberts' confirmation. Its recommendation is virtually assured because Republicans hold a 10-8 advantage on the panel.

He then likely will be confirmed by the GOP-controlled Senate, perhaps during the last week of September.

DOJ_NMG_0006050

In his testimony, Roberts distanced himself from the "originalist" approach followed by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, which looks back to the history of the 18th century to decide the meaning of the Constitution. Roberts said he believed the guarantees of liberty and equal protection should be interpreted broadly in light of modern times and changing conditions.

And when asked about the president's power — a concern voiced by liberals troubled by the bold moves of the Bush White House — Roberts repeatedly invoked the 20th century's most important ruling limiting the chief executive — the 1952 case involving Harry S. Truman's seizure of the steel mills during the Korean War.

His words reassured some listeners.

"What we learned generally about him is that, taken at his word, he is not somebody who is going to be a revolutionary on the bench, which I find comforting," said Douglas T. Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel, a law firm that specializes in environmental cases.

Roberts' confident performance during this week's hearings certainly did not undercut his cause. His calm manner and encyclopedic grasp of the law won him bipartisan praise.

"You have an amazing knowledge of the law," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) told him. "You may very well possess the most powerful intellect of any person to come before the Senate" for confirmation to the Supreme Court.

Schumer and other Democrats, however, voiced concerns about Roberts' heart.

Roberts refused their repeated invitations to characterize himself as a big-hearted judge who would give the benefit of the doubt to minorities or the poor. Instead, he said his duty was follow the law as he saw it.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy is going to win in court before me," Roberts told Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then the big guy is going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution."

Roberts' testimony did not sway the liberal groups and civil rights organizations that have opposed him. They noted he refused to state his opinion on contemporary disputes such as abortion rights, or controversial past decisions such as the ruling that stopped the vote recount in Florida in 2000 and ensured that George W. Bush would become president.

Roberts also stood behind most of the sharply worded memos he wrote as a young conservative in the Reagan administration.

The memos opposed several civil rights initiatives of the time, and sometimes did so in a mocking tone.

One memo, for example, referred to illegal immigrants as "illegal amigos."

Another memo strongly opposed an expansion of the Voting Rights Act, which allowed lawyers to challenge voting systems or electoral districts that weakened the voting power of blacks or Latinos. The 1982 law is credited with vastly increasing the number of minority officeholders.

When Democrats repeatedly broached the subject of these memos, Roberts repeatedly responded that he was a staff lawyer who was carrying out the policies of the Reagan White House.

Pressed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) on the disputed provision in the Voting Rights Act, he said he did not now think it was "constitutionally suspect."

His cautious answers to the questions about the memos caused some to doubt he had changed his opinions.

His take on the Voting Rights Act "makes me think he likely still holds these views," said Richard L. Hasen, a voting rights expert at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles. "The tone of the memos is a tone of indignation."

At times, Roberts succeeded in turning the senators' questions back on them.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) asked Roberts why he argued in 1991, as deputy solicitor general in the administration of George H.W. Bush, that a schoolgirl who was a victim of sexual harassment at her Atlanta-area high school could not sue the school district for damages in federal court.

Leahy told Roberts he could "actually bring justice" by allowing her and others like her to sue. He asked Roberts why he did not take that view.

The reason, Roberts replied, was that Congress did not include in the law a provision that would allow people to sue. The law in question, Title IX of the education code, said schools and colleges that received federal money had to treat girls and boys equally. It did not say, however, whether private lawsuits were authorized.

Over and over again, Democrats cited such examples to question whether Roberts had a big heart.

Roberts said the issue was the law, not his heart.

"If Congress would simply spell it out in the legislation," he said, there would be no doubt victims could sue.

"All of those cases arose because Congress did not address the question. All Congress has to do is write one sentence" authorizing private lawsuits, he said.

"I became a lawyer because I believe in the rule of law," Roberts said in summarizing his case. "I would hope you'd look at my briefs and my arguments before the Supreme Court and conclude that's a person who respects the law, respects the court and will the approach the law in a similar way as a judge."

'I'm Not An Ideologue,' Roberts Tells Senate Panel (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Jo Becker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday summed up his Senate hearings to become the nation's 17th chief justice by declaring, "I'm not an ideologue," brushing aside his early years in the trenches of the conservative Reagan revolution as he portrayed himself as a lawyer and judge devoid of social agendas.

With his confirmation to the Supreme Court virtually assured by solid support among Republicans, who control the Senate, Roberts used the closing moments of his 2 1/2 days of testimony to try -- with uncertain results -- to soothe Democratic skeptics.

Saying that his loyalties are to the Constitution and "the rule of law," Roberts said that he had displayed no ideological bias during his two years as a federal appeals court judge and that he had, during 13 years in private practice, represented clients on all sides of contentious issues.

Some conservatives were alarmed last month over the disclosure that he had helped gay activists win a landmark Supreme Court in 1996. But Roberts testified yesterday that he would have been equally willing to represent the opposing side, the state of Colorado, if it had asked for his help first.

On the other hand, Roberts broke with orthodoxy among Republicans, including President Bush, who say that medical liability lawsuits are out of control. Asked whether he thinks lawyers who represent people in product-liability or medical-malpractice cases are harming the United States, Roberts replied that he did not, citing a former fellow law clerk who he said "does a wonderful job" as a personal injury lawyer.

"If you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath," the nominee said, "that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue."

The careful conclusion of Roberts's 20 hours of testimony leaves one drama unresolved in the Senate role in the first Supreme Court vacancy in 11 years: How many Democrats will join Republicans in voting to give him a seat on the court?

The Judiciary Committee is scheduled to convene for a vote next Thursday, and GOP leaders plan to begin debate on Roberts's confirmation in the full Senate on Sept. 26, with a floor vote sometime that week. That timing would allow Roberts, if confirmed, to join the court when it begins its new term Oct. 3.

Bush originally nominated Roberts to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor but made him his choice for chief justice after the death of William H. Rehnquist on Sept. 3. Bush has not indicated when he intends to name a successor to O'Connor.

All week, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee complained that Roberts was evasive about his views and values on a range of polarizing issues, including abortion, civil rights, the scope of presidential power and the right to die. Even as the hearing was ending, several Democrats urged him to reveal more of what they called his heart.

"Many of us are struggling with . . . what kind of a justice would you be, John Roberts," implored Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.)

The eight Democrats on the panel have not said how they plan to vote. Yesterday, Feinstein and several others vacillated openly.

Feinstein said she had expected Bush to select someone more conservative than Roberts appeared to be. "I don't see anything definitive," Feinstein said of his record and testimony. "And I do see things to believe that . . . this is a fine legal scholar who will truly look at the law."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said that he was trying to decide which Supreme Court justice Roberts would resemble most. Biden said that he would vote against Roberts if he decided the nominee were akin to Justice Antonin Scalia but probably would support Roberts if he were most like Rehnquist.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said, "I, for one, wake up in the middle of the night thinking about it, and have been unsure how to vote." He told Roberts: "You will in all likelihood affect every one of our lives in many ways for a whole generation. So this isn't just rolling the dice -- it's betting the whole house."

Republicans countered that many of them had supported justices chosen by President Bill Clinton, while differing with their views. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) took issue with the Democrats' efforts to discern what lies in Roberts's heart.

"There are bleeding hearts and there are hard hearts," Graham said. "And I want this committee to understand that if we go down this road of putting people's hearts in play, and the only way you can have a good heart is 'Adopt my value system,' we're doing a great disservice to the judiciary."

Before the questioning ended, Democrats made a final attempt to draw out Roberts on his views. He answered a greater portion of their questions than he had on Wednesday, when several Democrats erupted in frustration over his refusal to give substantive responses.

At one point yesterday, Roberts backtracked from a position he had advocated in an early-1980s memo concerning a Supreme Court ruling in a Texas case that gave children the right to attend public schools, even if they were illegal immigrants. Roberts had argued that the Reagan administration should have defended a Texas law that allowed schools to exclude such youngsters.

Yesterday, Roberts said: "My own view is that, if you have a child, he or she should be educated. We'll worry about status later." Nevertheless, he added: "As a personal view . . . yes. It's a separate issue as a legal question, as you know."

He also disavowed a 1981 memo on the issue of whether inmates, including those who have been sentenced to death, have a right to file habeas corpus appeals in federal courts, challenging the constitutionality of their convictions. The memo said: "The question would seem to be not what tinkering is necessary in the system, but rather why have federal habeas corpus at all?"

Yesterday, Roberts said that he had simply been endorsing reforms to eliminate a glut of frivolous appeals, as Congress eventually did: "I'm not in favor now and was not in favor then" of eliminating such appeals.

The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), questioned Roberts about how he would handle one of the responsibilities of the chief justice: appointing judges to an unusual court, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, which has gained expanded powers under the USA Patriot Act. Critics have said the FISA court abridges civil liberties in the name of combating terrorism.

Leahy asked whether Roberts, if confirmed, would be willing to work with Congress "to add more transparency" to the court. Roberts replied that the court "is a surprising institution" and said that "the people appointed to it have to be of the highest quality, undoubted commitment to all the basic principles, both of the need for the court and the need to protect civil liberties." He stopped short of saying he would change the court's ground rules.

After Roberts left the witness chair, Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Leahy said they found nothing in a routine FBI background check on Roberts that would disqualify him from serving on the court.

For the rest of the day, the committee heard from more than 30 witnesses who sought to reinforce, sometimes in dramatic terms, the case for or against his confirmation. They included law professors and theologians, former clients and bosses of the nominee, an Alabama girls basketball coach, and a female lawyer whom Roberts had helped win a promotion.

A representative of the American Bar Association, testifying for the Republicans, explained why the organization had given Roberts its highest rating.

DOJ_NMG_0006053

Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a civil rights leader who was arrested more than 40 times during protests of the 1960s, testified that he does not accept Roberts's assertion that arguments he made in memos as a high-ranking legal adviser in the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush did not reflect his personal views. "The judge was on the wrong side of history," Lewis said.

US High Court Nominee: 'I'm Not An Ideologue' (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro And Richard Cowan

Reuters, September 16, 2005

Declaring "I'm not an ideologue," John Roberts finished a four-day Senate committee appearance on Thursday with Democrats and Republicans predicting he will be confirmed to head the Supreme Court as the 17th U.S. chief justice.

In fact, the 100-member, Republican-led U.S. Senate appeared headed toward approving President George W. Bush's 50-year-old conservative nominee before the high court begins its new term on October 3.

Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record), a North Dakota Democrat, said upward of half of the 45-member Democratic caucus may join Republicans in voting for Roberts, who has drawn fire from major liberal groups.

"He's highly intelligent. He has strong credentials. He is a conservative, but I think he is mainstream conservative," Conrad said in a brief interview.

Still, some frustrated Democrats took a final crack at trying to pin Roberts down on some hot-button issues such as civil rights and challenged his record based largely on memos he wrote as a young attorney two decades ago in the Reagan administration.

"What kind of justice would you be?" Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), a California Democrat, asked in posing one of the final questions to Roberts at his Judiciary Committee hearing.

Roberts replied by describing himself as a person who respects the law and would interpret the Constitution without a political tilt. He has declined to predict how he may decide specific controversial cases, including abortion.

Roberts urged committee members to examine his record the past two years as a member of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"I think if you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath, that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," Roberts said.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy's going to win in court before me. But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then the big guy's going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution. That's the oath," he said.

POTENTIAL FOR LONG TENURE

If confirmed, Roberts would succeed the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who was the high court's conservative anchor for 33 years.

Roberts would become the youngest person in two centuries to hold the lifetime post and be positioned to head the federal judiciary for decades, helping shape the American way of life on matters from civil rights to voting rights to gay rights.

The committee is scheduled to vote on a recommendation to the Senate on Roberts next Thursday. The Senate plans to consider the nomination the week of September 26.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (news, bio, voting record), a New Jersey Democrat, said: "I don't think there is any doubt he'll be confirmed. The question is how many Democrats vote for him."

Lautenberg said he was undecided but leaning toward not voting to confirm Roberts because he failed to answer too many questions.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said six of the eight Democrats on the Judiciary Committee met after Roberts' testimony and all were undecided.

Easing Roberts' anticipated approval was the belief he would not greatly alter the court's conservative outlook developed by Rehnquist.

DOJ_NMG_0006054

A bigger fight was anticipated for Bush's next nominee, who would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who has often been the swing vote on the sharply divided nine-member court.

Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record), a Texas Republican, said: "John Roberts will be confirmed. The question is will Democrats jeopardize their credibility and vote against him, or bolster their credibility by voting for this highly qualified nominee -- and hold fire for the next one."

Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat who led some of the most aggressive questioning of Roberts, said he was undecided.

Schumer told Roberts, "I for one wake up in the middle of the night thinking about it and have been unsure how to vote."

Roberts' Senate Testimony Comes To A Close Some Questions Still Open (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts exuded such steadiness during four days in a Senate witness chair that New York Democrat Charles Schumer on Thursday asked Roberts for advice on what questions senators should ask to try to learn more about him.

It was one of many moments this week that showed the respect that members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have for Roberts, President Bush's choice to succeed the late William Rehnquist as the nation's chief justice. The conservative Roberts' deftness in giving non-committal answers to Democrats on a range of legal issues reflected the skills that made the nominee, in Schumer's words, “one of the best litigators in America.”

For Democrats on the panel, a big question remained Thursday: John Roberts, the lawyer, may be first-rate, but what of the man? Does he bring together, as Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., put it, “the mind and the heart”? What are his “feelings as a man?” Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., asked at one point. Feinstein also observed that Roberts was a “very cautious, very precise man … obviously with staying power.

“You've gone through this in a remarkable way,” Feinstein told Roberts, a 50-year-old federal judge. “I'm convinced you will be (chief justice), God willing, for 40 years. And that even concerns me more because it means that my vote means more.”

Democrats' concerns about Roberts stem from the possibility that he could be part of an effort by Bush to move the divided Supreme Court to the right.

With Roberts likely to win Senate confirmation to replace the conservative Rehnquist, Bush soon will pick a successor for Sandra Day O'Connor, a more moderate justice who has been a key vote in preserving, among other things, abortion rights and affirmative action in college admissions. That's why the coming battle over her replacement likely will be more contentious than the one over Roberts.

The Judiciary Committee will vote on Roberts' nomination next Thursday. Although Roberts' confirmation has seemed inevitable, Schumer, Kennedy, Feinstein and other Democrats peppered him with questions that sought to reveal just how conservative he is.

Shortly before Roberts finished his testimony Thursday, he urged senators not to view him as an “ideologue.” And perhaps to show a warmer side to Democrats, he said he realizes that legal decisions “have impact on real people and real lives.” Roberts also said the law should give the “little guy” the same chance in a legal dispute as a big corporation.

Roberts cast himself as sympathetic to the concerns of women, minorities and the disabled, but he declined to offer more precise views about specific disputes involving such groups.

Senators later heard from witnesses for and against Roberts. Among the opponents was Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., who as a leader in the civil rights movement was beaten, arrested and jailed in the 1960s. Lewis said Roberts, who as a lawyer in the Reagan and first Bush administrations sought narrow interpretations of civil rights laws, was “on the wrong side of history.”

“We cannot afford to elevate an individual to such a powerful, lifetime position, whose record demonstrates such a strong desire to reverse the hard-won civil rights gains that so many sacrificed so much to achieve,” Lewis said.

Peter Kirsanow, a Bush appointee on the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, countered that Roberts has shown “an unwavering commitment to equal protection under the law and a comprehensive understanding of our civil rights laws.”

For Roberts, 1 Question Remains (DMN)

By David Jackson And Allen Pusey, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON – Completing nearly 20 hours of Senate testimony, Judge John Roberts moved closer to confirmation Thursday amid a lingering debate over both his head and his heart.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee ended the four days of hearings with praise for Judge Roberts' intellect but remained skeptical that a former corporate lawyer understands how ordinary people are affected by the nation's highest court.

"It's important to determine not just the quality of your mind, but the fullness of your heart," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

The Supreme Court: Justice profiles, key decisions

Judge Roberts, for his part, assured the committee this week that he is not an ideologue, but would decide cases on the law and the Constitution.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy is going to win in court before me," said the federal appeals court judge. "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then, the big guy is going to win."

Party-line vote?

The committee scheduled a vote on Judge Roberts for Thursday. A number of aides said it could be a party-line vote, with 10 Republicans endorsing Mr. Roberts and eight Democrats opposing.

The nomination then goes to the Senate floor, where Republicans control 55 of the 100 seats. Judge Roberts' backers hope to pick up support from more conservative Democrats and expect him to formally replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist when the Supreme Court's next term opens Oct. 3.

Both sides are gearing up for these final debates with an eye on the next set of confirmation hearings, after President Bush announces a nominee to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The White House has suggested that the selection will not be made until after Judge Roberts is confirmed.

Curt Levey, general counsel for the pro-Roberts Committee for Justice, said the only question remaining is how the Roberts vote will affect the next nominee.

"People are saving up their budgets for the next nomination," Mr. Levey said.

Democrats have not mentioned filibustering Judge Roberts, which would require 60 Senate votes to break. Some aides said Democrats, without such a filibuster, might seek to keep Judge Roberts' vote under 60 – sending a message to the administration that Democrats could muster the numbers for a filibuster the next time around.

Republicans said some Democrats are attempting to change the standards by which nominees have been confirmed, including knowledge of the law, experience, integrity and temperament.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., noted that most Republicans backed Clinton nominee Ruth Bader Ginsburg despite political differences with the former American Civil Liberties Union attorney.

"If I wanted to judge Justice Ginsburg on her heart, I might take a hard-hearted view of her and say she's a bleeding heart," Mr. Graham said. "She has a different value system than I do, but that doesn't mean she doesn't have a good heart."

A right to know

Democrats said people are entitled to know more about Judge Roberts' views, especially potential litigants who are targets of discrimination and government oppression.

"All of us are trying to get down to, what are your core values?" Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., told the judge.

By the end of the proceedings, the committee had heard from 33 witnesses who testified for and against Judge Roberts, including longtime colleagues, college professors and several plaintiffs whose cases have been decided by the Supreme Court.

Among them was Henrietta Wright, chairwoman of the Dallas Children's Advocacy Center and a longtime friend of Judge Roberts and his wife, Jane. Ms. Wright described him as a private man, with eclectic tastes in reading and a love of golf, and as an attentive father, capable of operating as a single parent when his wife is working.

"From my experience," she said, "John Roberts has no agenda other than to apply the law as it is written."

Critics speak up

Others were less flattering. Marcia D. Greenberger, co-president of the National Women's Law Center, accused Judge Roberts of "developing, advancing and embracing legal arguments and positions that would undermine women's most basic legal rights."

Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a longtime civil rights leader, told the Senate panel that he, too, views the Roberts nomination with skepticism.

"I fear that if Judge Roberts is confirmed, the Supreme Court would no longer hear the people's cries for justice. I fear the leadership of the court would promote politics over the protection of individual rights and liberties."

As he neared the end of his testimony, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., joked to Judge Roberts: "You're going to miss doing this every day. ... You're not even going to answer that one, are you?"

"Well," replied Judge Roberts, "it's a once-in-a-lifetime experience."

Senators Save Breath For Next Court Debate (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — The big question surrounding John Roberts as he wrapped up testimony before a Senate committee Thursday was not whether he will become the nation's 17th chief justice, but how the vote on his nomination this month will affect President Bush's next Supreme Court pick.

Roberts, 50, seems assured of confirmation because several members of the "Gang of 14," a group of moderate Democratic and Republican senators whose support would be needed to block his nomination, say they don't think such an effort would be justified. "I can't imagine a filibuster," said Sen. Ben Nelson, a Nebraska Democrat. Neither can Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the group's senior Republican, who says he has talked with others in the group.

A filibuster is a maneuver that allows a minority of senators to block a vote. Because Republicans hold 55 of the Senate's 100 seats, Roberts' opponents say it's probably the only way to stop him. "I can count," said Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation.

It takes 41 votes to sustain a filibuster, and there won't be enough without the support of the seven Democrats in the Gang of 14. Even some of the eight Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who sparred with the nominee this week told him they were at least considering a vote in his favor.

Those committee members are among the chamber's most liberal Democrats, and several have reason to court liberal activist groups: Sens. Joseph Biden of Delaware and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin are weighing bids for the presidency in 2008; Sen. Charles Schumer of New York is trying to solicit funds for 2006 candidates as head of the Democrats' senatorial campaign committee.

An important factor in the Democrats' strategy: how best to position themselves for the next Supreme Court debate. The president has said he will act in "a timely manner" to fill the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a critical vote on the often divided nine-member court. Because O'Connor is a moderate conservative who — unlike the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist — often voted with the court's four-member liberal wing, her seat affects the court's direction.

Democrats such as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada want a moderate nominee like O'Connor. Some prominent women, including O'Connor, have suggested that Bush pick another woman. Bush has hinted he might make his attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, the first Hispanic justice. Conservative Republicans such as Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas want a justice more obviously opposed to abortion and gay marriage than Roberts has appeared to be.

Bush was rebuffed this year when Republican leaders tried to end filibusters of judicial nominees, a move that would have made it easier to win approval of conservative appointees. The Gang of 14 consists of seven Democrats who promised to use a filibuster only in "extraordinary circumstances" and seven Republicans who back Democrats' right to filibuster.

Democrats in the group want what Sen. Mark Pryor of Arkansas calls "a nominee who will unite us, not divide us." They hope Bush will consult them, as he did before nominating Roberts. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said Bush aides asked her about

Edith Clement, a judge on the U.S. appeals court that covers Louisiana, Texas and Mississippi. Clements' lack of controversial writings on abortion could make her an appealing candidate.

"She would be very high in my book," Landrieu said.

Nominee Reveals Pragmatic Approach To Constitution (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - For someone accused of saying very little, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. revealed a great deal about how he will approach his work if confirmed as the 17th chief justice of the United States.

Over three days of testimony, between declining to answer questions on specific cases and legal issues, Judge Roberts made clear that his approach to interpreting the Constitution is more varied and flexible than the originalism subscribed to by Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia. President Bush has singled them out as models for the sorts of justices he planned to appoint.

"I think the framers, when they used broad language like 'liberty,' like 'due process,' like 'unreasonable' with respect to search and seizures, they were crafting a document that they intended to apply in a meaningful way down the ages," Judge Roberts said Wednesday.

He said he would consider not only how the framers of the Constitution understood those words, but also how courts have interpreted them and how they apply to evolving societal conditions.

That approach disappointed some conservative legal scholars.

"He is not in the mold of Scalia and Thomas," said Steven G. Calabresi, a law professor at Northwestern and a chairman of the Federalist Society, the conservative legal group. "They have more of a theory of how to decide cases, and they look to text and original meaning. Roberts will look at text and original meaning, but he will also look to precedent and the consequences of his decisions."

Judge Roberts, for his part, said his approach would be pragmatic and case-specific. That approach places Judge Roberts closer to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has often provided the swing vote in important cases.

"I do not have an overarching judicial philosophy that I bring to every case," he said Tuesday. "I tend to look at the cases from the bottom up rather than the top down."

He would be guided, he said, by the level of generality inherent in particular constitutional provisions. "If the phrase in the Constitution says two-thirds of the Senate," he said, "everybody's a literalist when they interpret that."

But other phrases in the Constitution are broader, he added, giving as an example the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures.

"You can look at that wording all day," Judge Roberts said, "and it's not going to give you much progress in deciding whether a particular search is reasonable or not."

Under the 14th Amendment, adopted after the Civil War to protect blacks, said Douglas W. Kmiec, a law professor at Pepperdine University, "Judge Roberts made it reasonably clear that gender and other categories can receive protection."

That is at odds, Professor Kmiec said, with the approach advocated by Judge Robert H. Bork, whose nomination was defeated in 1987 when Democrats controlled the Senate.

"Under the Bork version of originalism," Professor Kmiec said, applying the 14th Amendment to sexual discrimination "doesn't make any sense."

He continued: "That was probably the major tripwire that started his downhill descent at his hearings."

Judge Bork was also both more expansive and combative in answering questions than Judge Roberts was, as a matter of both necessity and temperament.

"Bork was extremely forthcoming," said Patrick J. Schiltz, a law professor at the University of St. Thomas, "but he had no choice. He had written a lot about everything. He's written about every major doctrine in constitutional law."

Judge Roberts seemed most at ease in sorting through and explaining Supreme Court precedents without offering his own views on whether the decisions were correct.

"In terms of understanding Supreme Court case law," said Cass Sunstein, a law professor at the University of Chicago, "he's the most impressive in recent memory, even more than Bork, and Bork was pretty impressive."

But unlike Judge Bork, Professor Sunstein said, Judge Roberts appeared prepared to build on those Supreme Court decisions rather than depart starkly from them.

Judge Roberts disappointed some conservatives in the way he answered questions concerning the scope of Congressional power. In a series of decisions, the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist endorsed significant limitations on the ability of Congress to legislate on local matters.

"Roberts will be very deferential to Congress," Professor Calabresi said, "more so than Rehnquist."

Judge Roberts also made clear that it is not the role of the courts to interpret statutes more broadly than warranted. If Congress wants to allow certain kinds of lawsuits, he said, the legislation it passes should say so plainly and directly.

Judge Roberts provided substantial information, at least at the level of theory, about the right to privacy. He said it existed, located it in various constitutional provisions including the 14th Amendment and gave some examples of what it requires. He endorsed a 1965 decision of the Supreme Court holding that the right to privacy guarantees that married couples may use contraceptives.

But his adamant refusal to answer other questions frustrated Democratic senators and liberal scholars.

"From Bush v. Gore to the Second Amendment to separation of church and state to abortion," Erwin Chemerinsky, a law professor at Duke University, said of Judge Roberts, "he was masterful at saying a lot but avoiding answering the key questions."

Professor Chemerinsky said he took some comfort from Judge Roberts's endorsement of an aspect of Justice O'Connor's majority decision in an affirmative action case involving higher education.

Judge Roberts said that pragmatic considerations about the consequences of allowing race to play a role in admissions decisions properly played a role in her decision. Justices Scalia and Thomas dissented in the decision, saying that the Constitution forbids such preferences.

Judge Roberts also declined to state his personal views on almost every matter, on the theory that they were irrelevant to a judge's work. (He relented briefly on Thursday, saying, "My own view is that if you have a child, he or she should be educated.")

"Other nominees," Professor Schiltz said, "after making clear that they weren't talking about the law but only their personal views, were pretty willing to talk."

At times, Judge Roberts's limited conception of the judge's role struck Democrats as evidence of a cramped approach to the law from a lawyer more taken with technicalities than with justice. Judge Roberts declined to second-guess positions he had taken as an advocate arguing that a student who had been sexually abused was not entitled to damages and that a death row inmate could not present new evidence of his innocence if certain deadlines had passed.

Judge Roberts was repeatedly confronted with documents he wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration. They were studded with caustic comments, uniformly took conservative positions and frequently argued for an understanding of the Constitution starkly at odds with the Supreme Court doctrine of the day.

Judge Roberts stressed that the documents represented the views of a staff lawyer setting out the views of his client, but he did not for the most part directly disavow the sentiments in them. But Professor Sunstein said that Judge Roberts's testimony was in an entirely different vein than his early writings.

"He doesn't talk like someone who believed at any level in changing the current understanding of the Constitution," Professor Sunstein said. "He's not the same person he was in his 20's."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, summed up what he called the pros and cons of the Roberts nomination on Thursday.

The pros, Mr. Schumer said, are that Judge Roberts is brilliant, is "a lawyer above all" and is devoted to "a judicial philosophy of modesty and stability" that "respects precedent, the Congress and other judges' opinions."

On the negative side, Mr. Schumer said, were the questions Judge Roberts would not answer, the White House's refusal to release documents from his years as a more senior lawyer in the first Bush administration and what Mr. Schumer called "the question of compassion and humanity."

DOJ_NMG_0006059

"We must now take the evidence we have and try to answer the fundamental question," Mr. Schumer said. "What kind of justice will John Roberts be?"

Judge Roberts, for his part, summed up his philosophy on Thursday.

"Somebody asked me, you know, 'Are you going to be on the side of the little guy?' " he said. "And you obviously want to give an immediate answer, but, as you reflect on it, if the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy's going to win in court before me. But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then the big guy's going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution. That's the oath."

Frustrated By Roberts, And Unsure How To Vote (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - Senate Democrats are deeply conflicted about how to vote on the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be the nation's 17th chief justice, and appear divided about how, and whether, to use their vote to send a message to President Bush as he selects a candidate to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy.

"That's a critical part of this conversation," Senator Richard J. Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat and a member of the Judiciary Committee, said Thursday, when asked if he hoped to send a message to Mr. Bush about the next nominee. "We understand that this is the first of two vacancies on a court that's so evenly divided that one bad choice could make a - from my point of view - could have an impact for a long time."

Judge Roberts's unflappable performance during three days of questioning has clearly put Democrats in a quandary. Some say a strong vote against his nomination could prod the White House into naming a centrist to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a crucial swing vote. Others say that supporting the Roberts nomination could make Democrats appear reasonable, giving them more credibility to oppose the next nominee.

Despite Mr. Durbin's remark, the Democratic leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, said the vote on Judge Roberts "shouldn't be message time."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat whose vote will be among the most closely watched in the Senate because of her possible White House bid in 2008, agreed.

"I have found it is very difficult for Democrats to influence this White House on anything, and so I don't count on them paying attention to our legitimate concerns," Mrs. Clinton said, adding, "They will do what they think is in their interest, however they define it."

As the Judiciary Committee wrapped up its questioning of Judge Roberts on Thursday morning, Democrats, who have repeatedly assailed the nominee for not being forthcoming, expressed obvious frustration. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, told Judge Roberts that she had "one impression of you when we had our hour in private," and another at the hearing.

Later, in an interview, Senator Feinstein declined to elaborate. "I'm sorting out what I feel now," she said, shaking her head.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who is a Judiciary Committee member, delivered a lengthy soliloquy during the hearing in which he called Judge Roberts's performance at the hearing "a tour de force" and said he might well "possess the most powerful intellect" of any person to come before the Senate for the position of chief justice. But Mr. Schumer worried aloud that he did not have enough evidence to answer "the fundamental question" of what kind of justice Judge Roberts would be.

"I, for one, have woken up in the middle of the night, thinking about it," Mr. Schumer said, "being unsure how to vote."

That angst is spilling over into the rest of the Democratic caucus, and no Democrat interviewed Thursday would commit one way or the other on the vote. Mr. Reid said six of the eight Democrats on the judiciary panel had conferred but were still undecided.

Representatives of liberal advocacy groups, who are pressing Democrats to oppose the nomination, said they felt confident of a straight party-line vote, or close to it, when the committee takes up the nomination next Thursday.

The vote will come as Democrats sense President Bush is vulnerable. His poll numbers are at the lowest point of his presidency amid public outrage over the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, and Democrats hope to turn that outrage into a powerful message to voters during the 2006 midterm elections. On Thursday, Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said he thought Judge Roberts did not deserve to be confirmed.

But Democrats are keenly aware that they risk being labeled obstructionist if they vote in a bloc against a nominee like Judge Roberts, whose legal qualifications are impeccable. And though they have complained bitterly that the White House has refused to provide them access to legal memorandums Judge Roberts wrote when he worked for the first Bush administration, Democrats appear to have little appetite to block the nomination by filibuster on the Senate floor.

"No, no," Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. said Thursday, waving off the question of a filibuster. Mr. Biden, Democrat of Delaware, said that after voting to confirm Justice Antonin Scalia, one of the most conservative members of the court, he vowed never again to vote for "anybody who I don't have some sense of their constitutional methodology."

Asked if he had a sense of Judge Roberts's methodology, Mr. Biden replied, "No, I don't." That was why, he said, "it's such a dilemma."

Perhaps no Democrat faces as big a dilemma as Senator Clinton, who has been positioning herself as more of a centrist as she considers a possible White House bid. Republican senators are already taking pains to remind the public that many of them voted in favor of President Bill Clinton's Supreme Court nominees, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

Like other Democrats, Mrs. Clinton was circumspect Thursday, saying she would review the hearing transcript before deciding how to vote.

"There are a lot of considerations and some of them are competing, so we just have to weigh each of them," she said, "and every senator might have a slightly different weight to give."

One problem for Democrats is that Judge Roberts performed so well as a witness. Hour after hour, he delved into the minutiae of the law without referring to a single note or taking one. And while Democrats have assailed Judge Roberts for not answering enough of their questions, they are hard-pressed to argue that he did not answer any at all.

"Part of the reason people are conflicted is because Roberts has shown just enough leg to get a second date," said one Democratic strategist, speaking on the condition of anonymity so as not to give away internal party deliberations. "No magic moment has occurred where you could say, 'Oh, we can't put this guy on the bench.' "

One important question is how Democrats in Republican-leaning states will vote. Among them is Senator Reid, who said Thursday that he did not intend to insist that his colleagues vote in a bloc, and that he would not necessarily follow the recommendation of his colleagues on the judiciary panel. "It all boils down to an individual vote," he said.

Another question is what Democratic members of the "Gang of 14," a bipartisan group of senators who drafted a compromise to avoid a filibuster on several of President Bush's judicial nominees this spring, will do. One of them, Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, had previously said he was inclined to vote in favor of Judge Roberts. But in an interview Thursday, Mr. Nelson used a football analogy to suggest he was hedging.

"It's halftime," the senator said. "The game's not over."

Democrats Hit Roberts' Ambiguity (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Democrats laid the groundwork yesterday to oppose the Supreme Court nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr., accusing him of withholding his personal views on political and judicial matters.

"You did speak at length on many issues and sounded like you were conveying your views to us," Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, told Judge Roberts yesterday. "But when one went back and read the transcript each evening, there was less than met the ear that afternoon."

As he had throughout his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Roberts calmly explained that -- as with previous nominees such as Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- it would be improper for him to discuss his personal views on certain issues, especially those that might come before the court.

In addition, the chief justice nominee said, those views are irrelevant, because his goal is to merely apply the law within the confines of the Constitution.

Still, it was the overriding concern of Democrats on the panel, which will vote on the Roberts nomination next week. Senate Republicans say they don't expect to pick up a single vote from the eight committee Democrats, but several -- including Mr. Schumer -- insist that they haven't made up their minds.

Outside the Senate, a coalition of liberal interest groups released a new television commercial showing snippet after snippet of Judge Roberts explaining during his testimony that he couldn't answer certain questions, many of which had been asked repeatedly.

Yesterday marked the fourth and final day of hearings on Judge Roberts' nomination to become the nation's 17th Supreme Court chief justice. It is widely expected that the full Senate will confirm Judge Roberts by the time the high court convenes Oct. 3.

Among those Democrats being closely watched is Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, who has said she will not support a nominee who will undo federal abortion rights.

"I don't really know what I'm going to do with respect to voting for you or against you," she told Judge Roberts yesterday.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican who is pro-life, dismissed such interest in Judge Roberts' stance on abortion. He spent two hours with the nominee and said he tried mightily to pin him down. He couldn't, but plans to vote for him based on his overall judicial philosophy and intellect.

Although no Democrats expressed support for Judge Roberts' nomination, they heaped more praise on him yesterday for his intellect and coolness under intense questioning. Throughout his 19 hours and 55 minutes of testimony, Judge Roberts never referred to or jotted down one single note with the pad and pencil supplied to him on the witness table.

Before questions began yesterday, Mr. Schumer greeted Judge Roberts, shook his hand and said, "You have done an amazing job."

Later, during the hearing, however, Mr. Schumer and other Democrats said they just weren't convinced that Judge Roberts isn't a conservative ideologue.

"I think if you've ever looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath, that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," the judge replied.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, wondered whether Judge Roberts would be sensitive to the plight of the powerless and impoverished.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, then the little guy's going to win in the court before me," Judge Roberts responded. "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well then the big guy's going to win because my obligation is to the Constitution."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said it is wrong to evaluate Judge Roberts on his political opinions.

"We're down to the heart," he said. "Well, there are all kinds of hearts. There are bleeding hearts and there are hard hearts."

Referring to Justice Ginsburg, who was nominated by President Clinton, Mr. Graham said, "She has a different value system than I do. But that doesn't mean she doesn't have a good heart. And I want this committee to understand that if we go down this road of putting people's hearts in play, and the only way you can have a good heart is, 'Adopt my value system,' we're doing a great disservice to the judiciary."

Roberts Concludes Three Days Of Testimony (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Law.com, September 16, 2005

Eliciting praise for his intellectual firepower from one of his sharpest Democratic critics, Judge John Roberts Jr. concluded his time before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday by declaring that he was not an ideologue and defending his three days of testimony as both "fully expansive" and "fully responsive."

Roberts noted that despite only two years spent as a federal appeals court judge, he has written 50 opinions, telling Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.: "I don't think you can read those opinions and say that these are the opinions of an ideologue. And you and I agree that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

Schumer, in a third and final round of questioning, called Roberts' legal knowledge and calm and precise presentation before the committee a "tour de force."

But he said he still had questions about Roberts' ability to "truly empathize" with the less fortunate.

"It didn't seem much, for instance, to concede that the wording 'illegal amigos' was unfortunate, yet you refused to say so," Schumer told Roberts, referring to a 1983 memo Roberts wrote to White House Counsel Fred Fielding, in which he used that term while referring to an upcoming presidential interview with a Hispanic newspaper.

Schumer, like almost all of the committee's eight Democrats, criticized Roberts' refusal to comment on any issue that might come before the Court.

"You did speak at length on many issues and sounded like you were conveying your views to us, but when one went back and read the transcript each evening, there was less than met the ear that afternoon," Schumer said.

Still, Schumer, considered among the most liberal of committee Democrats, professed to being conflicted about whether to vote to confirm Roberts, and would not predict how either he or his colleagues would vote during the Sept. 22 committee meeting.

After two lengthy days of interrogations, Thursday's session was essentially cleanup time for the Democrats, several of whom besides Schumer still wanted to question the witness.

It was clear, however, as had been true since the first day of questioning, that Roberts was going to remain a disciplined nominee, rarely commenting on any case or issue that might one day appear before the Court.

But as in Wednesday's hearing, in which Roberts did reveal some slivers of his legal thinking, Thursday's session also provided a few glimmers of his views, and not merely a recitation of hornbook legal principles about precedent.

Queried by Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., Roberts said he was "not in favor now and not in favor then" of eliminating federal habeas corpus for inmates. "People do succeed at that phase," he said.

The day before, Roberts had said he agreed with one part of Grutter v. Bollinger, a 2003 decision that said public universities can take race into account in order to achieve a diverse student body, as long as they don't use rigid quotas. "You do need to look at the real-world impact in this area," Roberts said, referring to the decision's assertion that there was a clear public interest in creating a diverse student body.

And Roberts has asserted a constitutional right to privacy, although he was careful to give no indication whether that right to privacy extends to a woman's right to an abortion.

After Roberts finished late Thursday morning, the committee began hearing from a series of six panels totaling 30 witnesses, 15 from each side, each of whom was to give five minutes of testimony.

The witnesses ranged from Beverly Jones, a plaintiff in a landmark ruling about the Americans for Disabilities Act, to former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Carol Browner, to civil rights pioneer Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., to former Solicitor General Charles Fried.

"As I read some of the criticism of Judge Roberts, I wonder whether we are talking about the same man," said Fried, a Roberts supporter. "What I see is a fidelity to the law, not the pursuit of an agenda."

Other witnesses, however, were scathing in their remarks.

"Bork by accretion," said Georgetown University Law Center professor Peter Edelman, referring to Judge Robert Bork, whose Supreme Court nomination was defeated in 1987. "I think what it adds up to is far more radically conservative than Judge Bork," added Edelman, a former Clinton administration official.

"Judge Roberts has a vision of judicial restraint that really represents a retreat from the fundamental goal of protecting the rights of Americans through the federal courts," said Wade Henderson, who heads the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, in an interview after completing his testimony.

Roberts did appear to stumble at least once Thursday, during questioning by Sen. Edward Kennedy, Mass., the committee's senior Democrat, who quizzed him over language he used in a June 7, 1983, memo to White House Counsel

Fielding. In the memo, Roberts made what could be viewed as a disparaging comment about the Equal Opportunity Employment Commission.

"I have been unable to confirm that the President promised to abolish the EEOC," Roberts wrote Fielding, referring to a letter (the sender's name has been redacted) that noted President Ronald Reagan promised to get rid of the agency. Roberts continued: "We should ignore that assertion in any event, as well as the assertion that the EEOC is 'un-American,' the truth of the matter notwithstanding."

Roberts quickly repudiated the view that the EEOC was "un-American," noting that the expression came from the unnamed correspondent. But his explanation for the final phrase was labored, and Kennedy, for one, wasn't buying it.

Roberts, whose memos and court opinions demonstrate a punctilious writing style, told Kennedy that the phrase did not refer to the words immediately before it. Rather, they referred to the first assertion in the sentence -- the claim by the letter writer that Reagan had promised to dismantle the agency -- Roberts said.

"He hasn't made a single mistake in grammar," Kennedy said during a break in the hearing. "I think he's trying to have it both ways."

The final day of the Roberts hearings was a day of Democratic musings; Republicans, now confident that he will be confirmed, had little to say.

Besides Schumer, California's Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D, also publicly aired her indecision about how she would vote.

Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., however, best summed up his party's feelings about the hearings, and Democrats' frustration at trying to figure out who Roberts is.

Noting that Roberts had provided pro bono advice to those challenging a Colorado anti-gay rights measure before the Supreme Court in 1996, Durbin wondered whether Roberts would have instead represented Colorado if he had been asked. "I think I probably would have," Roberts responded.

Durbin continued: "Where would you draw the line, if you would ever draw the line?"

Replied Roberts: "People become lawyers for all kinds of reasons. Civil rights. Environmental protection. Rights for the disabled. You won't be able to effectively vindicate those rights if you don't have a rule of law. That's why I became a lawyer, to promote and vindicate the rule of law."

Roberts Shows Some Openness (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Jeanne Cummings, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- After a week of carefully parrying pointed questions from both ends of the political spectrum during closely watched hearings, Judge John Roberts concluded his Senate confirmation hearings for chief justice by declaring, "I'm not an ideologue."

But Judge Roberts did flag some significant elements of his judicial approach during questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, even as he cautiously avoided discussing matters that he said could come before the Supreme Court. Among other things, Judge Roberts, currently on the U.S. appeals court here, suggested openness to a broad view of the federal power to regulate interstate commerce, some acceptance of constitutional privacy rights -- and some distance from liberal civil-rights advocates and civil libertarians.

While he frustrated some Democrats who said he was avoiding answering their questions, he gave Republicans no assurance that he was sympathetic to their causes. He demurred, for instance, when Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.) asked "whether the unborn child is a person or is a piece of property."

Still, Republicans professed no doubts about Judge Roberts, who himself offered no objection when Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) praised him as a "strict constructionist." And by the end of the third day of hearings yesterday, his more open demeanor appeared to mend fences with some Democrats who had complained about his cooperation earlier in the week.

Here are some highlights from Judge Roberts's testimony on key areas:

Federal Power and the Commerce Clause: Judge Roberts gave Democrats some hope that he backed a broad view of the Commerce Clause, the constitutional provision giving Congress power to regulate interstate commerce. For more than 70 years, the clause has been the linchpin of ambitious national legislation, including the New Deal economic plan, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Endangered Species Act.

Some conservative legal scholars reject the theory behind Wickard v. Filburn, the 1942 opinion that gave Congress virtually unfettered power under the Commerce Clause. But Judge Roberts suggested he might accept the reasoning in the case, which found that even an individual activity of minor economic impact could be regulated if many people doing the same thing cumulatively affects interstate commerce.

"Under the Commerce Clause, can Congress pass a law banning even non-commercial cloning?" Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) asked yesterday.

"It would seem to me that Congress can make a determination that this is an activity, if allowed to be pursued, that is going to have effects on interstate commerce," Judge Roberts replied. "Obviously, if you were successful in cloning an animal, that's not going to be simply a local phenomenon. That's going to be something people are going to -- "

"You can leave it at that," Sen. Schumer said. "That's a good answer, as far as I'm concerned."

In a separate exchange with Sen. Schumer, though, Judge Roberts declined to give a blanket endorsement of the Wickard decision as beyond challenge. Sen. Schumer called that disturbing, warning that "if certain viewpoints became majority viewpoints," that could lead to "the dismantling of the entire apparatus to protect our rights, through the narrowing of the commerce clause."

Privacy: Judge Roberts went further than some conservative legal scholars -- and further than conservative Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia did in their confirmation hearings -- in asserting that the Constitution accords a right to privacy -- a crucial prerequisite, though not a guarantee, for legal support of abortion rights and gay rights.

In particular, he endorsed the majority opinion in the 1965 contraception case, Griswold v. Connecticut, saying he agreed "with the Griswold court's conclusion that marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that. The court, since Griswold, has grounded the privacy right discussed in that case in the liberty interest protected under the Due Process Clause."

At a different point in the hearings, he said liberty "does cover areas such as privacy and it's not protected only in procedural terms, but it's protected substantively as well."

At his 1991 hearing, Justice Thomas acknowledged the court had created a privacy precedent but notably didn't take a position approving it. When Justice Scalia was asked at his 1986 hearing whether he thought there was a right to privacy, he refused to give an opinion, saying, "I can tell you that that is what a number of Supreme Court opinions now say."

But Judge Roberts did leave himself some wiggle room, refusing repeatedly to say how broadly he would interpret privacy rights, and in particular whether he felt the right applied to abortion.

Civil Rights: One area in which Judge Roberts didn't significantly distance himself from the court's most conservative judges was civil rights. Despite repeated invitations by Democrats to disown his 1980s memos critical of busing and challenging congressional efforts to strengthen the Voting Rights Act, Judge Roberts didn't do so.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) cited a memo in which Judge Roberts, then working in the Reagan administration, said a portion of the Voting Rights Act was "constitutionally suspect" and asked the judge whether he still felt that was so. Judge Roberts said he saw "no basis" today to think so. Some civil-rights advocates said that answer could mean that he hasn't seen a smart-enough argument to overturn it.

Judge Roberts did appear to take a more liberal view than Justices Thomas or Scalia when he said it was appropriate for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to weigh real-life ramifications when ruling on Michigan law-school admissions affirmative-action programs. But it was left unclear how much weight he would give such information or how much real-life evidence he might consider.

Listening to Congress: Judge Roberts took pains to distinguish himself from Justice Scalia on the value of reading legislative history in interpreting statutes, a sensitive point for many lawmakers.

Justice Scalia has been critical of using legislative history, saying he reasons from the original meaning of legal texts. Critics say legislative history can help judges understand how lawmakers intended their measures to apply. Senators in both parties seemed pleased when Judge Roberts said he relied on it on his current court and would continue to do so as chief justice.

"But I have quoted and looked to legislative history in the past to help determine the meaning of ambiguous terms, and I would expect to follow that same approach on the Supreme Court," he said.

Death Penalty: Judge Roberts seemed to defend policies speeding executions as he discussed his reasons in past years for pushing to limit the access of condemned inmates to federal courts. Despite probing by Sen. Russell Feingold (D., Wis.), he didn't endorse concerns raised more recently that wrongfully convicted prisoners may face execution.

That is a contrast to the court's senior justice John Paul Stevens. In a speech last month Justice Stevens noted that new DNA evidence demonstrates "a substantial number of death sentences have been imposed erroneously," indicating "serious flaws in our administration of criminal justice."

Roe V. Roberts (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

In our lifetime has there been a more politically poisonous Supreme Court decision than Roe v. Wade ? Set aside for a moment your thoughts on the substance of the ruling. (I happen to be a supporter of legalized abortion.) I'm talking about the continuing damage to the republic: disenfranchising, instantly and without recourse, an enormous part of the American population; preventing, as even Ruth Bader Ginsburg once said, proper political settlement of the issue by the people and their representatives; making us the only nation in the West to have legalized abortion by judicial fiat rather than by the popular will expressed democratically.

The corruption continues 32 years later. You could see it played out hour by hour in the Senate confirmation hearings of Judge John Roberts. Question upon question that pretended to be about high constitutional principle was really about abortion in ill-concealed disguise.

Senators asked gravely about how deeply Roberts believes in upholding precedent. Do you think that any of the Democrats were concerned whether Roberts would uphold Richmond v. Croson , the precedent that outlawed racial quotas in municipal contracting? Or Boy Scouts v. Dale , which permitted the exclusion of gay Scout leaders?

This is all about Roe . Take the lines of interrogation about Roberts's belief in the right to privacy. They are not asking about search and seizure in your home. They are asking about the "right to choose" (a brilliant locution that expunges the ugly word abortion from all political debate about abortion) -- what Roberts in 1981 correctly termed the "so-called 'right to privacy,' " a skepticism he is now required to disavow.

Why? Because everyone knows what happened to Robert Bork when he forthrightly and honestly denied some kind of separate, newly hatched right to privacy.

And then there are the learned Judiciary Committee disquisitions on "originalism" -- the judicial philosophy by which Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas try to anchor the Constitution in something real, i.e., the meaning of the words as intended and understood at the time they were written.

Originalism is itself highly problematic, the worst judicial philosophy except for all the others, because they permit unmoored and arbitrary constitutional interpretation -- and thus unmoored and arbitrary judicial power. The learned senators, however, really don't care much about originalism, except to the extent that it would, almost by definition, make Roberts a categorical opponent of Roe . Which is why Roberts denies that he has any ideology, any "overarching judicial philosophy," and is nothing more than an ad hoc, bottom-up type of guy.

Maybe he is. Maybe he isn't. But he knows that if he dares to say otherwise, he gets Borked. If, on the other hand, he pretends to have a mind so scrubbed of theory that he is at a loss to explain gravitation itself, he gets to be chief justice of the United States for 40 years.

In 2000 Al Gore declared that he would not nominate a justice who did not support Roe. Dianne Feinstein says today that if she determines that Roberts opposes Roe , she will be compelled to vote against him. For Democrats, abortion is an open litmus test. For Republicans, it is a test of agility: Can they find the nominee who might be against Roe but has been circumspect enough not to say so publicly and who will be clever enough to avoid saying so at his confirmation hearings?

Circumspect and clever Roberts has been. No one really knows. But I predict two things: (a) Chief Justice Roberts will vote to uphold Roe v. Wade , and (b) his replacing his former boss, Chief Justice William Rehnquist, will move the court only mildly, but most assuredly, to the left -- as measured by the only available yardstick, the percentage of concurrences with the opinions of those conservative touchstones, Scalia and Thomas.

I infer this not just by what Roberts has said in his hearings -- that he supports Griswold v. Connecticut , that he deeply respects precedent and that he finds Roe itself worthy of respect. That is little beyond boilerplate. I infer it from his temperament, career and life history as an establishment conservative who prizes judicial modesty above all. Which means that while he will never repeat Roe , he will never repeal it and be the cause of the social upheaval that repeal would inevitably bring.

Not that this in any way disqualifies Roberts in my conservative eyes. He is a perfectly reasonable traditional conservative, who will be an outstanding chief justice. He is just not a judicial revolutionary. If you're a conservative looking for a return to the good old days, you'll be disappointed. And if you're a liberal who lives for the good old days because that's all that liberalism has left, tell Chuck Schumer to relax.

Liberals And Conservatives Remain Worlds Apart On Roberts's Suitability (NYT)

By Robin Toner And David D. Kirkpatrick

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - In a sharp clash of worldviews, liberal advocates warned Thursday that confirming Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States would threaten hard-won progress on civil rights and women's rights, while conservatives countered that he was clearly committed to equal justice under law.

On the final day of Judge Roberts's confirmation hearings, liberals were arrayed in full force before the Senate Judiciary Committee: civil rights leaders, leading feminists and reproductive rights advocates, all warning about the importance of the court in the lives of average Americans.

In one emblematic moment, Representative John Lewis, the Georgia Democrat severely beaten during the civil rights movement, told the committee that he feared a Roberts court would "no longer hear the people's cries for justice," and no longer act as a "sympathetic referee" because of his philosophy of judicial restraint.

Conservatives argued that Judge Roberts was thoroughly in the mainstream of civil rights law.

Peter S. Kirsanow, a Republican member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, applauded Judge Roberts for arguing against "unlawful racial quotas or racial set-asides untethered to a showing of discrimination." Mr. Kirsanow said Judge Roberts supported the "bedrock principle of treating people on the basis of merit, without regard to race or sex."

More generally, conservatives argued that the nominee embodied the conservative view that the law should be a neutral arbiter - an umpire, as Judge Roberts put it consistently - not an instrument for changing public policy.

Judge Roberts presented himself as committed to the law above all else in his final round of questioning Thursday morning. Trying to reassure wary Democrats, he said, "I'm not an ideologue." He added, "And you and I agree that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

For all the intensity, conservatives were keenly aware that the debate was largely symbolic. Republicans, who control the committee and have a 10-vote majority in the Senate, are confident that the Roberts nomination is on a glide path.

The Judiciary Committee will vote on Judge Roberts's nomination next Thursday, and the full Senate will take it up the following week. The biggest political question, at the moment, is how many Democrats Mr. Roberts will get.

Several key Democrats, signaling the likelihood of a party-line vote in committee next Thursday, said Judge Roberts had yet to show his values and core commitments, beyond his commitment to the legal process.

Senators Charles E. Schumer of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California both said they were haunted by the question, "What kind of justice will John Roberts be?"

Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, pressed Mr. Roberts on whether there was any client he would not represent in his years as a lawyer. Would he have aided either side in a suit challenging a state constitutional provision on the ground that it restricted gay rights, for example?

Mr. Roberts, who assisted gay rights advocates in such a suit, replied, "I probably would have," saying that a lawyer should not sit in judgment of his client.

Mr. Durbin responded, "If this is just a process, a legal process and you'll play for any team that asks you to play, it raises a question about where would you draw the line, if you would ever draw the line?"

He said, "All of us are trying to get down to, what are your core values?"

Republican senators responded that Democrats were simply creating a new standard for judging a nominee who was clearly more than qualified - a point driven home Thursday by the American Bar Association, which pronounced Judge Roberts "well qualified."

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said, "Nobody can question your intellect, because it would be a question of their intellect to question yours, so we're down to the heart."

Mr. Graham added, "If we go down this road of putting people's hearts into play, and the only way you can have a good heart is, 'Adopt my value system,' we're doing a great disservice to the judiciary."

The challenge to Judge Roberts's values was perhaps most pointed in a panel on civil rights. Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, said that a strong federal role was key to enforcing civil rights for more than a century. Judge Roberts, Mr. Henderson said, repeatedly advocated a more restricted, limited federal role on civil and voting rights during his years in the Reagan administration.

Republicans argued that Mr. Roberts was representing the views of his client - the Reagan administration - in advocating a new approach to civil rights in the early 1980's. In any event, Republicans said, that was an argument over the means to reach equality and a colorblind society, not the goal.

Mr. Lewis argued that the Reagan proposals for stricter requirements to prove voting rights violations, had they prevailed, would have resulted in fewer black elected officials. "The judge was on the wrong side of history," he said.

Judge Roberts had an army of defenders on Thursday, including friends and former colleagues who testified to his legal acumen and disinterested professionalism.

Prof. Charles Fried of Harvard, a former Republican solicitor general, applauded Judge Roberts for adhering to his views of the law, even when doing so led to outcomes his opponents have attacked. "I wonder whether the critics are not really complaining that Judge Roberts didn't start with a result - their result - and then wrestle the law around until it fitted," Professor Fried said.

"He knows the difference between law and politics," Professor Fried said. "Judge Roberts seems to understand this down to his shoes."

At the end of the hearing, as at the beginning, Judge Roberts's views on privacy, and the uncertainty over whether that would translate into support for a constitutional right to abortion, loomed large.

Karen Pearl, interim president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, testified against Judge Roberts's nomination, citing a 1989 warning by Justice Harry A. Blackmun that "a chill wind blows" for abortion rights.

"Accepting anything less than clarity" from Judge Roberts, Ms. Pearl said, "would be irresponsible."

At the same time, conservatives were arguing that Judge Roberts had not gone too far in endorsing the right to privacy.

Leonard Leo, Jay Sekulow and Wendy Long, three conservative lawyers organizing support for the administration's judicial nominees, circulated a memorandum arguing that Judge Roberts's testimony put him firmly in line with the conservative icons Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

"His testimony on the right to privacy mirrored that of Clarence Thomas during his Supreme Court confirmation hearing," the lawyers wrote. "He refused to concede that there was a general privacy right, resisting Senator Schumer's effort to force the term."

After four days of hearings, some Democrats on the committee said they remained uncertain and confused. Senator Joseph R. Biden, Democrat of Delaware, said, at day's end: "My question is, Is Justice Roberts going to be a Scalia, a Rehnquist or maybe a Kennedy? If I think he's going to be a Justice Scalia, who I like personally very much, I vote no. If I think he's going to be a Kennedy, I vote yes. If I think he's going to be a Rehnquist, I probably vote yes because it won't change anything."

John Roberts And A Judge Of History (WP)

By Marcia Davis, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

John Roberts is well on his way to head the nation's judiciary, or so it's widely believed. Washington knows this in the manner that it knows such things: There's little left to do now but count the votes.

But yesterday, Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), the longtime legislator and civil rights icon, sat at the table before the Senate Judiciary Committee anyway. He sat along with other Roberts opponents -- Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and retired 6th Circuit Judge Nathaniel Jones, former general counsel of the NAACP.

Others had a seat at the table, too -- Jennifer Cabranes Braceras and Peter Kirsanow, both members of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and supporters of Roberts, were among the day's 30 witnesses offering their views on the nominee.

The diversity before the microphones in Hart Room 216, stood in sharp contrast to the scene that's dominated the week's proceedings.

In this exercise in representative democracy, the 18 committee members are all white -- 17 men and one woman, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). There have also been only a handful of people of color witnessing the proceedings, be they activists from the right or left, students or simply those who wanted to observe history.

"The nature of the Senate for most of its history has been an organization of white men," says Richard Baker of the Senate's historical office. "That's just a fact. No question about it."

Barack Obama, the newly elected Democratic senator from Illinois, is the only African American senator, the fifth in the nation's history. There have been only 18 people of color since its founding -- black, Latino, Asian or Native American. There have been only 33 women: 32 white, one African American.

"It still raises the whole issue of race and class in the very room," Lewis said later yesterday afternoon. "That we are still a society where minorities, people of color, they are not present, just not there. . . . They are not in a position to raise some of these hard and tough questions." And "that's why it is left on the shoulders of some of the progressive" whites in the Senate and other bodies, he said.

Public questioning of Roberts ended yesterday morning, leaving the ensuing testimony, pro and con, to be delivered to a dwindling audience. All of it is in the record, and the senators receive the statements. By the time the panel including Lewis was on deck, there were seven senators in the room, and few journalists.

Kirsanow and Braceras echoed Roberts's call for judicial restraint, with Braceras noting that the court "is neither the first nor the last word on civil rights."

Like Lewis, Jones and Henderson spoke of the special role the courts had played in expanding racial equality.

But it was Lewis's presence that offered the drama of history.

"When I was growing up in rural Alabama," read Lewis, 65, "I saw those signs that said, 'White Men, Colored Men,' 'White Women, Colored Women.' I used to ask my parents, my grandparents, 'Why racism? Why racial discrimination?' And they would tell me, 'Don't get in trouble. Don't get in the way.' "

"As a participant in the civil rights movement of the 1960s, I decided to get in the way. I was beaten, arrested and jailed more than 40 times for peaceful, nonviolent protests against legalized segregation in the South."

He spoke about Hurricane Katrina and how it had exposed, with its images of mostly poor African Americans facing the aftermath of the storm in New Orleans, race and class remain great dividers.

"In 1965, Judge Roberts was only 10 years old. He may be a brilliant lawyer, but I wonder whether he can really understand the depth of what it took to get the Voting Rights Act passed," Lewis continued.

Voting rights and other issues such as the right to privacy (a key element in Roe v. Wade) have been a focus of Democratic senators questioning Roberts. They have made it more than clear that they have not been happy with his responses.

Lewis knows how to count votes. He is aware of where Roberts may be heading in the coming days. And it didn't bother him at all that he was reading to an almost empty room. He also knows that the proceedings were televised.

"It is my hope that my testimony will give the senators, especially those who have not made up their mind, but even those who have made up their mind, some additional information, give them some food for thought."

"I don't buy this idea that during the time that Judge Roberts was a young attorney in the Reagan administration he was just doing his job and working for someone who believed one thing and he believed something else."

Lewis watched Roberts's questioning closely and found himself frustrated: "People wanted to know, they wanted to know how he felt. What is your overall feeling, what is in your heart?"

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) asked Lewis how he felt about all that Roberts had said. After all, Roberts noted, at 50 he is not the man he was in his twenties.

But Lewis isn't convinced. Nor does it matter, he says, that he is not expecting to change history this time.

There have certainly been colleagues and activists who say, "Why get in the way? This wheel is already rolling. . . . Now he's going to be the chief justice. . . . You shouldn't say anything, you shouldn't get in the way."

But that just wouldn't be Lewis.

Final Day Of Nomination Hearings: Yawn. (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

John Lewis, legend of the civil rights movement and Democratic congressman from Georgia, was giving it his all before the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday afternoon. "I fear that if Judge Roberts is confirmed to be chief justice of the United States, the Supreme Court would no longer hear the people's cries for justice," he pleaded.

Lewis's testimony was passionate, poignant -- and pretty much irrelevant to the outcome. Only four of the committee's 18 senators were on hand for much of his testimony; Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) could be seen consulting his wristwatch. Of the 120 seats in the press gallery, 104 were unoccupied. And dozens of seats reserved for the public went unoccupied.

Skipping the final session, committee members Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) gave a news conference outside the hearing room. The pair found themselves talking mostly to camera crews, as a couple of reporters half-listened. "Questions?" Brownback asked.

Nobody replied.

As witnesses gave their views for and against the man who will almost certainly be the next chief justice, one thing was clear: John G. Roberts has no Anita Hill. In 20 hours of questioning that ended yesterday morning, Democrats were unable to bloody the nominee significantly. With Republicans in possession of enough votes to confirm Roberts -- and no skeleton peering from the nominee's closet -- the fourth and final day of hearings into Roberts left the firm impression that senators were just going through the motions.

As Democrats proceeded through their final round of questioning, the Republicans did not conceal their boredom. Sen. Tom Coburn (Okla.) yawned. Brownback closed his eyes and rubbed his brow. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) let out a big yawn and fixed his hair. Five GOP staffers shared a joke, then passed a note to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah), who read it, looked over at the Democratic side and chuckled.

As Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) wrapped up his questioning of Roberts, he listed a number of documents he wanted included in the record.

"Mr. Chairman, if those items could be entered in the record?" Feingold asked of Specter.

Silence.

In the chairman's seat, Specter sat, scribbling or doodling, unaware that all eyes were on him to grant the routine request.

"Mr. Chairman?" Feingold said again.

This roused Specter from his reverie. "Yes?" he asked, looking up, and then he finally mustered "Without objection, so ordered."

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a stalwart supporter of Roberts, skipped most of the afternoon session. Instead, this distinguished committee member distributed laminated cards labeled "Crying Wolf Bingo" with words such as "Ideologue!" "Partisan!" "Far Right!" "Zealot!" "Extremist!" An accompanying news release chronicled "the sad history of attacks against previous nominees."

DOJ_NMG_0006070

In the hallway outside the hearing room, the scene had the feel of open-microphone night at a karaoke bar, as liberal and conservative lobbyists lined up in front of two idle television cameras to give their views. It wasn't clear whether any of the footage -- filmed by C-SPAN and a pooled network camera -- would ever see the airwaves.

Among the appearances most of the senators missed:

Roberts friend and legal partner Kathryn Webb Bradley, calling herself a Democrat who didn't support President Bush in either election, said she felt "confident entrusting my own rights and those of my children and their generation to John Roberts for safekeeping."

On the other side, Roderick Jackson, a high school girls basketball coach from Alabama, spoke of how a 5 to 4 Supreme Court ruling saved his job after he was fired for complaining about unequal treatment of girls. "A shift in even one vote would have left me without any remedy," he said.

The thing that seemed to alarm Democrats was not Roberts himself or his writings but the fact that ideologues on the right love him so much. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) held a news conference during the afternoon hearing and waved "publications from conservative journals" assuring conservatives that they should be "secure in knowing they have a true soul spirit with this nominee."

At times yesterday, the hearing took a promising turn, as when Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) pleaded with Roberts to say whether he would be a Felix Frankfurter, a William Rehnquist or an Antonin Scalia.

"I think if you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath; that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," Roberts replied. "And you and I agree that that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

It was a powerful moment -- while it lasted. Cornyn broke in to criticize Democrats' demands for more Roberts papers. Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) started talking about Paris Hilton's telephone records. Graham requested time to denounce the views of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's views on prostitution.

And, with that, Specter put an end to the questioning of Roberts.

Democrats On Receiving End In Flap Over Roberts (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Sen. John Cornyn turned the tables on Democrats yesterday, transforming the confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. into one of the nastiest partisan conflicts the Senate Judiciary Committee has seen in recent years.

Throughout the four days of hearings, Democrats called for the release of internal legal documents Judge Roberts wrote while working in the Solicitor General's Office. Republicans said those documents fall under attorney-client privilege and cannot be released.

Fed up with the repeated pleas, Mr. Cornyn, Texas Republican, reminded the Democrats on the panel of their stunned outrage when some of their own internal records wound up in public.

"It strikes me as odd, having been on the committee last year when we had an unfortunate theft of internal documents that were written by staffers of individual senators and which were published to the outside world," he said. "There was bipartisan outrage over that and we, as I recall, referred the matter for investigation and possible prosecution."

He was making reference to 14 internal memos that were downloaded from Democratic computers by two Republican staffers and were published by the Wall Street Journal and The Washington Times. The memos revealed a cozy relationship between Democrats on the Judiciary Committee and outside groups with special interests in the federal judiciary.

In one memo, staffers for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, recommend that a Bush nominee to the 6th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals be stalled until after that appellate court had decided a landmark affirmative action case.

"The thinking is that the current 6th Circuit will sustain the affirmative action program, but if a new judge with conservative views is confirmed before the case is decided, that new judge will be able, under 6th Circuit rules, to review the case and vote on it," the staffers wrote to Mr. Kennedy.

In another memo to Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, Washington lawyer Miguel A. Estrada was singled out as "especially dangerous" because "he is Latino." Mr. Estrada, born in Honduras, withdrew his nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit after being filibustered by Democrats for eight months.

At yesterday's hearing, Mr. Durbin reminded Mr. Cornyn that a Republican staffer -- Manuel Miranda -- "was discharged" over the matter, which was turned over to the Justice Department for investigation.

Just this week, it turned out, Mr. Durbin had written Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to commend his department for successfully prosecuting the man who hacked into the cell phone of hotel heiress Paris Hilton and stole her telephone records. In the letter, he asked if any precedent had been created to go after Mr. Miranda.

There was no disagreement from Republicans and, in any event, that was beside the point, Mr. Cornyn said.

"Surely if the legislative branch is entitled to confidential communications between our lawyers and us so we can do our jobs and get candid advice, the executive or the president is entitled to the same sort of confidential and candid communications," he said.

Drafting Condi

Americans for Rice, a group that's trying to drum up support for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to run for president in 2008, has put together a 60-second television ad that it hopes to air by the end of the month.

"While driving from Fargo, North Dakota, to Nashville in my Mini Cooper plastered with 'Condoleezza Rice for President' bumper stickers, numerous cars honked at me and the drivers either waved or gave a thumbs up," writes Crystal Dueker, the organization's national co-chairman.

"It set the tone for our successful fund-raising booth at the National Federation of Republican Women. Over 1,500 women from across the United States gathered to discuss politics, leadership and a vision for the future of our nation," she said.

About 190 women donated an average of $15 each toward the funds to put the ad on television. In the meantime, it can be viewed at www.americansforrice.com.

Religious test

"They should be ashamed. We should be ashamed. We have not progressed much in 45 years it seems, and we appear to be traveling in the wrong direction," Manuel Miranda writes at www.OpinionJournal.com.

"Article VI of the Constitution prohibits a religious test from being imposed on nominees to public office. The clause was motivated by the experience of Catholics in the Maryland colony and Baptists in Virginia who had been the targets of Great Britain's two Test Acts. These infamous laws of intolerance sought to prevent anyone who did not belong to the Church of England from holding public office. The Test Acts did not say that Catholics could not hold office; the bigotry was more subtle. Officials questioned would-be public servants to determine whether they believed in particular tenets of the Catholic faith," Mr. Miranda said.

"While questioning John Roberts on Tuesday, Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter asked: 'Would you say that your views are the same as those expressed by John Kennedy when he was a candidate, and he spoke to the Greater Houston Ministerial Association in September of 1960: "I do not speak for my church on public matters, and the church does not speak for me." '

"Hours later, Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California made it worse: 'In 1960, there was much debate about President John F. Kennedy's faith and what role Catholicism would play in his administration. At that time, he pledged to address the issues of conscience out of a focus on the national interests, not out of adherence to the dictates of one's religion. ... My question is: Do you?'

"How insulting. How offensive. How invidiously ignorant to question someone like Judge Roberts with such apparent presumption and disdain for the religion he practices. The JFK question is not just the camel's nose of religious intolerance; it is the whole smelly camel."

Dean screams

The Democratic National Committee yesterday stepped up its attacks on Judge John G. Roberts Jr., with DNC Chairman Howard Dean saying that the Supreme Court nominee was "the wrong man at the wrong time for our country."

Mr. Dean used similar phasing during his ill-fated 2004 presidential campaign when he condemned the U.S. war in Iraq, calling it "the wrong war in the wrong place at the wrong time."

"The skills John Roberts displays are like those of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove or House Republican Leader Tom DeLay. Both of those men have sharp political minds — they are among the smartest in Washington. But they use those skills to push a narrow ideology and win at any costs," he said.

"Roberts has spent a career using the law to protect corporate interests and roll back the rights that protect us all," Mr. Dean said in an e-mail fundraising solicitation to Democratic Party members.

Hatch's hint

Among the witnesses who testified in support of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. during yesterday's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing was Utah District Judge Denise Posse-Blanco Lindberg. Judge Lindberg seraved as a lawyer with Judge Roberts at the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson LLP, and worked with him as a Supreme Court clerk.

Observers have suggested that President Bush would like to make a Hispanic or a woman his next Supreme Court nominee, and Judge Lindberg is both — a point that Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, made sure to emphasize yesterday.

After Judge Lindberg had testified, Mr. Hatch thanked her effusively for her testimony and recited her impressive biography: The daughter of a Puerto Rican mother and a Cuban father, she was 9 years old when her family fled Cuba after communist dictator Fidel Castro came to power.

In addition to her magna cum laude law degree from Brigham Young University, Judge Lindberg also holds a master's degree and a doctorate from the University of Utah. She is a devout Mormon and the mother of two grown sons.

She was appointed to her state court position in 1998 by Gov. Michael O. Leavitt, a Republican whom Mr. Bush has since chosen as secretary of health and human services.

Praising her as having "one of the strongest backgrounds of any woman lawyer in this country," Mr. Hatch told Judge Lindberg, "I was particularly pleased to listen to your experiences as a woman, as a minority, as an able jurist. ... That means a lot to me, and I personally want to pay tribute to you as somebody who has not only excelled in the legal profession, but deserves the accolades that I've just given."

Arnold ready

The worst-kept secret in California is that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will seek a second term in 2006, and he is expected to make it official today, the San Francisco Chronicle reports.

"I'm not in this just for the short term," Mr. Schwarzenegger told a friendly crowd of more than 120 people at a town-hall meeting in Clovis on Wednesday.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who took office after the October 2003 recall of Democratic Gov. Gray Davis, left little doubt as to what he would announce during today's appearance in San Diego.

"If you start something, you have to finish it," he said. "People sent me to Sacramento to fix a broken system. I'm going to stay and fight for the people until the system is fixed once and for all."

New chairman

The House Republican Conference announced yesterday that New York Rep. Peter T. King will be the new chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

Mr. King succeeds former Rep. Christopher Cox, California Republican, who left the House to become head of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

'This Great City Will Rise Again' (NSDY/AP)

By Nedra Pickler, The Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- President Bush promised tonight the government will pay most of the costs of rebuilding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast in one of the largest reconstruction projects the world has ever seen. "There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again," the president said.

Standing in Jackson Square in the heart of the French Quarter, Bush acknowledged his administration had failed to respond adequately to Hurricane Katrina, which killed hundreds of people across five states. The government's costs for rebuilding could reach $200 billion or beyond.

"Four years after the frightening experience of Sept. 11, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency," the president said. When the government fails to meet such an obligation, Bush said, "I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

Bush ordered his Cabinet secretaries to join in a comprehensive review of the government's faulty response. In addition, he told the Department of Homeland Security to undertake an immediate review of emergency plans in every major city in America.

He also said a disaster on the scale of Katrina requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces.

Unusual for a prime-time address, Bush stood tieless in a blue dress shirt. At his back, the famous palm tree-framed St. Louis Cathedral was brightly lit. Elsewhere in the famed city, workers were still pumping out flooded neighborhoods and collecting bodies left behind in the frantic evacuation.

Bush proposed establishment of worker recovery accounts providing up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care during victims' search for employment. He also urged legislation to provide education, small business help and health care. He proposed creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama offering tax breaks to encourage businesses to stay in the devastated region and new businesses to open.

In the speech, which lasted a bit over 20 minutes, he said he would ask Congress to approve an Urban Homesteading Act in which surplus federal property would be turned over to low-income citizens by means of a lottery to build homes, with mortgages or assistance from charitable organizations.

Other proposals, according to congressional officials briefed by the White House, include:

A 100 percent reimbursement to states to cover their costs of health care for treating many evacuees through the end of next year.

$1.9 billion to reimburse states for educating displaced students, including some money that could go to religious schools.

Six-month forgiveness on student loan interest for affected areas, at an estimated cost of $100 million.

Bush repeated a hotline number, 1-877-568-3317, for people to call to help reunite family members separated during the hurricane. Moments later, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., criticized Bush, saying "Leadership isn't a speech or a toll-free number."

"No American doubts that New Orleans will rise again," Kerry said. "They doubt the competence and commitment of this administration." House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in a joint statement, said, "We are concerned by Bush administration initiatives this week waiving wage protections, environmental safeguards and protections for veterans, minorities, women and the disabled."

Bush described the hurricane's aftermath as "days of sorrow and outrage," and he said the nation had "witnessed the kind of desperation no citizen of this great and generous nation should ever have to know." He deplored scenes of victims calling out for food and water, criminals who had no mercy, and bodies of the dead lying uncovered in the street.

He said the suffering of victims was tempered by acts of courage and kindness. To the hundreds of thousands of people forced from their homes, Bush said, "You need to know that our whole nation cares about you -- and in the journey ahead you are not alone."

Promising better days ahead, Bush said, "The streets of Biloxi and Gulfport will again be filled with lovely homes and the sound of children playing. The churches of Alabama will have their broken steeples mended and their congregations whole.

"And here in New Orleans, the street cars will once again rumble down St. Charles, and the passionate soul of a great city will return."

Bush faced the nation at a vulnerable point in his presidency. Most Americans disapprove of his handling of Katrina, and his job-approval rating has been dragged down to the lowest point of his presidency also because of dissatisfaction with the Iraq war and rising gas prices. He has struggled to demonstrate the same take-charge leadership he displayed after the Sept. 11 terror attacks four years ago.

Across five Gulf Coast states, the death toll from Katrina climbed today to 794, led by 558 in Louisiana.

Faulting the government's response, Bush said that Katrina "was not a normal hurricane _ and the normal disaster relief system was not equal to it." State officials have blamed the federal government for failing to respond more quickly, and federal officials have pointed fingers at state and local officials.

Responding to charges that help would have been sent more quickly if most victims had not been poor and black, Bush noted that the persistent poverty, rooted deep in the Gulf region, was broadcast for all Americans to see.

"That poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America," Bush said. "We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action."

Bush said the goal was to get evacuees out of shelters by mid-October and into apartments and other homes, with assistance from the government. He said he would work with Congress to ensure that states were reimbursed for the cost of caring for evacuees.

Bush called for new measures to protect New Orleans from flooding and said the Army Corps of Engineers would work with state and local officials. "Protecting a city that sits lower than the water around it is not easy, but it can and has been done," the president said.

"The work that has begun in the Gulf Coast region will be one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen," Bush said. He praised Americans for giving generously for disaster relief, saying the fund led by former Presidents Bush and Clinton had received pledges of more than $100 million.

Rebuilding across the devastated region is expected to cost $200 billion or more in the near term. The final tab could approach the more than $300 billion spent thus far on U.S. wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Congress has already approved $62 billion for the disaster, but that is expected to run out next month.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., speaking after the president's address, said the recovery programs would add to the nation's debt. GOP leaders are open to suggestions from lawmakers to cut government spending elsewhere, he said.

AP Writer Nedra Pickler reported from Pascagoula, Miss., and New Orleans and Terence Hunt reported from Washington.

Bush Announces Massive Recovery Program (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Erika Bolstad

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Speaking from the center of a deserted and devastated city, President Bush on Thursday outlined one of the biggest recovery efforts in history for Hurricane Katrina and promised to overhaul the government's disaster-response plan.

"This government will learn the lessons of Hurricane Katrina," he said in a nationally televised speech from Jackson Square, in the symbolic heart of New Orleans' French Quarter. He assured Katrina's victims that they would get the help they needed to resume normal lives.

"The work that has begun in the Gulf Coast region will be one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen," he said. "I know that when you sit on the steps of a porch where a home once stood or sleep on a cot in a crowded shelter, it is hard to imagine a bright future. But that future will come."

Bush made his fourth trip to the stricken Gulf Coast on a day of hope for New Orleans. Hours before Bush's speech, Mayor Ray Nagin announced that nearly 200,000 residents and business owners would be allowed to return starting this weekend.

"It's a good day in New Orleans," Nagin said. "We're bringing New Orleans back, and this is our first step."

The mayor's optimistic mood contrasted with the finger-pointing and ill will that followed the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, which ravaged the Gulf Coast. Bush's speech was the latest in a series of White House efforts to address concerns about the government's response and questions about the president's leadership.

Bush, whose job-approval ratings have fallen to around 40 percent in a series of recent polls - the lowest of his presidency - went further than he ever had in acknowledging the missteps and accepting responsibility.

"It was not a normal hurricane, and the normal disaster-relief system was not equal to it," he said. "The system, at every level of government, was not well coordinated and was overwhelmed in the first few days. It is now clear that a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces.

"Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency," he added. "When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

The president also addressed concerns raised by televised images of suffering crowds of city residents, many of whom were low-income African-Americans. Polls indicate that most blacks believe that the slow government response was related to the race of the victims. Most whites reject that explanation.

Bush said Americans watching the disaster-relief efforts on television saw "some deep persistent poverty" that "has roots in a history of racial discrimination."

"We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action," he said. "When the streets are rebuilt, there should be many new businesses, including minority-owned businesses, along those streets."

Bush didn't put a price on the recovery effort, but most estimates put the tab between $200 billion and $300 billion, roughly equal to the combined cost to date of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. The government will borrow the money, driving up the national debt. This year's deficit is already $331 billion.

The president outlined a series of steps to aid flood victims: vouchers to let displaced students attend private or parochial schools at public expense; federal reimbursements to help states deal with higher Medicaid costs for evacuees; up to $5,000 for some unemployed hurricane victims so that they can pay for training, child care or other services that might help them find work; the creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone that would give tax breaks and loans in return for business investment; and new "worker recovery accounts" to expand unemployment benefits.

The school voucher plan is likely to be particularly controversial because Congress has blocked similar plans in the past. Democrats accused Bush of trying to use the disaster to advance an ideological agenda.

"The Gulf Coast region does not deserve to be treated as a laboratory for political opportunism or ideological experimentation," Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California said in a joint statement.

In New Orleans, the first significant steps toward normalcy will come on Saturday, when business owners will be allowed to return to some sections of the city. Areas set to open in stages include the central business district, the French Quarter, the section known as Uptown, and Algiers, located across the Mississippi River. Businesses on Bourbon Street will be ready to reopen their doors to greet customers on Sept. 26.

Residents will start returning on Monday, on a schedule devised by zip codes.

To return to the city, residents and business owners will be asked to verify proof of residence or business ownership with identification. About 182,000 people live in the areas to be reopened over the next two weeks, out of a city of nearly 500,000.

Despite the cleanup and plans for rebirth, nearly half of New Orleans remains flooded and uninhabitable. The Army Corps of Engineers estimates that it will take until Oct. 8 to pump all the water out of the city.

The death toll also continues to rise along the Gulf Coast. At least 794 bodies have been found so far, including 558 in Louisiana. On Thursday, government forecasters confirmed what had seemed clear for weeks: Katrina was the most destructive hurricane ever to strike the United States.

Hurricane Andrew, the previous worst storm, cost about $21 billion in today's dollars when it hit South Florida in 1992.

Bush pledged to work closely with city and state officials along the Gulf Coast during the reconstruction. He said federal funds would cover "the great majority of costs" of repairing roads, bridges, schools, hospitals and other public facilities. He said all expenditures would be closely monitored to guard against fraud and waste.

White House aides selected a setting for Bush's remarks that provided a reassuring view of one of the city's most recognizable landmarks. The square, dominated by the cream-colored spires of St. Louis Cathedral and a statue of Andrew Jackson on horseback, was spruced up Monday by a fire-fighting crew from Arizona.

The crew, part of a California-based emergency-response team, was in New Orleans to help set up accommodations, showers and meal tents for thousands of federal law enforcement workers helping with the cleanup. Sam Wilbanks, a U.S. Forest Service employee on the emergency-response team, said crew members weren't aware of Bush's visit when they volunteered to clean the square.

The White House kept the site of Bush's speech secret until Wednesday night, and troops from the 82nd Airborne patrolled the area. The precautions guaranteed that Bush wouldn't face the kind of heckling that Vice President Dick Cheney endured during his recent visit to the Gulf Coast, when he was loudly cursed.

Mr. Bush In New Orleans (NYT)

President Bush said three things last night that desperately needed to be said. He forthrightly acknowledged his responsibility for the egregious mishandling of the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. He spoke clearly and candidly about race and poverty. And finally, he was clear about what would be needed to bring back the Gulf Coast and said the federal government would have to lead and pay for that effort.

Once again, as he did after 9/11, Mr. Bush has responded to disaster with disconcerting uncertainty, then risen to the occasion later. Once again, he has delivered a speech that will reassure many Americans that he understands the enormity of the event and the demands of leadership to come.

But there are plenty of reasons for concern. After 9/11, Mr. Bush responded not only with a stirring speech at the ruins of the World Trade Center and a principled response to the Taliban in Afghanistan. He also decided to invade Iraq, and he tried to do it on the cheap - with disastrous results, for which the country continues to pay every day.

This time, Mr. Bush must come up with a more coherent and well-organized follow-through.

Clearly chastened by the outcry over his slow response to the disaster and his administration's bumbling performance, Mr. Bush said last night that he was prepared to undertake "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen." If he is sincere about his commitment to New Orleans and the other damaged localities, and to the displaced residents, he may have a fight on his hands in persuading Congress to support such an ambitious and necessary effort. Obviously, any official with even a minimal sense of responsibility would understand that this work will have to begin with a promise to give up on any more of the Republican Party's cherished tax cuts.

The speech, as good as it was, marks only a moment of clarity. Mr. Bush's problem in dealing with Katrina has been, at bottom, the same one that has bedeviled the administration since 9/11. The president came to office with a deep antipathy toward big government that has turned out to be utterly inappropriate for the world he inherited. The result has not been less government, but it has definitely been inept government.

We have already seen what happened to the Federal Emergency Management Agency when it was taken over by an administration that didn't like large federal agencies with sweeping mandates. For Iraq, the White House asserted that open-ended and no-bid contracts doled out to big corporations run by people known to government officials would mean swifter, more efficient operations. What we got was gross inefficiency, which has run up costs while failing in many cases to do the jobs required.

Given this history, it's impossible not to worry about what will happen to the billions of dollars being committed to New Orleans, especially since the Army Corps of Engineers' top man in the reclamation effort was once the corps' top man overseeing contracts in Iraq.

The administration is staffed several levels deep with officials who share their leader's distrust of large, expensive federal undertakings. But it is now faced with an unprecedented task: housing hundreds of thousands of homeless people, making sure their children are educated over the short term and eventually getting them a start on a new life. There is no way to do that without a focused federal effort.

Last night, the president was particularly strong when discussing the nation's shocking lack of preparedness for disaster, and the stark fact - obvious to every television viewer around the globe - that the people left homeless and endangered by Katrina were in the main poor and black.

The entire nation, he said, saw the poverty that "has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America." Polls show that black Americans are far angrier and more skeptical than whites about the administration's actions since the storm. Mr. Bush's words could begin a much-needed healing process. But that will happen only if they are followed by deeds that are as principled, disciplined and ambitious as Mr. Bush's speech.

Bush's Buffeted Leadership (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann, Staff Writer

The Christian Science Monitor, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - As New Orleans and the devastated Gulf Coast region look ahead to rebuilding and renewal, so, too, President Bush is digging out from the political damage hurricane Katrina has wreaked on his presidency.

The biggest blow to Bush, personally, may be to his image as a leader - the core quality that gave him high marks for his handling of 9/11 and, eventually, helped him win a second term.

As he ran for reelection last year, polls consistently showed a majority of the public credited him for leadership, even as they disagreed with him on many issues. Now, for the first time, less than half the public (49 percent) say he has "strong leadership qualities," down from 63 percent last year, according to a Newsweek poll last week.

Bush's planned prime-time address to the nation Thursday night, to be delivered from New Orleans, will mark the latest in a series of steps aimed at moving away from the early finger-pointing and appearance of detachment, and toward a can-do approach.

The president was to announce an unprecedented federal commitment to rebuilding the flood zone, with a price tag that aides say could top $200 billion. And Friday Bush will make remarks at Washington's National Cathedral as part of his proclaimed National Day of Prayer and Remembrance for the Victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Both speeches follow the president's "buck stops here" moment on Tuesday, when he declared, "To the extent the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

One lesson for Bush, says presidential scholar Martha Joynt Kumar, is "that [you] can get it right as a leader for four years, and that doesn't guarantee you're going to continue to get it right.

"You have to be poised on your toes, and you just can't get comfortable with the system you have," says Professor Kumar, a senior fellow at the Academy of Leadership at the University of Maryland. "Different conditions can come up that test your system. [Katrina] certainly tested it in a different way."

A hallmark of Bush's system is planning, in contrast with President Clinton's more chaotic style that nevertheless lent itself to sharp pivots in focus. The day after Katrina hit, Bush stuck with his plan to deliver a speech in San Diego marking the anniversary of VJ Day - and seeking to boost support for the Iraq war - before cutting his vacation short and heading back to Washington the next day.

"This man is an incredible planner," says Carolyn Thompson, a Chicago-based training consultant and co-author of a book on Bush's leadership. "He is not a detail person, but he surrounds himself with people who gather details and feed them to him.... Once everything's in place, then they go."

She's withholding judgment on the White House's initial response to Katrina, stressing that "this is a very closed-mouthed White House" and that, with time, more may be learned about the factors that fed into a stretch that, for now, "looks ugly."

What is known is that Bush treasures his time at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, and that while he has all the access to aides and information there that he would have in Washington, the human dynamic is different. Getting information from multiperson videoconferences, the system in Crawford, is different from the way it works at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, where a range of people can come through and make their points in meetings.

"You can get ahead of things a little better at the White House," says Professor Kumar, who often observes White House press operations in person.

Bush is also famous for not paying close attention to media reports, another point that may have delayed a full understanding of the magnitude of Gulf Coast devastation, and the 9/11-level of leadership required.

Even after arriving in the region, comments such as those making light of youthful time spent there and his "attaboy" gesture to Michael Brown, now resigned head as head of federal emergency management, showed he was still behind the curve.

By this week, when Bush made his qualified statement of responsibility - a rare moment for a president who has been loath to admit any failings - analysts agreed that he finally had it right. Bush's taking of responsibility "suggests he's finding his voice," says Fred Greenstein, a presidential scholar and professor emeritus at Princeton University.

Evacuees Find Comfort And Encouragement In Speech (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

HOUMA, La., Sept. 15 - Evacuees at a shelter here said they took comfort Thursday night from both the substance and the symbolism of the speech President Bush gave in the city many of them had fled.

When Mr. Bush talked about breaking the cycle of poverty and increasing the rate of home ownership on the Gulf Coast, one evacuee shouted, "Thank you! Thank you!" Others at the shelter, at the civic center in Houma, a small city southwest of New Orleans, nodded in approval at several points during the speech.

"I feel very encouraged because he's accepted responsibility, and in doing that, I feel that he has stepped up to the plate," said Evelyn Green, 58, a retired health care worker from the New Orleans area. "He touched me. I know now he's going to be there to help us rebuild our cities and towns. I take him at his word. I want to see everything he said tonight fulfilled."

Another evacuee, Muhammad Abdullah Ali, a 52-year-old security officer from New Orleans, said: "I feel that now he's going to take control and do the best he can. I felt good about the speech. It was a good speech. Now I want to see some action."

Others said they appreciated Mr. Bush's specific references to New Orleans culture and were glad to see the president speaking from Jackson Square, a familiar and comforting image from home.

The president's comments were greeted with praise from local officials, including Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat.

"Louisiana's people are strong, optimistic and determined to rebuild this great region," Ms. Blanco said, "but we cannot do it without the resources of our nation and our government. I take the president at his word when he says those resources will be there when we need them."

Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, described Mr. Bush's proposals as "innovative and bold" and said: "The president picked a very inspiring spot to make this speech. The image is worth many words in terms of what Jackson Square and the cathedral mean to New Orleans and what New Orleans means to the nation."

But the Rev. Jesse Jackson said that even the president's nod to poverty and race issues would have to be matched by actions.

"I thought there was a sense of urgency," Mr. Jackson said about the speech. "I think he backed into the war on poverty, and touched on the issues of race and poverty and class obliquely, which is new for him."

Bush Calls For Massive Rebuilding (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon, Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

President Bush promised a massive federal effort aimed at rebuilding lives, levees and communities on the Gulf Coast and said such large disasters call for greater federal authority, including a bigger role for the armed forces.

Mr. Bush, in a hopeful and sympathetic speech crafted at least in part to revive his political fortunes, sought to reassure Americans about the region's future in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, as well as the nation's own readiness for another disaster.

"Tonight I ... offer this pledge to the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes -- we will stay as long as it takes -- to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives," Mr. Bush said, standing before St. Louis Cathedral in the city's French Quarter. "And all who question the future of the Crescent City need to know: There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again."

Mr. Bush also laid out a range of initiatives to start the rebuilding process. They include a Gulf Opportunity Zone to foster job creation through tax breaks and small-business loans in the affected region; Worker Recovery Accounts to provide as much as $5,000 to pay for job training, education and child care for evacuees who need help finding work; and an Urban Homesteading Act that would give low-income people federally owned land through a lottery, in return for their pledges to build homes on it. He also called for strengthening the system of levees that protects New Orleans, much of which sits below sea level.

The president set himself a difficult balancing act, promising that his administration will do whatever necessary to rebuild, while also seeking to reassure both those on the Gulf Coast and his conservative allies that Washington won't dictate all the details of reconstruction or simply throw money at the problem.

He pledged a "close partnership" with the affected states as well as the city of New Orleans. He said federal funds will cover the "great majority" of the cost of rebuilding public roads, bridges, schools and water systems. But he also promised "a team of inspector generals" to review all expenditures, some steps of which already have been taken.

Mr. Bush made one of his most sweeping acknowledgments that the government's disaster response was lacking, saying that "the system, at every level of government was not well coordinated, and was overwhelmed in the first few days." He said that "a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces."

That announcement could mean a bigger role for the military in homeland defense, an idea that has encountered some resistance in military circles especially at a time when active-duty troops are stretched by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The speech left open the question of whether the federal government will offer to pay for private-property owners' losses in a region where many went without flood insurance. Other details unresolved were whether the administration will appoint a rebuilding "czar" with sweeping authority to help coordinate the effort. The scope of such an enterprise will likely involve enormous expense, but Mr. Bush offered no cost estimates or steps his administration would take to pay for it.

Democratic congressional leaders criticized Mr. Bush's plan for being long on comforting words, but short on action. They called for a "Marshall Plan" to "help families get back on their feet, back into homes and back on the job," according to a statement by Senate leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

Mr. Bush is hoping his long-term response to Katrina will shore up his standing with many Americans who appear to be losing confidence in his leadership. One such group is African-Americans, who have seen images of fellow blacks suffering due to poor initial emergency planning and management.

Last night Mr. Bush said he hoped his recovery initiatives would leave poor people better off than they were before the storm. "Let us restore all that we have cherished from yesterday, and let us rise above the legacy of inequality," he said. He also emphasized the need for people in the region to get preference for new jobs created by the recovery effort.

The administration hopes a well-organized and effective reconstruction effort will go a long way to re-establishing the president's diminished credibility as a leader with voters generally. In other steps aimed at improving readiness, he said cities "must have clear and up-to-date plans for responding" to disasters.

The president's speech came as Congress approved legislation advancing $6.2 billion in federal funds to ease the welfare crunch for states as homeless families from the storm are relocated. And Republicans leaders said a deal had been reached on a $6 billion to $7 billion tax-relief package for Katrina's survivors. The agreement, expected to go to the White House next week, would relax tax rules on corporate deductions to spur business donations and make it easier for households to claim tax breaks on their personal casualty losses. Families seeking to rebuild would be permitted to withdraw as much as $100,000 from retirement accounts without the customary penalties over the next year.

Bush Promises A Massive Rebuilding Of Gulf Coast (LAT)

By Edwin Chen And Mary Curtius, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — President Bush, declaring that the federal government had rebounded from its early failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina, promised Thursday to lead an ambitious rebuilding program — "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen" — on behalf of a battered Gulf Coast region that has seen hundreds of lives lost and tens of thousands of homes and jobs washed away.

In a prime-time address from this city's storied French Quarter, where once-bustling streets were desolate, Bush said Washington would provide most of the funding for a combined federal, state and local program to resurrect New Orleans and rebuild stricken regions of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives," Bush said.

Bush did not estimate a cost for reconstruction, but budget analysts predicted it would reach $200 billion — roughly the same amount spent on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan combined, and about double the inflation-adjusted cost of the Marshall Plan, which rebuilt Europe after World War II.

He called on Congress to pass an Urban Homesteading Act to let the poor build homes on federal property that would be distributed by lottery. He proposed a Gulf Opportunity Zone offering tax incentives and loan guarantees for small businesses.

The president said evacuees should be given up to $5,000 for training, child care and transportation to find new jobs.

Bush also called for faith-based organizations to join the rebuilding effort.

Conservatives have long favored some of the proposals as alternatives to conventional government programs.

It was unclear how much of the rebuilding task Bush's proposals would address. At least 350,000 replacement housing units are estimated to be needed, for example, but municipal governments' existing homesteading programs have created only a few thousand units of housing. Habitat for Humanity, which Bush cited as one group that could help low-income people build homes on federal lots, last year put up 5,455 units.

The president addressed some of the most sensitive issues since the hurricane: doubts about the federal government's ability to respond to future disasters including terrorist attacks, and the "deep, persistent poverty" revealed by television coverage of residents, most of them black, unable to flee the floodwaters in New Orleans.

He promised to address both problems.

"Poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination," he said, and the rebuilding effort will aim to "rise above the legacy of inequality. When the streets are rebuilt, there should be many new businesses, including minority-owned businesses, along those streets."

He said more residents should own, rather than rent, the new housing, a theme Bush has used in the past before minority audiences.

The president promised to uncover "all the facts" about the government's response to the crisis and directed cities to improve emergency plans for natural disasters, disease outbreaks and terrorist attacks.

"Four years after the frightening experience of Sept. 11, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency," he said. "When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

The 22-minute nationally televised address was the president's most determined effort yet to counteract widespread criticism of the initial response by officials at all levels of government to a natural disaster that killed hundreds of people, left several hundred thousand homeless and destroyed billions of dollars' worth of property. He wore no jacket or tie and talked directly to a television camera, with the historic St. Louis Cathedral and a statue of Andrew Jackson behind him.

The speech also represented an attempt to restore the president's credibility at a time when his approval ratings had fallen to new lows. The Katrina crisis appears to have eroded support for the fight against terrorism, the Iraq war effort and the president's second-term domestic policy initiatives.

Bush's advisors cast the speech as a bold gesture that might be a turning point for both the president and the institutions of government sullied by Katrina's floodwaters.

Their hopes were buoyed by positive developments in New Orleans, including an announcement by Mayor C. Ray Nagin that businesses in some parts of the city would reopen this weekend and that evacuated residents could begin returning to their homes.

Some African American leaders said several of the president's proposals sounded good but were difficult to judge because details were missing.

"Given that 80% of the people in the crisis were people of color, we want the proposals to be very responsive to the needs of people of color," said NAACP President Bruce S. Gordon. "That has to be precise."

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said he was disappointed by the lack of specifics.

Republicans praised Bush for being contrite and setting out a vision of recovery.

Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who had been sharply critical of the government's initial response to the hurricane, said Bush had provided the right response by conceding fault and accepting responsibility.

"We're taught as young kids: Acknowledge your mistakes, admit your lies," Foley said. "It's cathartic. That's what I think the speech did. He didn't just try to blame someone else."

Democratic leaders said Bush's assurances were not enough.

"The victims of Hurricane Katrina don't need just words, they need a plan that will lead the way in recovery, rebuilding and renewal," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) in a joint statement.

Bush began his address with remarks directed at Gulf Coast residents driven from their homes by Katrina. He offered America's sympathy and vowed a speedy recovery effort in which all levels of government would participate.

"You need to know that our whole nation cares about you, and in the journey ahead you are not alone," he said.

Yet even as he promised a thorough investigation of the government's initial response to the hurricane, which has been widely characterized as slow and poorly coordinated, Bush seemed somewhat defensive.

"It was not a normal hurricane, and the normal disaster relief system was not equal to it," he said. "The storm involved a massive flood, a major supply and security operation, and an evacuation order affecting more than a million people."

Speaking from historic Jackson Square in the heart of the French Quarter, Bush put to rest any doubts about the wisdom of rebuilding New Orleans, much of which lies below sea level. "Protecting a city that sits lower than the water around it is not easy, but it can and has been done," he said.

"There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again," he said.

Bush said federal funds would "cover the majority of the cost" of repairing public infrastructure, such as roads, bridges, schools and water systems. He also assured residents that state and local officials would have the primary role in planning their futures, and he promised to deploy "a team of inspectors general" to make sure the money was spent wisely.

The president did not put a price tag on the package of housing, education, healthcare and job assistance. Analysts have said the $62 billion appropriated by Congress is likely to run out this month.

In his remarks, Bush signaled he might seek a new role in domestic emergencies for U.S. armed forces, which played a crucial role in helping supply and secure the Gulf Coast.

"It is now clear that a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces, the institution of our government most capable of massive logistical operations on a moment's notice," Bush said.

Although the president did not provide details, White House officials have said the administration would review whether to expand the president's power to send troops into disaster areas and to assign them law enforcement duties.

Others have proposed more drastic changes. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) asked the Pentagon this week to review the Posse Comitatus Act, which prohibits active-duty U.S. troops from carrying out law enforcement missions within the United States.

Bush's address came at a critical point in his presidency, largely a result of what Washington-based pollster Andrew Kohut called "a summer's worth of bad news" — soaring gas prices, escalating violence in Iraq and, finally, Katrina.

Bush has seen his job approval ratings plummet to the lowest level of his presidency, fueling speculation about his ability to govern effectively in his remaining 3 1/3 years. Many of Bush's key initiatives — restructuring Social Security, permanently eliminating the estate tax, restructuring the tax code — were facing declining odds even before Katrina devastated much of the Gulf Coast and distracted Republican leaders in Washington from their agenda to approve tens of billions in unanticipated spending.

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense, an independent watchdog group that monitors pork-barrel spending in Congress, expressed disappointment that Bush had neither attached a price tag to his rebuilding commitment nor offered to offset the emergency spending with budget cuts.

"The lack of a spending plan makes this speech appear to be more about political damage control than disaster relief," Ellis said. "The bottom line is, we can't afford to simply hand over the keys to the Treasury."

Bush delivered his address at the conclusion of his fourth visit to the hurricane-devastated region. On his way to New Orleans, he stopped in Mississippi, where he toured a Pascagoula oil refinery knocked out of commission by Katrina.

After returning to Washington early this morning, Bush was to participate in a National Day of Prayer and Remembrance for hurricane victims at the National Cathedral.

President Chooses A Serene Spot To Frame His Message (LAT)

By Paul Brownfield, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

The set piece was in sharp contrast to the backdrop that TV reporters and anchors have been using in the last few weeks, their dispatches filed from the edge of floodwaters and ruined homes, from shelters where lives had been turned upside down.

President Bush's address Thursday night, by contrast, was held in a Jackson Square lighted up like Disneyland, the president framed before the statue of Andrew Jackson and St. Louis Cathedral in the background.

It was Bush striking a new note, one that Americans could be excused for finding strange. We have been seeing only devastation on our screens, access to a fresh hell giving TV personalities and journalists instant dramatic heft.

It's where we've been seeing Diane Sawyer on "Good Morning America," Oprah on "Oprah" and Anderson Cooper on CNN. Several weeks of news organizations hunting for misery and devastation left the president searching for a counter-image.

So the spooky placidity of Jackson Square, on what conveyed an otherwise peaceful evening in New Orleans, seemed an oddly appropriate choice for a president who throughout this crisis has been unable to halt the image of a leader who has been neither here nor there.

The speech seemed to float in the same kind of limbo that the setting provided — was the point to allay our fears or take responsibility for the federal government's stumbling response?

Introducing the president, ABC News' Ted Koppel noted dryly that the White House was supplying the electricity used to light the stage. Of Bush's previous visits to the region, some via fly-overs, Koppel said: "It struck some people as literally and figuratively a little too removed from what was happening on the ground."

To be sure, "You really have to be here" has been the overarching theme of a rehabilitated television news business, anchors confessing to getting up-close-and-personal with the story, which has been another way of saying they're up-close-and-personal with Americans' pain.

"When I'm not there, I think about it. When I'm there, I'm consumed by it. I'll admit that … I plan to commute back and forth to this story for the foreseeable future," NBC "Nightly News" anchor Brian Williams told the Philadelphia Inquirer this week.

Bush, you thought, could have given this speech from the Oval Office, but he came to stake his own version of being there. And he chose the only kind of postcard left on the racks — the impossibly serene one.

Bush Pledges Federal Role In Rebuilding Gulf Coast (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 - President Bush called Thursday night for the rebuilding of the devastated Gulf Coast through the creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone, a government enterprise that he said would provide help on taxes, housing, education and job training for the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"The work that has begun in the Gulf Coast region will be one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen," Mr. Bush said in remarks delivered in Jackson Square against the brightly lighted backdrop of St. Louis Cathedral, a symbol of the heart and soul of New Orleans for almost three centuries.

Mr. Bush delivered his speech, carried live by the major television networks, in the middle of the city's darkened French Quarter, where Army troops from the 82nd Airborne Division were on patrol. The Bush White House, well practiced in the art of presidential stagecraft, provided its own generators for the lighting and communications equipment that beamed Mr. Bush's remarks to the nation.

"And tonight I also offer this pledge of the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives," Mr. Bush said.

The mayor of New Orleans announced Thursday that residents and business owners could return to some parts of the city during daylight.

Mr. Bush ordered an immediate review of emergency plans for all cities, and said there was a need for greater federal authority and a broader role for armed forces in certain emergencies. He called for a federal government assessment of his administration's response to the storm and said that he would work with both parties in Congress in an investigation of what went wrong.

"This government will learn the lessons of Hurricane Katrina," Mr. Bush said.

The president did not, however, embrace calls for an independent commission to investigate the disaster.

White House officials viewed the speech as the culmination of a pivotal week in which Mr. Bush tried to turn around his image as a chief executive slow to respond to the greatest natural disaster in American history. The speech was meant to portray Mr. Bush as a forceful leader in control of the crisis and sympathetic to the people in the region.

"Tonight, so many victims of the hurricane and flood are far from home and friends and familiar things," Mr. Bush said. "You need to know that our whole nation cares about you, and in the journey ahead you are not alone. To all who carry a burden, I extend the deepest sympathy of our country."

Mr. Bush, dressed uncharacteristically in shirt-sleeves for a formal national address, said that the Gulf Opportunity Zone, encompassing Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, would provide tax incentives and loans for small businesses, including, he pointed out, minority-owned enterprises. Mr. Bush also said the federal government would provide evacuees with accounts of up to $5,000 that they could use for job training and education.

In addition, he asked Congress to pass what he called an Urban Homesteading Act, which would provide building sites on federal land through a lottery to low-income citizens, free of charge. In return, Mr. Bush said, residents would promise to build on the lots, with either a mortgage or help from a charitable organization like Habitat for Humanity.

Mr. Bush spoke after he was driven through empty, pitch-black streets, where members of the 82nd Airborne stood on corners in the darkness saluting the motorcade.

"I am speaking to you from the city of New Orleans, nearly empty, still partly under water and waiting for life and hope to return," Mr. Bush said from a lectern set up in the grass and hidden behind camouflage netting in Jackson Square.

In the aftermath of the storm, Mr. Bush said, "we have seen fellow citizens left stunned and uprooted searching for loved ones, and grieving for the dead and looking for meaning in a tragedy that seems so blind and random."

In his fourth trip to the region since the storm, Mr. Bush directly addressed the suffering of the largely poor, black evacuees at the New Orleans Superdome and convention center: "We have also witnessed the kind of desperation no citizen of this great and generous nation should ever have to know - fellow Americans calling out for food and water, vulnerable people left at the mercy of criminals who had no mercy and the bodies of the dead lying uncovered and untended in the street."

The president said state and local officials would have the primary role in planning for reconstruction, and in changing zoning laws and building codes. He listed many of the relief efforts now under way, including the registration of evacuees and retraining for workers.

Mr. Bush also tackled the tough issues of race and poverty that have been the source of enormous criticism and caused even Republicans to question the administration's commitment: "As all of us saw on television, there is also some deep, persistent poverty in this region as well. And that poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America. We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action. So let us restore all that we have cherished from yesterday, and let us rise above the legacy of inequality."

Mr. Bush did not offer cost estimates for his proposals on Thursday night, but they were drawn from the kind of experiments - with "opportunity zones" and tax incentives - that Republicans have greatly preferred to huge federal spending efforts. The president seemed to try to balance a comprehensive government plan with an assurance that Washington would back away and allow Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama - and the city of New Orleans - to decide how to rebuild.

"That is our vision of the future, in this city and beyond: We will not just rebuild, we will build higher and better," he promised.

Aside from the opportunity zone, Mr. Bush also proposed "worker recovery accounts" of up to $5,000 that evacuees could use for job training and education. The proposal sounds much like the kinds of accounts set up after the passage of the North America Free Trade Agreement in the early 1990's to help retrain workers displaced by foreign competition, a program that met with mixed reviews.

But in his speech, Mr. Bush also left some of the most controversial ideas unmentioned. His words seemed to imply that New Orleans neighborhoods would be rebuilt on the same sites that were flooded, rather than letting that land return to its original state, as wetlands that could provide a relief valve in the case of a future flood. Many of the most vulnerable neighborhoods were largely occupied by the city's poorest, and relocating those neighborhoods opened issues that one White House official said today "are not for us to deal with."

"Protecting a city that sits lower than the water around it is not easy," Mr. Bush said, "but it can and has been done."

He added: "And all who question the future of the Crescent City need to know: There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again."

The federal government, Mr. Bush said, will undertake a "close partnership" with Mississippi and Louisiana, with New Orleans and other Gulf Coast cities so they can rebuild in a "sensible, well-planned way." He said the federal government will cover the majority of the costs of rebuilding the infrastructure in the disaster zone, from roads and bridges to schools and water systems.

The president said he expected the work to be done quickly, and that taxpayers would expect it to be performed "honestly and wisely." He promised to have a team of inspectors reviewing all expenditures.

But many Republicans predicted that the costs could run as high or higher than the war in Iraq, up to $200 billion, and noted that the White House had said $51.8 billion in emergency federal funds just approved by Congress, on top of an earlier $10 billion, would last for just a few weeks. Mr. Bush did not name a lead rebuilding official in the speech, as some White House officials are urging, and Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, did not rule out the naming of such an official at a later date. Gen. Tommy Franks, who commanded forces in Afghanistan and Iraq, and John F. Welch Jr., the former chief executive of General Electric, are names often mentioned by Republicans as possibilities.

The president's proposal for an opportunity zone draws on more than a decade of federal experience with offering tax credits and other incentives for investment in economically depressed areas.

In 2002, the Bush administration selected New Orleans as a renewal community, eligible to share in billions of dollars worth of federal tax incentives intended to stimulate job growth and economic development. Last October, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana said the program had helped create jobs and must expand across the Delta.

Mr. Bush's proposal goes further. He would provide tax breaks, loans and loan guarantees to encourage businesses to invest in areas hit by the hurricane.

The Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress, said last year that federal agencies did not collect the data needed to assess the existing program or to show how the tax benefits had been used.

The president's comments were met with praise from local officials, including Ms. Blanco, who along with other local officials listened to Mr. Bush's speech from a bench in Jackson Square.

"Louisiana's people are strong, optimistic and determined to rebuild this great region, but we cannot do it without the resources of our nation and our government," she said. "I take the president at his word when he says those resources will be there when we need them."

Bullhorn Or Not, Bush Aims For A Boost Speech Is Chance To Change Minds, But This Isn't 9/11 (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his advisers never said publicly that they thought he needed another "bullhorn moment" like his spontaneous post-9/11 rallying cry at Ground Zero, but they knew Thursday's speech about Hurricane Katrina recovery was crucial.

The dramatic backdrop, the prime-time scheduling and Bush's emphatic pledge to use all the federal government's power to rebuild signaled that a great deal was at stake. "We will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes," Bush said.

But his big ideas — proposals for tax and loan incentives for businesses, cash to help evacuees find jobs and free federal land for homes — were ignored in statements by Democrats in Congress after Bush spoke.

Martin Kaplan, associate dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Southern California, called the initiatives "good use of government from a guy who's demonized it these last five years."

Ken Khachigian, who worked for Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan, called the speech a blend "of salve and solutions" that was appropriately low-key and included sympathy and "a message of hope."

Bush needed some hope himself. Since the sluggish initial response to the hurricane, polls have shown a decline of confidence in his leadership. That could undercut the U.S. mission in Iraq, sideline his domestic agenda and diminish his effectiveness through his remaining years in office.

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll released this week found that 52% of Americans consider Bush a strong and decisive leader — the lowest rating of his presidency on those characteristics.

Bush's speech was part of a strategy that has included four trips to the region, his statement Tuesday taking responsibility for problems and unprecedented federal spending on recovery. He did not, however, name a "czar" to oversee reconstruction.

Bush has spoken in prime-time at key moments, including:

•On July 19, he said he was nominating Judge John Roberts to the Supreme Court.

•On June 28, he delivered an update on Iraq from Fort Bragg in California.

•On the first anniversary of 9/11, he spoke at Ellis Island, the Statue of Liberty behind him.

The New Orleans speech was most reminiscent of that one. In the 2002 speech, Bush spoke of pain and healing and set the stage for another defining event, the war with Iraq that began six months later. "America has entered a great struggle that tests our strength," he said then.

Thursday's speech also was intended to be a pivot point for Bush, shifting attention from mistakes to a new national challenge. "All Americans are needed in this common effort," he said.

Unlike in the aftermath of 9/11, there are few signs now of a pause in political partisanship, and Bush's plea for unity seems unlikely to end criticism. "No American doubts that New Orleans will rise again, they doubt the competence and commitment of this administration," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass.

Democrats said it's too late for Bush to regain the aura of decisiveness that sustained him in other crises. "The fundamental positive feelings the American people had for him are gone," said Joe Lockhart, a former press secretary for President Clinton.

Kaplan said this speech couldn't replicate the bullhorn moment, when Bush vowed payback for terrorists. "It was seen by everyone as authentic, genuine and spontaneous," Kaplan said, but on Thursday, "the subtext — please like me again — was louder than the text."

Bush can't solve his problems with one speech, said Republican pollster Steve Kinney. But Bush is again showing "his ability to connect with people's hearts."

Khachigian said Clinton's rebound after his 1998 impeachment showed that predictions of political ruin can be wrong. “Presidents tend to get all the burden on disasters like this,” he said. “They also get all the benefit when recovery takes place.”

A Bid To Repair A Presidency (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

The main text of President Bush's nationally televised address last night was the rebuilding of New Orleans and the Gulf Coast, but the clear subtext was the rebuilding of a presidency that is now at its lowest point ever, confronted by huge and simultaneous challenges at home and abroad -- and facing a country divided along partisan and racial lines.

Hurricane Katrina struck at the core of Bush's presidency by undermining the central assertion of his reelection campaign, that he was a strong and decisive leader who could keep the country safe in a crisis. Never again will the White House be able to point to his often-praised performance after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, without skeptics recalling the fumbling and slow-off-the-mark response of his administration after the hurricane and the flooding in New Orleans.

His response to these criticisms last night was a speech largely shorn of soaring rhetoric and stirring turns of phrase of the kind that marked his efforts to rally the country after the terrorist attacks. Instead, as if recognizing that his own road back will be one marked by steady but small steps, he spoke with workmanlike focus, spelling out the details of what has been done and will be done to help those displaced by the storm.

Katrina has added an enormous new burden to a presidency already bending under the stresses of public dissatisfaction with Bush's policies in Iraq and growing anger over rising gas prices. Bush's objective last night was to set out a strategy and commitment for recovery along the Gulf Coast. But the critical question is whether the damage will limit his ability to govern effectively in the remaining 40 months of his presidency and whether he will successfully rebuild the Gulf Coast and Iraq, let alone win approval for other major initiatives on taxes and Social Security.

In again taking responsibility for the federal government's failures, Bush signaled last night that the White House has decided not to contest the widespread perceptions that his administration failed in the early days of the crisis. By embracing those criticisms, they hope to make the issue a sideshow that will play out sometime in the future. Instead, after a halting start, the White House appears intently focused on demonstrating the president's capacity to manage the huge rebuilding effort ahead.

Bush's advisers believe that, despite the partisan finger-pointing over what happened, most Americans are not looking back and will judge the president on what happens going forward. But as Iraq has shown over the past two years, the facts on the ground shape public confidence in the president more than words or promises.

There is nothing certain about the success he hopes to demonstrate. The rebuilding at Ground Zero in New York has taken four years, and although the work in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast will begin almost immediately, the scope of the reconstruction virtually guarantees debates and delays that could sap public patience. Already there are signs of a brewing battle between business and government elites and organizers working with those displaced over whose voices will be heard in shaping the reconstruction.

Second-term slumps hit every reelected president, but often they come later than this one. Bush has little time to waste to rejuvenate his governing capacity, given the reality that lame-duck status awaits him in the not-too-distant future. But just as it will take time to rebuild New Orleans and the Gulf Coast, it may take many months for Bush to rebound from what now troubles his presidency. Given the added burdens of Iraq and the economy, the president's road to recovery "will be longer and more difficult," said Ross K. Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University.

The road back will also be contentious. Republicans and Democrats are at swords' points over who should investigate what happened -- a congressional committee as the GOP favors or an independent investigation proposed by the Democrats.

The president also may face opposition to his proposal to give the federal government and the U.S. military greater authority in a time of such disaster. There will be no hesitancy on either side to spend what it takes to rebuild -- Bush last night envisioned one of the largest reconstruction efforts in history -- but already sharp differences are emerging over the policies that animate that rebuilding.

The policies Bush outlined last night bear the distinctive stamp of a conservative president, a hallmark of an executive who has never shrunk from seeking to implement a right-leaning agenda even in the face of a divided country. They are long on tax relief and business grants and loans, and focused on entrepreneurial ideas. Bush already has drawn fire from Democrats for suspending the law that requires contractors to pay prevailing wages on federal projects in the regions, and there will be a battle over the proposal to provide private and parochial school vouchers to children of displaced families.

At other points in his presidency, Bush was strong enough to intimidate and often defeat his Democratic opponents. Although the Democrats remain relatively weak, Bush's own problems have emboldened them to challenge him at every turn and to believe they are better equipped to deal with the challenges in housing, education, health care and urban poverty that the hurricane and flooding have produced. Competing visions of how the federal government should respond will produce a vigorous debate -- far from the united response to 9/11.

The public appears to have little patience with partisan bickering right now, which complicates the Democrats' effort to challenge Bush, but every recent poll indicates the public knows who controls both the White House and the Congress, and Republicans likely will pay a greater price in next year's midterm elections for any perceived failures by Bush or the federal government.

Among the most worrisome elements of the aftermath of Katrina to the administration is the vast racial divide that has opened up over the federal government's response, with an overwhelming majority of African Americans believing the slow reaction was racially motivated and a similarly large majority of whites saying race was not the reason.

Bush and his advisers have denied there was any racial motivation in the government's response, but they know there will be a continuing political cost if they do not turn those perceptions around. The racial gulf threatens not only the administration's hope of slowly attracting more black support at the polls, but also the fabric of an already divided society. "It is something that all leaders across the country need to engage in, and this president will," said a senior administration official.

The president directly addressed the racial divide last night, noting that the Gulf Coast is afflicted with "deep, persistent poverty" and saying that poverty "has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which has cut off generations from the opportunity of America." He pledged bold action to "rise above the legacy of inequality."

For those who doubt Bush's ability to manage multiple challenges, administration officials would point to his nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as the next chief justice of the United States, which appears to be moving easily through the Senate.

But what confronts him in the Gulf Coast and Iraq is far more complex. His speech last night was only the beginning of the effort to repair his storm-damaged presidency. He has proved in the past his commitment to stay the course once he sets it. The question is whether, in his weakened condition, he can continue to persuade the country to follow.

Bush's Approval At Lowest Level Yet (WT)

By James G. Lakely

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

President Bush's approval has slipped in the polls since the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina, but his speech last night from the devastated Gulf Coast promised an unprecedented federal spending effort and may mark the beginning of a political turnaround.

A Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll released yesterday put Mr. Bush's job-approval rating at 41 percent, the lowest level of his presidency. It was the first time that more than half of the poll's respondents -- 51 percent -- gave Mr. Bush poor marks.

Democratic political consultant Scott Segal, however, thinks the political storm soon will blow over, and the president will be helped by performances of New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, both Democrats.

"While there is no question that the administration is doing a better job of putting a competent face on recovery activities, they have also benefited from a political windfall," Mr. Segal said. "The New Orleans mayor and the governor of Louisiana have seemed intent on criticizing each other, which leaves a clearer path for the president."

The Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll supports that view, showing that 42 percent of respondents thought the state and local governments were most responsible for the problems responding to the hurricane. Just 29 percent blamed the federal government, and 19 percent blamed both.

Republican political consultant Bob Moran said Hurricane Katrina "will not have a national impact 14 months from now" in midterm congressional elections, largely seen as much a referendum on the sitting president as on Congress.

"The Democrats are acting out of weakness and not strength here. They are trying to shift blame away from the failure of local Democrats," Mr. Moran said.

Nonetheless, Mr. Bush publicly took responsibility for the problems, accepted the resignation of Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) Director Michael D. Brown and put new people in charge of the federal efforts on the ground.

Democrats, however, continue to exploit what they see as Mr. Bush's vulnerability on the issue, releasing critical statements almost daily and calling for an independent commission to study the administration's slow response to the disaster.

The liberal Campaign for America's Future is trying to tie the Republican majority in Congress to the performance of the Bush administration, saying the slow reaction to the hurricane proves "the failure of the radical, conservative attack on government."

"The president is claiming responsibility for the failure, but this wasn't just a failure to handle one natural disaster," said Roger Hickey, co-director of the think tank. "This debacle shows the failure of three decades of conservative, anti-government philosophy."

Mr. Segal said there are "many hard questions for administration officials to answer" about the recovery effort, but fears Democrats might be overplaying their political hand.

"The tone Democrats strike must be constructive and balanced, and not simply strident," he said.

Amid The Ruins, A President Tries To Reconstruct His Image, Too (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - George W. Bush, whose standing for the last four years has rested primarily on issues of war and peace, introduced himself to the nation on Thursday night in an unfamiliar and somewhat uncomfortable new role: domestic president.

The violence of Hurricane Katrina and his faltering response to it have left to Mr. Bush the task not just of physically rebuilding a swath of the United States, but also of addressing issues like poverty and racial inequality that were exposed in such raw form by the storm.

The challenge would be immense for any president, but is especially so for Mr. Bush. He is scrambling to assure a shaken, angry nation not only that is he up to the task but also that he understands how much it disturbed Americans to see their fellow citizens suffering and their government responding so ineffectually.

So for nearly 30 minutes, he stood in a largely lifeless New Orleans and, to recast his presidency in response to one of the nation's most devastating disasters, sought to show that he understands the suffering. He spoke of housing and health care and job training. He reached with rhetorical confidence for the uplifting theme that out of tragedy can emerge a better society, and he groped for what he lost in the wind and water more than two weeks ago: his well-cultivated image as a strong leader.

It was not the president's most stirring speech, but it conveyed a sense of command far more than his off-key efforts in the days immediately after the storm, when he often seemed more interested in bucking up government officials than in addressing the dire situation confronting hundreds of thousands of displaced and desperate people.

But if the speech helped him clear his first hurdle by projecting the aura of a president at the controls, it probably did not, by itself, get him over a second: his need to erase or at least blur the image of a White House that was unresponsive to the plight of some of the country's most vulnerable citizens and failed to manage the government competently.

Whether he can put a floor under his falling poll numbers, restore his political authority and move ahead with his agenda will determine not just the course of his second term but the strength of his party, which by virtue of having controlled both the White House and the Congress for more than five years has trouble credibly pinning the blame elsewhere.

"He was giving a speech as if the nation were disheartened and worried and had lost its spirit, but that's not what people were thinking," said Mickey Edwards, a former Republican congressman from Oklahoma. "They were thinking, why did the government screw up?"

To those storm victims in need of immediate help and to those who face the continued upheaval of their lives for weeks or months or longer, he offered an expansive government safety net of specific programs, from paying the costs of reuniting families to a commitment to moving everyone out of shelters into housing by mid-October. Doing so marked a distinct shift for a president whose perceived hostility or indifference to government's role in social welfare programs - manifested in budgets that have sought to cut such programs or curtail them - has long been a flash point in his relationship with poor and minority voters.

But if this was big government, it was at least in part on Mr. Bush's ideological terms: federal reimbursement to allow displaced students to attend private and parochial schools, tax-free business zones, a call for charitable and religious groups to continue with relief work. Having no choice but to open the fiscal floodgates, he sought to reassure nervous conservatives that he would guard against fraud and waste.

When it came to the issues hardest to address and most in need of sustained commitment, new ideas and risk-taking leadership - the gap between rich and poor, its causes and consequences, its racial components - he was less effective.

"We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action," he said.

Yet he spoke of "deep, persistent poverty" as something the nation had seen on television rather than as a condition that many citizens had been living in for generations. He defined the problem as regional rather than national in scope, and offered only regional rather than national solutions.

"The reconstruction, massive as it is, is really the easy part," said Bruce Reed, president of the Democratic Leadership Council, an organization of centrist Democrats. "Rebuilding confidence, especially among the poor and vulnerable, is going to be extraordinarily difficult."

In dealing with the more concrete aspects of the job ahead, Mr. Bush slipped comfortably into the language that he has used as commander in chief to comfort and exhort the nation as it has waged war, hailing those Americans who have "served and sacrificed" and vowing that the government "will stay as long as it takes" to get the job done, an echo, almost word for word, of his formulation for how long the United States will remain in Iraq.

The president forthrightly linked the failures in response to the storm to a vulnerability to a terrorist attack and said he wanted to know "all the facts" about what had gone wrong.

Mr. Bush called for unity in tackling the problems. But with only a camera before him, and New Orleans silent around him, he could draw no strength or self-assurance from the cheers of a united nation, as he did when he addressed a joint session of Congress nine days after the Sept. 11 attacks. Not only did his own stagecraft leave him alone in the spotlight, but whatever good will flowed to him across the aisle in those moments after the terrorist attacks is long gone, a victim of a polarized political culture that he did not create but to which he has often contributed.

For Mr. Bush, this was a moment for the country to turn away from what he and his aides have dismissively labeled "the blame game" toward a hopeful vision of a rebuilt Gulf Coast and a smarter government. But it is not yet clear that his performance will stanch the political wounds he has suffered or ensure that he can avoid being hobbled through his second term, not just by what he lost in the faltering response to Hurricane Katrina but by the rising death toll in Iraq, sky-high energy prices and worrisome deficits.

Democrats Say Gulf Needs A Marshall Plan (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Brian Debose

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Democrats yesterday said the Gulf Coast needs a Marshall Plan to get back on its feet and that President Bush should seek more aid.

"The families in the Gulf don't need to hear a speech from me, and frankly, they don't need to hear another speech from the president," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "What they need is leadership."

Speaking hours before Mr. Bush's televised address last night, Mr. Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the government must be prepared to spend on education, health care and other services to make the region whole again.

Hours before the Democratic leaders made their challenge to the president, members of the Congressional Black Caucus and civil rights groups proposed an eight-point plan to assist the Gulf region. The plan includes an estimated $100 billion for unemployment assistance, job training, school placement and aid to the cities providing safe haven to the displaced.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Urban League said they want to make sure minority contractors will have the ability to win federal reconstruction contracts.

The $51.8 billion appropriations bill Congress passed last week to fund Katrina disaster relief exempted federal contracts below $10 million from coverage under the Small Business Act, which assures contracting opportunities be provided for the economically disadvantaged. That target is $5 million higher than current law, and the groups said that would eliminate many minority contractors.

The CBC proposed a 50 percent residency hiring target for all contracts and a 40 percent minority vendor target for all reconstruction.

Meanwhile yesterday, the House, over the objection of Democrats, yesterday approved a bill that calls for the House and Senate to coordinate on an investigation into government failures in response to the hurricane.

The committee coordination passed 224-188, with seven Democrats and 217 Republicans in favor, and one Republican, one independent and 186 Democrats opposed.

Democrats had wanted an independent commission styled on the one that investigated the September 11 terrorist attacks, and said a Republican-controlled congressional investigation won't take a serious look at a Republican administration.

"After the flood comes the whitewash," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat.

But Republicans said it was the role of Congress to conduct oversight and that it would be an abdication of duty to turn it over to a commission.

Mrs. Pelosi earlier had said she would not have Democrats participate in a bicameral committee. But yesterday she backed off, saying, "We'll see where we go from here."

Mr. Reid, though, said he will not allow Senate Democrats to participate. In that case, the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which already is looking into matters, would become the Senate's main investigative body for Katrina.

Conservatives Balk As Spending Soars In Katrina's Wake (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The open-ended commitment by President Bush and congressional leaders to rebuild New Orleans and the Gulf Coast is stoking anger among conservatives over the Republican government's record of higher spending and debt.

Following the nation's worst-ever natural disaster, no Republican in Congress is opposing federal aid that already totals $62 billion and is expected to exceed $200 billion. But the party's conservative wing, led yesterday by Oklahoma's Tom Coburn in the Senate and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana in the House, is calling for offsetting "sacrifices" in federal spending. And they're backed by a growing chorus of conservative activists, columnists and bloggers.

"It's not about taking care of the folks that need us," Mr. Coburn said in an interview. "But I wouldn't vote for another penny until we get real about the hard choices of cutting some spending." In what would be a real break for conservatives, Mr. Coburn said he is also not inclined to vote to extend the Bush tax cuts absent some fiscal restraint.

The divisions go to a broader debate over the party's identity and legacy a decade after Republicans broke Democrats' 40-year control of Congress and nearly five years after they captured the White House as well.

But conservatives' rebelliousness threatens a range of Bush initiatives before Congress. Moreover, Republican strategists worry that widespread disenchantment among the party's bedrock conservatives could lead many to stay home in next year's midterm elections.

In a year marked by setbacks to Mr. Bush's foreign and domestic agenda, Hurricane Katrina's costs to the federal government have dashed the one boast Mr. Bush had -- that a sound economy was producing higher-than-expected tax revenue, and bringing down the deficit. Deficits are expected to be much higher than the $333 billion the White House recently projected for the year ending Sept. 30 and $341 billion for fiscal 2006.

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers, yesterday told a group of economists, "The costs of rebuilding after Katrina are, of course, substantial and will add to the budget deficit in the near term; incurring those costs is essential if we are to repair the unprecedented damage wrought by that natural disaster. This necessary spending should not, however, jeopardize the president's long-term deficit-reduction goals."

Administration officials also express frustration that conservatives in Congress are criticizing the White House even as Congress has balked at making the Medicaid cuts that Mr. Bush had called for earlier this year.

Also taking conservatives' hits is House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, after the Texas Republican this week told reporters that for all the complaints that hurricane spending must be offset by spending cuts, "nobody has been able to come up with any yet." He suggested that the government has little fat. "After 11 years of Republican majority, we've pared it down pretty good," he said.

"This comes as quite a surprise to most Americans," wrote budget analyst Brian Riedl at the conservative Heritage Foundation. He and others, including the Coburn-Pence group, gave Mr. DeLay's office their lists of proposed budget cuts, including some that Mr. Bush proposed in February. Mr. Coburn said the president's budget director, Joshua Bolten, told him there wasn't time to take up such proposals.

Mr. Bolten's spokesman, Scott Milburn, said that given the speed with which the hurricane-relief bills had to be passed, "It's just not realistic to expect that Congress could produce and also agree to offsets of that magnitude in just a few hours. It's also unrealistic to expect that cuts of such magnitude would not cause very deep disruptions in other portions of the budget."

Beyond spending, many conservatives are troubled by the prospect that a new government bureaucracy will be created to handle the Katrina response. Even before Katrina hit, they had become increasingly critical of the White House for the jump in federal spending on Mr. Bush's watch. They also cite the creation of the huge Department of Homeland Security, an expanded federal role in grade-school education and a prescription-drug benefit for Medicare recipients that is the biggest new federal entitlement program since Medicare itself.

Senate Republican leaders this week sent Mr. Bush a letter calling for "a 'Marshall Plan' for the Gulf Coast," in reference to the nation's huge post-World War II effort to rebuild Europe.

Among those who have brought ideas to the White House table is conservative Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker. His model is government-sponsored enterprises such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Mr. Gingrich proposes a Gulf States Redevelopment Corp., backed by the federal government but controlled and regulated by officials in the region, to issue bonds, make loans and grants, provide natural-disaster insurance, raise taxes and finance public works, including levee reconstruction.

"If we do not have a bold set of solutions to propose in the next week or two, the left will propose a huge government run bureaucratic rebuilding program with maximum welfare and minimum progress," Mr. Gingrich wrote in an email to conservative Republican senators.

G.O.P. Split Over Big Plans For Storm Spending (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - The drive to pour tens of billions of federal dollars into rebuilding the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast is widening a fissure among Republicans over fiscal policy, with more of them expressing worry about unbridled spending.

On Thursday, even before President Bush promised that "federal funds will cover the great majority of the costs of repairing public infrastructure in the disaster zone," fiscal conservatives from the House and Senate joined budget watchdog groups in demanding that the administration be judicious in asking for taxpayer dollars.

One fiscal conservative, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, said Thursday, "I don't believe that everything that should happen in Louisiana should be paid for by the rest of the country. I believe there are certain responsibilities that are due the people of Louisiana."

Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, called for restoring "sanity" to the federal recovery effort. Congress has approved $62 billion, mostly to cover costs already incurred, and the price tag is rising. The House and Senate approved tax relief Thursday at an estimated cost of more than $5 billion on top of $3.5 billion in housing vouchers approved by the Senate on Wednesday.

"We know we need to help, but throwing more and more money without accountability at this is not going to solve the problem," Mr. DeMint said.

Their comments were in marked contrast to the sweeping administration approach outlined by Mr. Bush in his speech from New Orleans and a call by Senate Republican leaders for a rebuilding effort similar to the Marshall Plan after World War II. Congressional Democrats advocated their own comprehensive recovery program Thursday, promoting a combination of rebuilding programs coupled with housing, health care, agriculture and education initiatives. The president also emphasized the importance of private entrepreneurship to create jobs "and help break the cycle of poverty."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said he believed that providing rapid and extensive help overrode the need to cut spending elsewhere. "I think we have to understand that we have a devastation that has to be taken care of," Mr. Reid said. "And I'm not into finding where we can cut yet."

That mindset is troubling to other lawmakers who fear that in addition to a reborn Gulf Coast, something else will rise from the storm: record federal deficits.

"We know this is a huge bill," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona. "We don't want to lay it on future generations." Given the fierce political backlash to the stumbling relief effort in the days after the hurricane struck, House Republican leaders have been reluctant to stand in the way of any emergency legislation. After the speech, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert acknowledged that the price tag means that "for every dollar we spend on this, it is going to take a little bit longer to balance the budget." He said he was willing to listen to ideas to pay for the aid, but, "Quite frankly, we have to get this job done."

Despite those comments, many Republicans are increasingly edgy about the White House's push for a potentially open-ended recovery budget, worried that the president - in trying to regroup politically - was making expensive promises they would have to keep.

"We are not sure he knows what he is getting into," said one senior House Republican official who requested anonymity because of the potential consequences of publicly criticizing the administration.

The fears about the costs of the storm are building on widespread dissatisfaction among conservatives about spending in recent years by the Republican-controlled Congress. That unrest was already high after Congressional approval of a transportation measure that critics denounced as bloated with marginal home-state projects.

That sore spot was rubbed raw earlier this week when Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader, suggested that the Republican Congress had already trimmed much of the fat from the federal budget, making it difficult to find ways to offset hurricane spending.

Mr. Coburn called such a claim ludicrous and other Republicans took exception as well.

"There has never been a time where there is more total spending and more wasteful spending in Washington than we have today," said Pat Toomey, a former Republican congressman from Pennsylvania and the head of the conservative Club for Growth. "There is ample opportunity to find the offsets we need so that this does not have to be a fiscal disaster as well as a natural disaster."

On another front, Republicans and Democrats continued their dispute over how to investigate government failures in the storm response. The House approved a select committee to oversee the inquiry despite Democratic objections that only a special commission outside of Congress could do a credible job.

The House voted 224 to 188 to establish a 20-member panel to work in concert with a similar Senate panel in studying the adequacy of local, state and federal preparations for the storm and why the relief effort was so troubled, stranding thousands in chaotic conditions without sufficient food, water or medical care.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, said the special committee was an effort to "whitewash" the inquiry though she later said she would not stand in the way if Democrats want to sit on the panel. In another effort to reduce Democratic opposition, Mr. Hastert on Thursday named Representative Thomas M. Davis III, a sometimes Republican maverick from Virginia, to lead the panel.

As for paying for the recovery, Ms. Pelosi raised the possibility of 50-year bonds tied to the reconstruction.

The conservative Republicans worried about the outlays said the president and Congressional leaders need to ask the public to share in the sacrifice and suggested savings could be easily wrung from federal agencies or in Congress in ways like eliminating pet projects.

"Katrina breaks my heart," said Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana and chairman of a caucus of more than 100 House Republicans who advocate conservative spending policy. "Congress must do everything the American people expect us to do to meet the needs of families and communities affected by Katrina. But we must not let Katrina break the bank for our children and grandchildren."

GOP Lawmakers Urge Cuts To Offset Storm-relief Costs (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

A group of Republicans yesterday challenged President Bush to propose spending cuts to cover some of the cost of aid for Hurricane Katrina, saying now is a time for him to show leadership.

"We just can't throw money at the problem, and if we do throw money at the problem, which seems to my way of thinking some of what we're doing today, we better figure out how we're going to handle the financial difficulties that come from that," said Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican.

He joined Sen. John McCain of Arizona, Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina and leaders of the House conservative caucus in saying that the hurricane offers a chance to cut parts of the federal budget.

The lawmakers said the government should spend what is needed to aid hurricane victims, but also must be worried about a deficit that the Congressional Budget Office says would reach $331 billion this fiscal year even without including hurricane spending.

Mr. DeMint said the federal role should be re-evaluated and, in places, should take a back seat.

"Our government needs to take stock of what America is already doing -- the money that has already been contributed -- and see that we have a better role supporting what America can do on its own."

The group won't find much support among Democratic leaders.

"I'm not really into cutting right now," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "I'm into figuring out a way that we can get the Republican majority in the Senate to care about those people down there who are still desperate."

He said that instead of cutting, Republicans should postpone Medicaid spending cuts they want as part of the budget process. He also said Republicans should put off $70 billion in further tax cuts this year.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said there could be "creative funding" for rebuilding. She suggested an arrangement like the Tennessee Valley Authority or the post-September 11 New York model of a regional board with a credit guarantee from the federal government.

The spending is enraging conservative activists, and members of Congress are proposing alternatives to deficit spending.

Rep. Louie Gohmert, Texas Republican, introduced a bill yesterday that would halt all government building except when related to Hurricane Katrina efforts and national security requirements.

Mr. Coburn said it was a "ludicrous claim" House Majority Leader Tom DeLay made earlier this week that he hasn't seen ways to offset the spending with cuts elsewhere.

In his weekly briefing, Mr. DeLay said it was appropriate to borrow money to pay for hurricane relief, and that the billions of dollars in transportation earmarks should be maintained.

"My answer to those that want to offset the spending is sure, bring me the offsets, I will be glad to do it, but no one has been able to come up with any yet," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0006094

Mr. Coburn said he would "be happy to have that debate with Mr. DeLay."

He said he has identified $74 billion in cutting room and that one place to start is the $315 million the highway bill spent for a bridge in Alaska that will reach a community of several dozen people, "who have a wonderful ferry system right now."

Mr. DeLay said Republicans could declare "ongoing victory" and, asked whether the government was running at peak efficiency with little cutting room left, he said, "Yes. After 11 years of Republican majority, we pared it down pretty good."

Yesterday, DeLay spokesman Kevin Madden said his boss "made it very clear that fiscal discipline is an ongoing process -- with an emphasis on 'ongoing.' "

"The House of Representatives has, in the past, worked through the budget and reconciliation process to pare down government spending and target wasteful programs," Mr. Madden said. "We will continue to adhere to those principles as we move forward."

Plan Includes Homesteading, Jobs Programs (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Promising "this great city will rise again," President Bush dedicated the federal government on Thursday to "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen" and pledged that it would pay most of the costs.

Bush put no price tag on the overall effort or his proposals to help evacuees find jobs and give them a chance to get free federal land for new homes. So far, the government has spent more than $13.7 billion of the $62.3 billion approved by Congress. The final cost is expected to be much higher.

As the area is rebuilt in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Bush said, the country must confront poverty and "rise above the legacy of inequality" so people can return to jobs and houses they own.

Bush said he wants all evacuees out of shelters by mid-October. Wearing no tie or jacket, he spoke for 22 minutes from the French Quarter's Jackson Square, with St. Louis Cathedral as a backdrop.

He acknowledged that the chaotic initial response to Katrina showed that disaster planning is inadequate and again took responsibility for failures by the government. Four years after 9/11, he said, "Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency."

He said he has ordered every Cabinet secretary to review the flawed response but did not suggest he'll agree to Democrats' demands for an independent inquiry.

The speech was part of a White House strategy to ease criticism of the initial response to the disaster and assert Bush's leadership as attention shifts to reconstruction.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, a Democrat, said she was "greatly heartened" by Bush's pledge. But Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada and Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, Democratic leaders in Congress, said "the victims … don't need just words, they need a plan that will lead the way."

Bush proposed three initiatives requiring congressional approval:

• An "opportunity zone" in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to give tax incentives to businesses that create jobs and loans and loan guarantees to small businesses.

•Recovery accounts of up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care for each evacuee seeking a job.

•A lottery to give low-income citizens of the region free federal land. In return, they would pledge to build homes on the lots.

U.S. Government Has Doled Out $13.7B On Katrina Relief (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — The federal government has spent more than $13.7 billion on Hurricane Katrina relief, the Department of Homeland Security said Thursday in a report for Congress.

The spending includes $7.2 billion for Louisiana, where flooding devastated New Orleans; $4.8 billion for Mississippi and $1.5 billion for Alabama.

Among the major categories of spending: $3.6 billion to purchase mobile homes and trailers and $1.8 billion for housing assistance, including $2,000 debit cards handed out to those left homeless, the report said. Costs for urban search-and-rescue teams totaled $52 million, part of $4.8 billion spent to send government workers to the region.

The report, a snapshot of spending on Katrina as of Wednesday, was the first of the weekly status reports Congress mandated last week when it passed a $51.8 billion emergency spending bill for hurricane relief. The report came amid calls on Capitol Hill for greater care in the spending of federal relief money.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., asked the panel's investigative staff to focus on disaster spending, given the record $62.3 billion allocated in the past two weeks. “Congress has properly provided historic levels of assistance,” Lewis said. “Now we must fulfill our constitutional obligations to conduct vigorous oversight over those funds.” The committee also will conduct hearings to track how the money is spent, Lewis said.

In a speech in New Orleans, President Bush said, “Taxpayers expect this work to be done honestly and wisely, so we will have a team of inspector generals reviewing all expenditures.”

Lou Reigel, the former special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office and now a top official in the agency's cybercrimes unit, said the city has a long history of corruption among public officials, although the climate has improved in recent years.

“You're going to have to be cautious when dispensing these funds,” he said.

“There is certainly a big risk,” said Joshua Hochberg, chief of the Justice Department's fraud section until last week, when he left to join a private law firm. “The availability of money seems to attract the worst types of white-collar thieves.” The potential for problems rises when the government waives normal competitive-bidding rules to speed the delivery of relief services, as it has in this emergency, Hochberg said.

The FBI has set up a tip line, 1-800-CALL FBI, to collect allegations of corruption and fraud. The Homeland Security Department has sent auditors and investigators to the region to monitor the spending of relief funds.

Bush Pledges Historic Effort To Help Gulf Coast Recover (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 -- President Bush, summoning the American spirit and "a faith in God no storm can take away," vowed from the heart of the Hurricane Katrina disaster zone Thursday night to rebuild this devastated city and the rest of the Gulf Coast with "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen."

In a prime-time address televised from the storm-battered French Quarter, the president appeared without coat and tie to mourn "a tragedy that seems so blind and random" while promising to help its victims with unprecedented federal assistance to secure homes, jobs, health care and schooling.

"You need to know," he said, directly addressing the dislocated and desperate, "that our whole nation cares about you, and in the journey ahead you're not alone. . . . And tonight I also offer this pledge of the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives."

Although Bush cited no price tag, he committed the nation to a plan that officials and lawmakers believe could top $200 billion, roughly the cost of the Iraq war and reconstruction, and which promises to reorient government for the balance of the Bush presidency. It will create much larger deficits in the short term, siphon off money that would have been spent on other programs and dramatically shift the focus of the White House, Congress and many state governments for the indefinite future.

Even as he embraced a spending program the scale of which few Democratic presidents ever advanced, Bush signaled that he would shape its contours with policy ideas long sought by conservative thinkers. He proposed creation of a "Gulf Opportunity Zone" that would grant new and existing businesses tax breaks, loans and loan guarantees through 2007. And in documents released before the speech, Bush called for displaced families that send children to private schools, including religious ones, to be eligible for federal money.

Eighteen days after Katrina smashed through the levees here, flooding the city, killing hundreds and displacing more than 1 million, Bush endorsed most of the criticism of the government's stutter-start response to the storm and vowed to investigate and retool its emergency plans, calling in particular for "a broader role for the armed forces" in future domestic crises. He ordered his Cabinet to reexamine disaster plans for every major American city. But he seemed to embrace a Republican plan for a GOP-majority congressional inquiry rather than the independent commission sought by Democrats.

During his 26-minute speech, the president evoked the horror that Katrina wrought on the region, recalling scenes of the abandoned seeking food and water, survivors victimized a second time by looters, and "bodies of the dead lying uncovered and untended in the street." Bush likened Katrina to the worst disasters of American history, including the Chicago fire of 1871 and the 1906 San Francisco earthquake. "Every time the people of this land have come back from fire, flood and storm to build anew -- and to build better than what we had before," he said. "Americans have never left our destiny to the whims of nature, and we will not start now."

Harking back to the "compassionate conservative" rhetoric of his early presidency, Bush infused his address with religious overtones. The trials of the last few weeks, he said, "remind us of a hope beyond all pain and death, a God who welcomes the lost to a house not made with his hands." The language reflected not only Bush's own faith but also his decision to bring back Michael J. Gerson, his first-term speechwriter and now a policy adviser, to help draft perhaps his most important address since launching the Iraq war in 2003.

Biblical citations and imagery are common touchstones for the president when he tries to connect with African Americans, who polls show have been especially aggrieved by the slow federal response because the victims left behind were disproportionately poor and black. "As all of us saw on television," Bush said, "there is also some deep, persistent poverty in this region as well. That poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America. We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action."

Bush spoke from Jackson Square, where a towering statute of Andrew Jackson is one of the few local icons left unscathed in the Big Easy. The buildings surrounding the square are boarded up and lifeless; a metal telephone pole across the street is split like small stick, a testament to Katrina's fury. The historic square commemorates the French handover of Louisiana in 1803; now, 202 years later, it marks the spot where Bush promised to rebuild the heart of Louisiana.

"There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again," Bush said. Eventually, he added, "the streetcars will once again rumble down St. Charles and the passionate soul of a great city will return."

The speech came at perhaps the most difficult political moment of Bush's presidency, with Americans losing faith in his ability to manage crisis and lead the nation out of troubled times, according to polls. His approval ratings have dropped to new lows in the past few days as gasoline prices have soared and chaos in Iraq persists. The speech capped a week-long effort to restore Bush's standing, starting with the ousting of the Federal Emergency Management Agency director, who oversaw the initial response, and a rare public embrace of responsibility for its shortcomings.

Sensitive to fueling further criticism, the White House said it paid for the electricity and lights used for the speech, limiting the local inconvenience. But Bush emerged onto the square without an audience, speaking directly into the camera from a lectern placed so the Jackson statue would be in the picture.

Congressional Democrats did not wait for the speech to lay down markers for how they think the Gulf Coast should be rebuilt -- and to lay the blame on Bush for Washington's sluggish performance.

"The families in the Gulf . . . certainly don't need to hear another speech from President Bush," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "What they need is leadership. . . . Let's be clear about what Katrina was: a failure of leadership." Reid called for "an American Marshall Plan" to rebuild the Gulf Coast and accused Republicans of balking at even greater spending on health, housing and education for victims.

Reid insisted on an independent commission to investigate what went wrong with Katrina. But Republicans rejected that.

The House adopted a plan for a joint investigative committee that would have a Republican majority but grant Democrats authority to call witnesses and seek subpoenas from the GOP chairman. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) was tapped Thursday to serve as co-chairman along with Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). Davis said Thursday night that among the first witnesses he will call will be Michael D. Brown, the FEMA director who resigned this week under fire.

Moving to expand the $62 billion in relief already approved for the Gulf Coast, the House and Senate on Thursday passed similar tax bills estimated to cost at least $5 billion over five years to allow storm victims to draw funds from retirement accounts without penalty and to extend several housing, job and child tax credits through the disruption. The legislation also offers charitable giving incentives while easing taxes on forgiven debts and unreimbursed business losses.

In deference to local sensibilities, Bush made clear that local officials will dictate how the city is reconstructed, and that a chief aim will be to lure those who fled New Orleans and other Gulf Coast communities to return rather than relocate permanently to the places where they sought refuge. At the same time, he suggested that local authorities would have to revisit zoning laws and building codes "to avoid a repeat of what we've seen" and suggested that sections of New Orleans be rebuilt on "higher ground."

Bush called on Congress to provide property on the federal domain free of charge though a lottery. In exchange, a recipient would be obligated to build a home with a mortgage or help from a charitable organization. He also proposed creation of "worker recovery accounts" of up to $5,000 for evacuees to use for job training, education and child care.

Bush arrived here after an earlier stop in Pascagoula, Miss. The New Orleans he found is a twisted shell of its former self, a once vibrant city that never slept left lifeless by Katrina's fury. Streets remain flooded, piles of garbage line them, and a stench seems to cling to every part of the French Quarter and beyond.

Vickie Johnston, 37, a hairdresser, sneaked into the city Thursday only to learn she had lost everything -- her clothes, furniture, and irreplaceables such as correspondence and photos. She voted for Bush twice but feels betrayed by all government. "They knew New Orleans was a fishbowl. They knew," she said. "Now it's a toilet bowl. How can they do this to us? Why did they let the water get so high?"

In his speech hours later, Bush expressed understanding of such sentiments, acknowledging that the response "at every level of government was not well coordinated and was overwhelmed in the first few days." The lesson he saw was the need for "greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces, the institution of our government most capable of massive logistical operations on a moment's notice."

As he did on Tuesday, Bush said he accepts accountability: "Four years after the frightening experience of September 11th, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency. When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

Baker reported from Washington. Staff writer Spencer S. Hsu in Washington contributed to this report.

U.S. To Pick Up Rebuilding Tab (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

President Bush last night said the federal government will pay most of the estimated $200 billion to rebuild the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast in what he called "one of the largest reconstruction projects the world has ever seen."

Standing in the heart of the historic French Quarter of New Orleans, a once-thriving city now deserted and still more than 50 percent flooded 18 days after Hurricane Katrina struck, the president also announced that he had ordered the Department of Homeland Security to conduct an immediate review of disaster-response plans in every major American city.

He acknowledged that "every level of government was not well-coordinated and was overwhelmed in the first few days" after the Category 4 storm slammed into Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"Four years after the frightening experience of September 11th, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency. When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I, as president, am responsible for the problem, and for the solution," Mr. Bush said in a 20-minute speech.

"It is now clear that a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces [-] the institution of our government most capable of massive logistical operations on a moment's notice."

The president used most of his prime-time televised address to the nation to reassure Americans that the federal government now has the emergency response well in hand and to lay out a specific plan to rebuild New Orleans and other devastated areas on the Gulf Coast.

He said his administration will not turn a blind eye to the "persistent poverty" in the region that has led to a "legacy of inequality."

Addressing the hundreds of thousands of evacuees forced from their homes by the hurricane, the president said, "You need to know that our whole nation cares about you -- and in the journey ahead you are not alone."

"Tonight, I also offer this pledge to the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives. And all who question the future of the Crescent City need to know: There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again."

Mr. Bush, who traveled to the hard-hit Mississippi coast before delivering his speech from New Orleans, did not directly address how the federal government would pay for the massive project.

Still, with the water level receding by the hour, the president pledged that "federal funds will cover the great majority of the costs of repairing public infrastructure in the disaster zone, from roads and bridges to schools and water systems. Our goal is to get the work done quickly."

But with some in Washington worried about the costs involved at a time of huge federal expenditures -- the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have cost nearly $300 billion so far -- Mr. Bush said taxpayers can rest assured that the reconstruction money will be monitored closely, with "a team of inspectors general reviewing all expenditures."

Democrats continued to criticize the Bush administration's response, with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi deriding the speech as "just words."

"It takes more than just taking responsibility to right the many wrongs that occurred over the past two weeks. The American people need answers from independent experts outside of the political arena to learn from the past and prepare and protect our nation and our communities for the future. We can and must do better," they said in a joint statement.

Congress already has approved $62.1 billion for rescue and relief efforts, with many private analysts forecasting that the expected $200 billion price tag of Katrina will add $100 billion or more to next year's deficit.

White House officials have told Congress that the $51.8 billion approved late last week will fund the disaster relief effort only through the first week of October, and senior congressional appropriations aides have told the White House that they need to see the next request by next week. Republicans say the next bill could exceed $50 billion.

Top White House officials acknowledged that the federal government has no choice but to run up the deficit to meet the crisis in the Gulf Coast.

"The fact of the matter is when our nation faces these type of emergencies, it unfortunately requires us to deficit spend," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said before Mr. Bush's speech.

Mr. Bush proposed three specific initiatives to speed recovery in the region, calling for the creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone to offer businesses tax breaks, provide federally owned land to "low-income citizens free of charge and pay evacuees up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care.

If Mr. Bush's plan is put into effect, it would eclipse the Marshall Plan, which helped revive Europe after World War II and cost about $100 billion in today's dollars.

Bush's Rescue Mission (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

When President Bush stepped to the podium in front of New Orleans' St. Louis Cathedral on Thursday night, his topic was rebuilding a hurricane-ravaged region. But his goal clearly was to rescue his presidency, which Katrina's storm surge tattered as well.

Two major polls released Thursday showed that about 40% of those surveyed approved of Bush's work overall, the lowest mark of his presidency. The federal government's slow response to the crisis on the Gulf Coast has compounded growing doubts about other administration initiatives, especially the war in Iraq.

Bush, who looked like he'd dispensed with his tie and jacket just moments before appearing on camera, promised "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen."

"There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans," he said, pledging to pick up the tab for "the great majority" of the infrastructure repairs.

The president listed the impressive array of initiatives undertaken to help evacuees. And he laid out a series of initiatives that would apply Republican principles to the reconstruction effort, including proposals to give away home-building lots to displaced families with low incomes and to slash taxes for entrepreneurs who create jobs in the devastated region. The president's call for a "Gulf Opportunity Zone" is intriguing, but he needs to make sure storm relief doesn't become a Trojan horse for every conservative ideologue's favorite pet project. Flat tax, anyone?

He left for another day any discussion of where the hundreds of billions of dollars to pay for reconstruction will come from, but that day can't be put off indefinitely. He praised the generosity of Americans in the wake of Katrina, but he soon may have to ask for some sacrifice to help pay the bills. The death of the "death tax," for instance, no longer looks certain.

To his credit, Bush acknowledged the government's failure to respond effectively in the aftermath of the hurricane, and he accepted responsibility for the federal share of the problem. He also prodded local leaders to do a better job preparing for what clearly is their role — evacuating, securing and provisioning their cities in the event of a disaster or terrorist attack. Yet Bush's assertion that a challenge of this scale raises new questions about coordination between federal and local officials begs the question: What has the administration been doing in the four years since the 9/11 attacks, if not preparing the country for such a catastrophic event?

Bush's speech helped him regain his political footing for now. But whether he rescues his legacy from the putrid waters swirling in the streets of New Orleans will depend on whether the aspirations expressed Thursday night are translated into a truly bright future for the region.

Bush Plan A Solid Start, But Key Is In The Execution (USAT)

USA Today, September 16, 2005

More than two weeks after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the Gulf Coast, President Bush at last seemed to have marshaled an effective response as he addressed the nation from New Orleans Thursday night.

Bush proposed a massive plan — one that comes with huge costs that he disturbingly offered no plan to pay for — but it was, finally, in proportion to the magnitude of the problem.

Most important, he got the order of march right, setting three top priorities:

First, meet the immediate needs of those endangered and uprooted by the storm. As he described the emergency response now in place — electric power restored, gas pipelines operating, levees fixed, pumps running, ships arriving to provide housing — it appeared for the first time that the government was getting a grip on the problem. Also arriving are emergency supplies for evacuees, expedited Social Security checks, unemployment benefits, mail delivery — and more.

Second, help displaced citizens rebuild their communities and lives.

Third, rebuild the communities better and safer than before the storm. This, he promised, would be led by state and local governments, but with major federal financing.

To achieve this, the president proposes a mix of traditional big government programs more commonly associated with Democrats and conservative ideas such as enterprise zones, federally-financed savings accounts for people seeking job training and incentives for home ownership, targeted largely at low-income citizens.

It's a solid start, but one that comes with three unanswered questions:

• Who's in charge? Saying states and localities will have control is sensible, but the federal government can't just dole out money without deciding how it will be spent. Bush stopped short of creating a body to coordinate decision-making among fractious federal, state and local officials.

• Who will pay? Bush ignored the subject, suggesting he will once again indulge his worst habit: expanding government spending at record rates without taking the responsibility to pay for it. With cost estimates running as high as $200 billion, some members of Congress in his own party are already chafing at the idea. Several have suggested reopening Congress' most recent pork-barrel extravaganza, the $286 billion transportation bill that included all manner of projects that could be scrapped in favor of more urgent Gulf Coast needs.

• Will it work? On the most basic level, at least, the chances that it will work in the hurricane zone seem good, if sure to come with problems. The government, once mobilized, is good at this sort of thing, and Bush's plan is creative. He also addressed the most glaring breakdown of the post-Katrina response: its failure to address the problems of the poor.

Far less convincing, though, was Bush's broader national response. He said he has ordered a federal review of emergency response plans in all major cities, as well as instructing all federal departments to review their own response.

It sounded all too much like the initiatives Bush announced four years ago in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks. Katrina proved those to be a near total failure in their first major test, raising deep suspicions that the administration has bungled terrorism preparations as badly as it bungled the Katrina response. It there's anything good to come from this disaster, it's that those flaws have been exposed. The president noted the need for a stronger federal role, particularly military, in a disaster of this scale. That's a start, as is the broader Bush plan.

Whether it will prove to be effectively managed and responsibly financed, or just good public relations, remains to be seen.

Not the New Deal (NYT)

By PAUL KRUGMAN

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Now it begins: America's biggest relief and recovery program since the New Deal. And the omens aren't good.

It's a given that the Bush administration, which tried to turn Iraq into a laboratory for conservative economic policies, will try the same thing on the Gulf Coast. The Heritage Foundation, which has surely been helping Karl Rove develop the administration's recovery plan, has already published a manifesto on post-Katrina policy. It calls for waivers on environmental rules, the elimination of capital gains taxes and the private ownership of public school buildings in the disaster areas. And if any of the people killed by Katrina, most of them poor, had a net worth of more than $1.5 million, Heritage wants to exempt their heirs from the estate tax.

Still, even conservatives admit that deregulation, tax cuts and privatization won't be enough. Recovery will require a lot of federal spending. And aside from the effect on the deficit - we're about to see the spectacle of tax cuts in the face of both a war and a huge reconstruction effort - this raises another question: how can discretionary government spending take place on that scale without creating equally large-scale corruption?

It's possible to spend large sums honestly, as Franklin D. Roosevelt demonstrated in the 1930's. F.D.R. presided over a huge expansion of federal spending, including a lot of discretionary spending by the Works Progress Administration. Yet the image of public relief, widely regarded as corrupt before the New Deal, actually improved markedly.

How did that happen? The answer is that the New Deal made almost a fetish out of policing its own programs against potential corruption. In particular, F.D.R. created a powerful "division of progress investigation" to look into complaints of malfeasance in the W.P.A. That division proved so effective that a later Congressional investigation couldn't find a single serious irregularity it had missed.

This commitment to honest government wasn't a sign of Roosevelt's personal virtue; it reflected a political imperative. F.D.R.'s mission in office was to show that government activism works. To maintain that mission's credibility, he needed to keep his administration's record clean.

But George W. Bush isn't F.D.R. Indeed, in crucial respects he's the anti-F.D.R.

President Bush subscribes to a political philosophy that opposes government activism - that's why he has tried to downsize and privatize programs wherever he can. (He still hopes to privatize Social Security, F.D.R.'s biggest legacy.) So even his policy failures don't bother his strongest supporters: many conservatives view the inept response to Katrina as a vindication of their lack of faith in government, rather than as a reason to reconsider their faith in Mr. Bush.

And to date the Bush administration, which has no stake in showing that good government is possible, has been averse to investigating itself. On the contrary, it has consistently stonewalled corruption investigations and punished its own investigators if they try to do their jobs.

That's why Mr. Bush's promise last night that he will have "a team of inspectors general reviewing all expenditures" rings hollow. Whoever these inspectors general are, they'll be mindful of the fate of Bunnatine Greenhouse, a highly regarded auditor at the Army Corps of Engineers who suddenly got poor performance reviews after she raised questions about Halliburton's contracts in Iraq. She was demoted late last month.

Turning the funds over to state and local governments isn't the answer, either. F.D.R. actually made a point of taking control away from local politicians; then as now, patronage played a big role in local politics.

And our sympathy for the people of Mississippi and Louisiana shouldn't blind us to the realities of their states' political cultures. Last year the newsletter Corporate Crime Reporter ranked the states according to the number of federal public-corruption convictions per capita. Mississippi came in first, and Louisiana came in third.

Is there any way Mr. Bush could ensure an honest recovery program? Yes - he could insulate decisions about reconstruction spending from politics by placing them in the hands of an autonomous agency headed by a political independent, or, if no such person can be found, a Democrat (as a sign of good faith).

He didn't do that last night, and probably won't. There's every reason to believe the reconstruction of the Gulf Coast, like the failed reconstruction of Iraq, will be deeply marred by cronyism and corruption.

Auditors To Monitor Use Of Katrina Financial Aid (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Teams of auditors and investigators from the Department of Homeland Security expect to spend three to five years at hurricane recovery field offices in an attempt to prevent fraudulent use of more than $60 billion in relief funds.

"We're going to prevent what is still going to happen, contract procurement irregularities," said Tamara Faulkner, spokeswoman for the inspector general's office.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency routinely uses inspector general auditors to monitor federal dollars that are sent to disaster zones, such as the hurricanes that hit Florida last year, but the Katrina operation and the potential for fraud is on "an unprecedented level," Miss Faulkner said.

A team of 30 inspector general employees will hit the ground Monday at field offices in Baton Rouge, La., Montgomery, Ala., and Jackson, Miss., she said. Later next week, three auditors will be sent to Texas.

Although Congress gave authority to the department's inspector general, Richard Skinner, to stop contract fraud and a $15 million budget to get started, some lawmakers want to create new watchdogs.

Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, yesterday introduced a bill to expand the jurisdiction of the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction to oversee the recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region, with an $80 million budget.

"Already, some $2 billion per day is being spent on the recovery efforts. We simply cannot wait for existing structures to organize and ramp up or create a whole new bureaucracy that will take many months to get up and running," Miss Collins said. "We need controls that are visible and on the ground as soon as possible."

She and Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, said the Homeland Security Department's inspector general is limited to watching spending within its own agency.

"The problem, however, is the spending's going to cross department lines. It's going to cross jurisdictional lines. And we believe that just beefing up the I.G. in the Department of Homeland Security won't be adequate to the task," Miss Collins said.

However, Mr. Skinner established a special inspector general working group among agencies that are expected to use hurricane relief funds, including the Departments of Defense, Health and Human Services, Housing and Urban Development, and the Environmental Protection Agency.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, and Rep. Todd R. Platts, Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the committee's government management, finance and accountability subcommittee, asked Mr. Skinner in a letter yesterday to report by Tuesday how the various inspectors will work together.

"The inspectors general have long stood as a bulwark against such fraud and mismanagement," the congressmen said.

House, Senate OK Katrina Tax Relief (AP-Y)

By MARY DALRYMPLE, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2005

Lawmakers on Thursday worked to help solve the practical problems facing those caught in Hurricane Katrina's path who need quick access to cash, housing and medical care.

The House and Senate passed nearly identical bills to let victims tap retirement accounts without penalty and help working poor families and parents retain their tax credits. Senators also voted for rental housing vouchers and aid measures for small business.

The action came ahead of President Bush's prime-time speech from New Orleans about the comprehensive recovery effort he envisions for the battered Gulf Coast.

On Capitol Hill, Republicans and Democrats fought over plans for a special, GOP-majority committee to investigate the government's sluggish response to the emergency. The House endorsed the idea by a mostly partisan 224-188 vote. Democrats warned they would boycott.

Republicans said it is their responsibility to scrutinize the GOP-run government. "In challenging times, our country expects its leaders to work together and not to engage in petty bickering," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Democrats contended that Republicans cannot be trusted to run an impartial investigation. "After the flood comes the whitewash," said Rep. James McGovern (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass. "The job of this Congress is not to run interference for the Bush administration."

Louisiana lawmakers outlined a reconstruction plan, called "Project Pelican," for their devastated state. It includes coastal restoration and economic development incentives to brings jobs and people back to New Orleans.

Help was coming from the Treasury Department, which ruled that the hurricane qualified as a hardship. That allows victims and their families tap into retirement plans, including 401(k)s, an effort aimed at people with little savings to recover from the storm.

In separate bills passed by the House and the Senate, lawmakers voted to waive penalties typically imposed on early withdrawals from retirement accounts. Lawmakers have to reconcile their differences and send the measure to the president before it can become law.

The measures help working poor families and parents retain tax credits and other benefits that can be disrupted when taxpayers, for example, lose their jobs or relocate.

Several House lawmakers reacted favorably by a proposal to two Illinois Democrats, Sen. Barack Obama and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (news, bio, voting record), to immediately advance earned income tax credits and child tax credits to families in the disaster area.

The tax bills would let people write off more of their unreimbursed hurricane losses. Also, taxes typically imposed when debts such as mortgages are forgiven would be waived. People who take in evacuees for two months or more would get tax breaks.

The Senate's housing voucher program would provide more than 350,000 families left homeless by Katrina with emergency housing vouchers averaging $600 a month, for up to six months. Any displaced family, regardless of income, would be eligible. The program was expected to cost $3.5 billion over six months.

The small business plan, approved by a 96-0 vote, would allow borrowers to defer repayment of Small Business Administration disaster loans for a year. The maximum size of an SBA disaster loan would rise from $1.5 million per loan to $10 million.

Both proposals were added to a spending bill for the departments of Commerce and Justice. But it may not get to Bush soon, despite the Katrina-related provisions.

Senators also worked on giving hurricane victims temporary access to Medicaid health services, including mental health care.

By the end of the day, Congress had also sent the president bills for Katrina victims that ease rules requiring that welfare recipients must work 30 hours a week for their benefits and expand the availability of education grants for students.

Overall, Congress has voted to spend more than $62 billion on immediate rescue and recovery efforts. Lawmakers promise to spend much more.

Ben Bernanke, the president's chief economist, said the costs of rebuilding will be substantial. "This necessary spending should not, however, jeopardize the president' long-term deficit-reduction goals," he told the National Bureau of Economic Research.

The FBI opened a telephone line (1-800-225-5324) to receive reports of public corruption and government fraud related to Katrina relief efforts and cleanup.

Senate Democrats urged Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff to reassure illegal immigrants victimized by the storm that they can seek help from relief agencies without fear of arrest. The government made such a promise after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Also Thursday, senators questioned whether Bush's nominee to run the bureau of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement has enough experience for the post.

Julie L. Myers, a former Treasury official and assistant U.S. attorney, was Chertoff's chief of staff when he led the Justice Department's criminal division.

Critics Fear Trailer 'Ghettos' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

On the sprawling, dusty grounds of Lone Star Army Ammunition Plant and Red River Army Depot in Texarkana, Tex., the recreational vehicles and mobile homes are arriving at a rate of 100 a day before being shipped out to the fringes of Hurricane Katrina's disaster zone.

Those trailers, among 300,000 to be purchased with nearly $5 billion of federal money, have become a focal point of criticism of the Bush administration's early rebuilding efforts. Some conservatives blanch at the cost. And many critics fret that mobile homes will hardly protect their residents from the next storm.

But most of all, housing experts -- conservatives and liberals alike -- worry that Federal Emergency Management Agency encampments will quickly become what former House Speaker Newt Gingrich called "ghettos of despair." Rental vouchers in a market with plenty of available housing would be cheaper and faster and provide better accommodations, they say.

"Three hundred thousand manufactured homes? People are screaming about that," fumed Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). "I tell you, FEMA is a disaster."

Beleaguered FEMA officials yesterday counseled patience. When Katrina struck, they were criticized for moving too slowly, they said. Now, they are being second-guessed for moving too quickly.

"The governors and their local officials are looking at all these issues. They're working with all the evacuees in these communities to ensure they are incorporated into the community, they're given job assistance and the help they need," said FEMA spokesman James McIntyre. "We have more than 300,000 displaced households, and they have to live somewhere."

Besides, said Brian Sullivan, a spokesman for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, mobile homes are not the entire response. HUD will expand rental assistance, open federally insured foreclosed homes and offer up vacant public housing units to get Katrina's survivors into shelter. "The initial response now is: Get your hands on anything you can," he said.

When Katrina struck, FEMA did what it has always done in the wake of a major hurricane: turned to its standing list of contractors, including several mobile home manufacturers. Within days, the agency began discussions with the Manufactured Housing Institute, and then purchased 20,000 fully furnished mobile homes and began shipping them to staging areas in Texarkana; Purvis, Miss.; Selma, Ala.; and Baton Rouge, La.

State government then began scouring parks, government land and private sites to establish communities of evacuees. Just as quickly, housing experts of all political stripes began to howl in protest.

"If they simply put poor people in mobile homes, they would be re-creating the same troubled neighborhoods that were destroyed," said Susan J. Popkin, a housing expert at the Urban Institute. "And we know how to do this better."

Bruce Katz, a liberal housing policy expert at the Brookings Institution, rushed to draft an opinion article, urging the administration to learn from the experience of the 1994 Northridge, Calif., earthquake. Within a week of the quake, the first of 22,000 low-income displaced families were moving into new apartments with expanded HUD housing vouchers. Within a month, a major landlord-recruitment effort was pushing low-income Angelenos into higher-income neighborhoods.

"It's not rocket science," said Katz, a HUD chief of staff in the Clinton administration. "If you turned on the voucher faucet, you'd have people in apartments in a week."

Edgar O. Olsen, a conservative housing economist at the University of Virginia, said he pestered the Federal Housing Administration and HUD with faxes, imploring them to scrap the mobile home contracts for rental vouchers.

After all, he noted, rental occupancy rates are at historic lows, as are rents. There are more than 1.1 million available units in the South, with an average rent of less than $700 a month. Houston's vacancy rate stands at 15.6 percent. But Olsen said he has received no response.

The problem, he said, may lie with HUD's organizational chart. Like many other agencies, it has been hollowed out: assistant secretary for public and Indian housing, assistant secretary for policy development and research, general deputy assistant secretary for policy, assistant secretary for fair housing, general counsel, chief financial officer and assistant secretary for administration, all vacant.

Now, HUD will be in the spotlight, Katz predicted. In his 2006 budget, the president had proposed stripping the department of virtually all of its community development functions. The White House has tried to eliminate HOPE VI, the primary housing program designed to raze and rebuild failed public housing complexes. And the administration has de-emphasized the Section 8 housing voucher program.

"The administration has spent the past five years trying to ratchet back the Section 8 voucher program," Katz said. "It's going to be fairly hard for them to turn on a dime and say, 'Oh, we were just kidding.' "

But now, they may have to do just that, housing experts and politicians say. "The whole relief effort was such an incredible screw-up that they felt they just had to throw money at the program," Olsen said, referring to buying the army of trailers. "They had to do it fast. Now, the question is whether they can undo it."

Gingrich agreed: "A key test of the administration right now is to refuse to spend one more penny on such a disastrous policy."

Evacuees Are Moving Out Of Shelters Government Helps People Settle Into Temporary Homes (USAT)

By John Ritter, Tom Weir, And Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 16, 2005

ALEXANDER CITY, Ala. — Far from Hurricane Katrina's ruin on the Gulf Coast, Mitchell and Hazel Rodgers are among the first hurricane victims to settle this week into new RV trailers at Wind Creek State Park, across a lake from million-dollar real estate.

The couple join tens of thousands of Katrina evacuees moving to the next stage of what promises to be a long process of getting back home.

The populations of hundreds of Red Cross shelters are dropping daily as families move to temporary housing, some, like the 500 trailer sites at Wind Creek, more permanent than others.

“This is the type of living my wife and I always wanted. Back to Mother Nature,” says Mitchell Rodgers, 54, a disabled shipyard worker whose Gulfport, Miss., trailer-park home tipped over and filled with water. “As soon as I can, I'm going to register to vote. I'm not going back to Mississippi.”

Hotels, private homes, churches, cruise ships, gyms and campgrounds will continue to accommodate many of the displaced in coming weeks. An estimated 1 million people fled Katrina.

But disaster officials say they're moving to assemble and make livable up to 300,000 trailers and other temporary housing units in Louisiana and Mississippi as fast as they can find sites and arrange utilities, schooling and other necessities with cities and counties.

The federal government has stopped selling foreclosed homes in 11 states and will make as many as 5,000 available at no charge to Katrina's homeless. Public housing authorities across the country are scrounging for every vacant unit they can find to offer to evacuees who came from public housing in New Orleans and Mississippi. An estimated 5,600 units could be made available within 500 miles of New Orleans.

Many cities — Houston, Chicago, Detroit and Philadelphia — and counties — Allegheny County, Pa., and Miami-Dade — have offered housing for thousands more.

The number of people in Red Cross shelters had declined from a high of 203,917 in the days after Katrina hit to 61,610 by Wednesday. More than 550 shelters had closed, the Red Cross said.

The Red Cross has paid about $12 million in hotel bills and expects to reimburse a total of $100 million on behalf of an estimated 132,000 Katrina-displaced people who were in hotels in 46 states.

In Baton Rouge, where tens of thousands took refuge because it's just 80 miles northwest of New Orleans, shelter populations have dropped steadily. But the metro area of 450,000 is scrambling to cope with other effects of its newfound — if temporary — status as the state's most populous.

Mayor Melvin Holden is asking the Federal Emergency Management Agency for $10 billion to build schools, roads and sewers. Highway planners are trying to sort out the swollen region's traffic congestion. FEMA expects to station thousands of mobile homes in Baton Rouge for evacuees.

Mark Bielski has been staying with friends. Although his house in New Orleans' Uptown district remains intact, he's looking for a Baton Rouge teaching job. He says he'll return to New Orleans "as soon as the lights go on."

Others see Baton Rouge as their new home. Since Katrina, 1,100 houses in the area have sold, according to the local Realtors' association. Apartment vacancy rates slid from 8% to nothing.

Evacuees poured into Houston's Astrodome and other shelters, but nobody in Texas' largest city "knows for sure how many people are here or how long they intend to stay," says Frank Michel, a city spokesman. What they know is that 46,000 former Louisiana residents are living in hotels and motels and 16,000 Louisiana children have registered in Houston schools. The city has found more than 8,000 apartments and houses to accommodate 20,000 people.

Many places seemed to open their arms, then worry later about consequences. Arkansas, one of the nation's poorest states, took in more than 75,000 evacuees, second only to Texas. That amounted to more than a 2.5% jump in the state's population, but Gov. Mike Huckabee reminded residents of the help they get after frequent ice storms and tornadoes.

"By golly, we're going to be there to take care of them now," he declared. He said midweek that at least a third of the influx had left.

Other evacuees, particularly those stranded in New Orleans after the storm, ended up farther away. Oklahoma, Virginia, Kentucky, Illinois, North and South Carolina, Maryland, Ohio, Michigan, and California each sheltered 2,000 to 4,000. Florida and Georgia each took more than 1,300.

Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson found that evacuees in Philadelphia "have come to realize they might not go back to New Orleans."

"Of the families I talked to, 90% of the families have no desire to go back," Jackson says. "But that's not what I'm hearing from Texas. It's a whole different perspective."

Perspective may depend on circumstances. The new arrivals at Alabama's Wind Creek State Park get trailers 28 to 32 feet long; some would cost $40,000.

Red Cross volunteers "are helping me get baby clothes," says Suzanne Hughes, 18, from Kiln, Miss. She's 81/2 months pregnant and waiting for her fiancé to arrive.

"It's a really good community … families that have kids, and the kids get attached to the atmosphere here," Hughes says.

Police officers patrol the park. Evacuees undergo background checks because the park could be home to 1,000 children. Evacuees are being hired as park workers. Sporting goods companies are donating fishing gear. South Central Bell is putting in phone banks, Dell is offering laptops. Cisco is providing Internet service.

"It would turn you into a Christian, even if you weren't," says Arthur Walker, 57, known as "Mr. A" when he worked as a palm reader in New Orleans' Jackson Square.

Hutchinson: FEMA Should Remain With Homeland Security (SDN)

By Don Dailey

Springdale (AR) Daily News, September 16, 2005

ROGERS -- The Federal Emergency Management Agency, buffeted in recent weeks over its sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, should not be separated from the Department of Homeland Security, said Asa Hutchinson.

Hutchinson, a gubernatorial candidate and the former undersecretary for Border and Transportation Security in the Department of Homeland Security, said in an interview before his remarks to the Arkansas Associated Builders and Contractors at the Embassy Suites in Rogers the federal government botched its response to Katrina, but breaking out the formerly independent agency would increase communication breakdowns and red tape in future disasters.

Americans and public officials pressured the Homeland Security Department into concentrating on defending against another terrorist attack to the detriment of planning for the much-more-likely natural disasters, and a better balance between the two is needed, Hutchinson said.

"You know there are going to be hurricanes and tornadoes. You don't always have terrorist attacks every year," Hutchinson said.

He also said there need to be increased roles for the federal government and the military during natural disasters.

Hutchinson commented on a recently released status report on the 9/11 Commission's recommendations to Congress. The report gave generally low marks in the areas of emergency preparedness and response, transportation security and border security.

Hutchinson said for the most part the low grades weren't due to leadership issues or poor policy, but sluggish funding from Congress.

"Our government has the right strategy and we're making progress," he said.

The Gravette native pointed to the three areas formerly under his purview the commission reported as having had "some progress," the highest grade given in any category in the status report.

The commission said "some progress" has been made in terrorist travel intelligence, developing a biometric entry-exit system and standardizing secure identifications.

The full status report can be seen at http://www.9-11pdp.org/press/2005-09-14_report.pdf.

In his remarks to the builders, Hutchinson acknowledged the fortunate timing in leaving Homeland Security earlier this year, calling it "one of those times when you didn't stay too long."

Americans Sour On FEMA (WSJ)

By John Harwood, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Americans sour on FEMA but want to restore its independence.

By two to one, a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows, the public holds an unfavorable view of FEMA after criticism of its Katrina response. But by 61%-20%, respondents echo Democrats like Sen. Clinton who say FEMA should be autonomous, as in her husband's presidency, not part of Homeland Security; majorities of conservatives and Republicans agree. (See poll results.1)

"It took a class 4 hurricane to...[move] a polarized electorate," say Journal/NBC pollsters Peter Hart and Bill McInturff. They liken erosion in Bush's ratings to Reagan's Iran-contra dip, and say Katrina's costs and link to gas prices make the effect unlikely to fade soon.

Homeland Security chief Chertoff's 17% negative rating exceeds his 13% positive, but 50% don't know him.

BLACKS AND WHITES agree on Bush-era progress in race relations.

Despite divide in Katrina reactions, 32% of blacks and whites say race relations have improved over the past five years. Just one in 10 say relations have gotten worse; 56% of both groups say they've stayed the same.

Ten years ago, amid affirmative action fights, both races were more likely to see deterioration. Bush aides search for Roberts-style woman to succeed Supreme Court Justice O'Connor; Attorney General Gonzales, who'd be the first Hispanic pick, and PepsiCo lawyer Larry Thompson, an African-American, are also contenders. But pluralities of women and Hispanics say Bush should disregard diversity and consider only "the best person."

ECONOMISTS SHARE public wariness of the hurricane's impact.

The 45% of Americans who say the economy has gotten worse in the past year matches assessments in spring 2003 amid job-loss concerns. Two-thirds see a big economic hit from Katrina, tracking forecasters' expectation of diminished employment and growth in coming months.

Fed next week weighs interrupting interest-rate increases; Wall Street bets no. Members of National Association of Business Economists, by 3-to-1, hail monetary policy as just right but call the deficit -- swelling because of Katrina -- "too stimulative."

Concern over gas prices is highest among young people; 40% of those under 35 call it the top economic issue.

THOUGH BUSH has taken a softer line toward the United Nations, Americans aren't feeling conciliatory. Two-thirds say they lack confidence in the world body, up from half, a decade ago. The survey's margin of error is 3.1 percentage points.

TRULY NEEDY? After winning a $250 million FEMA contract to use three ships for Katrina relief, Carnival Cruise Lines gets skeptical initial response to request that Congress exempt the proceeds from federal taxes. Separately, a White House aide dismisses rolling back jet-fuel taxes in response to post-hurricane price jumps, saying, "Our focus is on bailing out the French Quarter, not the airlines."

RED AND BLUE: Republicans are three times as likely as Democrats to cite looting in New Orleans as a top Katrina concern; Democrats were six times as likely to cite treatment of poor people. But partisans on both sides agree city residents stuck at the Convention Center and Superdome couldn't help it and shouldn't be blamed.

SELECTIVE IMPACT: Despite FEMA's woes, Katrina hasn't shifted confidence in federal government generally. Some 31% say Washington can be trusted to do the right thing at least most of the time, matching a June Gallup survey. After 9/11, confidence in Washington surged.

REPUBLICANS HOPE to dodge disaster fallout.

The party's ratings are unchanged from July, even as Bush slips; each party draws positive ratings from 37% of Americans. But Democrats' 32% negative mark is nine percentage points lower. Minority leader Reid launches online organizing drive next week linking activists with Democratic Senate campaigns.

Congress draws weak 29% approval rating, though that's not as bad as the 15% lawmakers received amid Perot's outsider 1992 candidacy. Some House Republicans look to shelve Social Security debate, but costs of Iraq war remain a cloud over 2006 midterm elections.

"We better continue to hit our benchmarks" for stable democracy there, says ex-Republican Gov. Engler of Michigan.

MINOR MEMOS: After Roberts's strong Judiciary Committee performance, Engler jokes, "He should be the stand-in for whoever we need confirmed" for any post.....Yet Roberts's 32% positive rating pales next to 83% for the Red Cross amid Katrina.

FCC Plans $211M To Rebuild Communications Cash Will Come From Universal Service Fund (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Federal regulators said Thursday that the government will spend $211 million to help rebuild communications links for those affected by Hurricane Katrina and will find ways to better protect such systems.

“We need to determine how we can help companies strengthen our communications infrastructure, create more robust and reliable networks, and improve the ability to quickly restore service when disaster does strike,” Federal Communications Commission chief Kevin Martin said at a special agency meeting in Atlanta to assess the effects of the storm.

Katrina knocked out landline and cellphone service for millions in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, hobbled police radio communications and wiped out 911 emergency service in many areas.

The absence of those vital links made it difficult for survivors to find relatives and for public-safety and emergency rescue officials to talk to each other, hampering their response.

The $211 million will come from the $6 billion-a-year universal service fund, which is financed by a 10.2% surcharge on every customer's long-distance bill.

Among other things, the fund subsidizes phone service for the indigent, helps bring Internet access to schools and improves communications systems for rural health care providers. Here's how the $211 million will be spent:

•About $51 million of the $750 million low-income program will provide wireless phones and 300 free minutes for needy evacuees and others still without phone service. The program also will pay to reconnect customers' landline phones.

•About $132 million of the $2.25 billion "E-Rate" fund will help reconnect schools and libraries to the Internet.

•About $28 million of the $50 million rural health care program will help providers such as the American Red Cross better treat disaster victims. Special linkups, for example, let doctors get X-rays remotely over high-speed Internet lines.

Martin also said he will appoint a panel to recommend ways to improve communication among public-safety agencies during disasters. The FCC also will create a bureau to promote more reliable crisis communications for police, fire and national security agencies.

After the hurricane, various public-safety agencies often could not communicate because their radio systems operate on different frequencies.

At the meeting, industry officials reported dramatic progress in fixing phone lines and radio and TV stations.

About 305,000 BellSouth customers remain without phone service, many of them in the New Orleans area, down from 2.4 million. It could take months to completely restore service. About 75% of cellphone service has been restored.

Thirty-nine radio stations, seven Louisiana TV stations and 10 cable systems are still not operating.

FCC Seeks Crisis-Response Changes (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Christopher Rhoads, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

ATLANTA -- The Federal Communications Commission, after seeing how communications systems broke down after Hurricane Katrina despite four years of attempted improvements, proposed changes that would allow it to take a larger role in coordinating emergency communications and restoring telephone services.

The agency, which held a three-hour meeting at BellSouth Corp.'s emergency-response center here, also proposed releasing $211 million from the Universal Service Fund, which subsidizes phone services in rural areas and pays for school Internet connections. The money would be devoted to helping schools rebuild Internet connections and providing free wireless phones for hurricane evacuees. Phone companies also would be allowed to use money they normally receive from the fund to rebuild networks along the Gulf Coast.

Such a move is welcome news to phone companies in the region. BellSouth estimates it could cost between $400 million and $600 million to replace ruined equipment in the three-state area hit hardest by the hurricane.

Hurricane Katrina has raised questions about just how much more robust and secure the nation's telecommunications network has become since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Many of the same problems -- no power, no phone service and first responders unable to communicate with each other -- happened again. No single federal agency has responsibility to lead the effort, but FCC Chairman Kevin Martin's proposals yesterday suggested what could become a broader move away by other agencies from relying as heavily on leadership from the Department of Homeland Security.

Under Mr. Martin's proposals -- which require full FCC approval and, in some cases, congressional backing -- the FCC would be reorganized to include a new Public Safety/Homeland Security Bureau. The FCC also would assemble an independent panel to examine what happened to the phone networks and communications between first responders and how they might be improved.

During emergencies, the FCC gathers information about outages and assists the Federal Emergency Management Agency in coordinating help. After Hurricane Katrina, FCC staff remained on call 24 hours a day so phone services could be more quickly restored.

Mr. Martin is proposing that the FCC take a greater role than just helping to free up radio frequencies for first responders -- by helping to set interoperability standards and providing guidance for communities that are upgrading two-way radio equipment.

The responses to the Sept. 11 attacks and to Hurricane Katrina showed that the biggest problem facing emergency communications is so-called interoperability, or the capacity for responders to communicate with each other regardless of the type of equipment.

This was apparent to Laurie Feagans, the emergency-management director of Manatee County, Fla., when her team aided Hancock County, Miss. -- one of the hardest-hit areas of the storm -- after Hurricane Katrina. Not only was the Hancock County emergency-operations center without any form of communication, but even with her satellite phones, Ms. Feagans was unable to contact the Mississippi emergency-operations center, she said.

Similar talk was heard after Sept. 11 -- and scant progress has been made since then.

F.C.C. Chief Offers Plan to Get Phones to Hurricane Victims (NYT)

By KEN BELSON

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

ATLANTA, Sept. 15 - Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, proposed on Thursday spending $211 million to provide phone and data services to consumers, schools and hospitals affected by Hurricane Katrina.

The money would come from the Universal Service Fund, which provides about $6.5 billion a year to support access to telecommunications services for rural and low-income consumers, as well as schools and libraries.

The proposal, made at an F.C.C. meeting here, would give evacuees cellphones and 300 free minutes and help customers reconnect their phone lines. Money would also be made available to schools, libraries, health organizations and relief agencies like the Red Cross to rebuild their phone and Internet connections.

Mr. Martin also proposed establishing a committee within the next two weeks to review the hurricane's impact on the region's telecommunications network, and assess what could be done to avert problems in future storms.

For instance, wireless service failed in many areas after the storm not just because 1,000 cellular towers were damaged, but also because of damage to the networks that connect the cell towers and landlines.

"The lesson from the storm is how connected all these networks are," Mr. Martin said. "No part of the network can be effective in isolation. We're all reliant on each other."

Industry executives testifying at the meeting, which was held at the office of BellSouth, the biggest phone provider in the Southeast, said that while phone companies have made steady progress repairing their networks in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, much still needs to be done.

Steve Largent, the chief executive of CTIA, a wireless industry trade group, said, "As an industry, we have never seen an event like this."

As of Thursday, 305,100 phone lines of the 4.9 million that BellSouth operates in the three-state area were still out of commission. One-quarter of the cellular sites were still not functioning, said Ken Moran, the director of the F.C.C.'s Office of Homeland Security. And seven television stations in Louisiana are still off the air, he said.

BellSouth said last week that it expected to spend up to $600 million to repair offices and networks damaged by Hurricane Katrina. By comparison, the company spent $200 million last year to restore equipment and service after four hurricanes hit the Southeast.

"It will take some additional time to understand the magnitude of the damage," said Ron Odom, the president of network services at BellSouth.

BellSouth said 11,000 telephone poles and 26,000 lengths of cable were knocked down by the storm. Of the 578 switching stations that BellSouth operates in the three states, just 16 were out of service on Thursday.

Mr. Odom, like many of the industry executives who testified, said that one of the biggest impediments to restoring telecommunications services and radio and television broadcasts was the lack of electricity.

Though many companies had backup generators that took over when electricity was knocked out, refueling the generators was difficult because of flooding and people shooting at supply trucks, executives said.

New Lines Of Communication (WP)

By Jonathan Krim, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

As crews rush to restore basic telephone and Internet services to areas ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, some executives, academics and analysts are urging a more ambitious approach: Make New Orleans and the surrounding areas super-connected communities, with advanced services that surpass what is available anywhere in the country, if not the world.

With many poles and wires reduced to sticks and spaghetti, cell towers down, miles of streets still flooded, and parts of the region uninhabitable for the near future, these experts see the perfect opportunity to deploy new systems that otherwise might be too expensive or disruptive to build.

The result, they say, could be a bonanza of higher technology at lower prices for businesses and consumers, more robust emergency-responder systems and an ability to provide high-speed Internet access to poorer segments of the population often left off of the information highway.

"The area ought to be a beacon for 21st-century communications in the United States," said Rey Ramsey, chief executive of One Economy Corp., a nonprofit organization that helps bring high-speed Internet service to inner-city communities. "We ought to go state of the art, and state of the art with a purpose."

Ramsey, who also is chairman of Habitat for Humanity International, said recreating New Orleans as a technology and communications mecca could be a key to its revival, drawing back shuttered businesses that are considering relocating and attracting new ones.

In addition, he said, "there needs to be an intentional effort to make sure that these benefits extend to poor people directly."

The Federal Communications Commission yesterday announced a series of steps and proposed funding to help get the region's system running again.

And a broad hurricane-relief bill being drafted by Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) would earmark money to help low- and middle-income residents and businesses buy or lease computers and get access to high-speed Internet access at affordable prices.

But for several executives and analysts in the telecommunications world, that would be just a small beginning, though they acknowledge that their ideas are best-case and might never be enacted.

Sky Dayton, who founded Internet provider EarthLink Inc. and more recently has focused on wireless ventures, said the area need not bother reconnecting all its downed lines and should instead rely on existing cellular networks and additional systems known as WiFi and WiMax, which provide high-speed Internet access.

Dayton said the cost of such a network would be relatively low -- "a rounding error in the context of rebuilding a city." A series of small, electronic devices on top of buildings or lampposts and take signals from central towers and push them around to houses, offices or other "hot spots."

Such networks can also deliver Internet-based telephone service.

Several municipalities around the country have launched, or are considering building, government-owned or -operated wireless-Internet networks, so lower-income citizens can access the Internet more affordably. Those efforts have met with fierce opposition from the major telephone companies, which have successfully lobbied in several states for laws prohibiting governments from operating such networks if they compete with private industry.

Dayton, who heads a consortium between Earthlink and SK Telecom Co., a leading mobile-communications firm in South Korea, said municipal wireless-Internet networks should be public-private partnerships.

Jeffrey A. Citron, chief executive of Vonage Holdings Corp., a leading provider of Internet phone service, sees an opportunity built less around alternative technologies and more around opening up competition.

"I'd come up with a plan for a trenching system" for major thoroughfares in New Orleans while the city is largely empty and undergoing repairs, he said. High-speed, fiber-optic cables are hugely expensive to lay, so the dominant phone companies have typically been the only ones to do so.

Citron said the city could dig the trenches and make them available, for suitable fees to help cover construction costs, to any carrier that wanted to lay cables to provide services -- including voice, digital television and Internet access.

With more companies potentially competing, Citron said, prices would come down.

Bill Smith, chief technology officer for BellSouth Corp., the Gulf Coast's primary phone carrier, paused for several seconds when presented with this idea.

"I would say that might not make sense for us" if too many competitors meant the percentage of the pie for each was too low, he said.

Smith said BellSouth is committed to rebuilding with an eye toward providing state-of-the-art technology that is largely Internet-based.

The company hopes, for example, to one day let consumers set their home video recorders from their cell phones.

Alexander H. Good, chief executive of Mobile Satellite Ventures LP of Reston, said satellite technology, in addition to other systems, would provide a more disaster-proof communication system for emergency responders, including police, fire and medical personnel.

He said his company is readying two new satellites with new capabilities. Although the satellites service the entire country, they could be pointed to a particular area in an emergency to provided expanded service.

Anthony Townsend, research director at the Institute for the Future in California, pointed out that many of those high-flown ideas could run up against a fundamental problem: The services rely on electricity, which often goes out during such disasters. The nation must focus on finding more flexible ways of distributing power, he said.

Mississippi Sues To Make Insurers Pay Flood Claims (WSJ)

By Theo Francis, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood filed suit against five big insurers in that state yesterday, unleashing protest throughout the industry as he seeks to force the companies to pay for flood damage from Hurricane Katrina despite flooding exclusions in standard homeowners' policies.

The suit, filed in state court in Jackson, seeks to override the exclusions. It comes as tens of thousands of Gulf Coast property owners struggle with the cost of rebuilding homes damaged by the wall of water that surged with the hurricane Aug. 29. Standard homeowners' policies typically cover wind and other storm damage, but not flood damage. Flood damage is covered by a government-backed flood-insurance program, but fewer than one in four Mississippi properties in areas most at risk of flooding are insured through the federal program.

"You can't provide free flood insurance by rewriting contracts," said Jane Boisseau, a New Orleans native and co-chair of the insurance practice for law firm LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae LLP in New York, which represents many insurers. A spokesman for State Farm Mutual Insurance Cos., the nation's largest home and auto insurer, said the attorney general's move "threatens the foundation of the economy of the state" by attempting to undercut legal contracts. The insurers maintain they never collected any premium money from customers to cover flood damage.

Still, fighting the suit could be a public-relations problem. The U.S. insurance industry is in robust financial health, with more than $400 billion in capital. Also, the industry is legendary for lobbying clout and has a track record defending its contracts, which are approved by state regulators.

The lawsuit throws into sharp relief concerns that have increased as the extent of Katrina's destruction -- estimated at as much as $125 billion, with up to $60 billion covered by insurance -- has become clearer. Homeowners without government flood insurance typically must rebuild on their own or with low-interest government loans and limited grants. Complaints that smaller insurers are delaying and denying payments have begun mounting.

Besides State Farm, Mr. Hood's lawsuit names as defendants units of Allstate Corp., Mississippi Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance Cos., United Services Automobile Association, and Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co. The companies together last year wrote about 70% of Mississippi homeowners' policies. Companies that could be reached for comment yesterday generally said they hadn't seen the lawsuit but expected to prevail.

The suit seeks to void flood exclusions, arguing they are "unconscionable," unreasonably favorable to insurers and a "violation of the public policy of Mississippi."

The suit argues that policyholders bought insurance to protect property against hurricanes with the "reasonable expectation" it would cover flood and other water damage. It accuses insurers of deceptive trade practices. The suit argues that Mississippi law and court precedent require insurers to pay according to the original cause of damage, and that flooding from Katrina was caused by the storm and its high winds.

The suit argues the policies deprive policyholders of "meaningful choice."

Language in policies excluding flood and water damage is typically broad. One Gulf Coast policy form excludes coverage for "water damage," defined as "flood, surface water, waves, tidal water, overflow of a body of water, or spray from any of these, whether or not driven by wind."

Allstate's general counsel, Michael J. McCabe, said the company expects Mr. Hood's challenge to fail, in part because state regulators approved the contracts, "but while it's being adjudicated, it will delay and complicate the process." He said Allstate is paying covered losses "fairly and as swiftly as humanly possibly." Of the insurers sued, only Allstate is publicly traded; the rest are owned by policyholders.

A spokesman for Mississippi Farm Bureau called the suit "amazing" and said it "will take a long time to settle." Nationwide said that it is "deeply disappointed" by the lawsuit, and that voiding flood exclusions would hurt policyholders nationally.

A spokesman for USAA said that, while sympathetic to Gulf Coast residents who didn't buy flood insurance, "we cannot compromise the interests of our members who have covered losses by being forced to pay for uncovered losses."

Mr. Hood's lawsuit seeks to prevent any insurer from requiring policyholders to sign documents acknowledging flood or water damage to receive claim payments. In its statement, Nationwide said any suggestion that it had done this was "unfounded."

Mississippi Sues Insurers Over Damage From Storm (NYT)

By JENNIFER BAYOT

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Mississippi sued the state's property-casualty insurers yesterday in an attempt to compel them to pay for a greater share of the damage wrought by Hurricane Katrina, firing a legal salvo that could drive away insurance providers even as it gives hope to homeowners displaced by the storm.

In a civil complaint filed in Chancery Court in Jackson, the Mississippi attorney general, Jim Hood, accused insurers of selling confusing policies that fell short of homeowners' reasonable expectations of coverage.

Mr. Hood argued that because property owners "purchased these policies for the primary purpose of insuring against any and all hurricane damage," insurers should be liable for property damage caused by flooding - a hazard long excluded from traditional homeowner policies.

He is seeking a temporary restraining order to prevent companies from denying or reducing coverage based on water exclusions, or from asking property owners to sign documents stating that their loss was caused by water rather than wind. He said that people were being offered $3,000 in living expenses if they signed such forms.

"If they sign this form," Mr. Hood said, "they are giving up their rights. What the insurance companies are trying to do is lock them into saying it was flood damage."

Insurers said yesterday that the lawsuit threatened the viability of insurance coverage in Mississippi because it suggested that contracts were perpetually open to revision. They also protested that they were being asked to cover damage for which they had never collected premiums.

"Basically, it's changing the rules of the game during the game - after the game has been agreed to and approved by the state itself," said Michael J. McCabe, Allstate's chief legal officer.

Richard Ludke, a spokesman at State Farm, said the lawsuit threatened "to undermine the insurance industry's financial stability, and its ability to respond not only to its obligation rising out of Katrina but its ability to respond to other claims."

He added, "In essence, the attorney general is challenging the validity of contracts in Mississippi."

DOJ_NMG_0006113

Strictly speaking, only the relatively few homeowners who bought separate flood policies from the federal government are entitled to such coverage. In Harrison County, Miss., where Gulfport and Biloxi were leveled, fewer than one in 12 homeowners did, according to federal data.

The Mississippi lawsuit seeks to turn that arrangement on its head at a time when far more policyholders appear to have been affected by flooding than after previous hurricanes. Storm surges like those that overwhelmed Gulfport and Biloxi are typically considered flooding rather than wind-driven; the flood damage in New Orleans has yet to be assessed.

Flood insurance for homeowners has been handled by the federal government since 1968, and several lawsuits since then have made arguments similar to Mr. Hood's and failed, said Mitchell L. Lathrop, of the law firm of Duane Morris, who specializes in reinsurance and insurance law.

"I think he's absolutely wrong because the flood exclusion has been a prominent part of property policies since at least the 1980's," Mr. Lathrop said.

Richard Scruggs, a Mississippi lawyer who played a leading role in a $250 billion settlement against the tobacco industry, said that he planned to file suits on behalf of thousands of Gulf Coast residents, demanding that insurance companies pay for flood damage. He said he already had 200 to 300 homeowners as clients and planned to file individual lawsuits next week.

Pension Plan Rules Relaxed

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 (Dow Jones) - Companies that sponsor 401(k)'s and similar retirement plans can make loans and other "hardship distributions" to Hurricane Katrina victims, the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service said Thursday.

The statement came as the House and the Senate passed tax-relief legislation for victims of the storm, which will allow penalty-free withdrawals from individual retirement accounts.

The Treasury and the I.R.S. said employees with 401(k) accounts as well as those at public schools and tax-exempt groups with 403(b) tax-sheltered annuities might be eligible for streamlined loan procedures and liberalized hardship distributions from their retirement plans.

These advantages may also apply to state and local government employees with certain "457 deferred-compensation plans."

The loans or hardship withdrawals must be made by March 31, 2006.

Lawsuit Accuses Insurers Of Excluding Storm-surge Coverage Policies Unclear Sometimes (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood sued five insurance companies Thursday to force them to pay for storm-surge damage related to Hurricane Katrina.

The complaint, filed in Hinds County Chancery Court, claims that Allstate, State Farm, Nationwide, USAA and Mississippi Farm Bureau policies “attempt to exclude coverage for storm-surge damage” caused by the hurricane.

This is “an unfair or deceptive trade practice” under state law, Hood says. Hood also asked for a temporary restraining order to prevent insurers from paying policyholders to get them to sign waivers saying they have flood damage.

Homeowners' policies typically cover wind and sometimes wind-driven rain damage. Government-issued insurance covers flood damage. What's unclear is whether hurricane-caused storm surges are covered by homeowners' policies.

Insurers are expected to pay up to $60 billion in hurricane damages, with total economic damages likely exceeding $125 billion, Risk Management Solutions says.

Insurers say storm-surge damage is the same as flood damage. “Insurers have never collected a penny in flood-insurance premiums,” says Robert Hartwig of the Insurance Information Institute, an industry trade group. “If they're forced to pay, it could quite possibly be destabilizing and lead to the insolvency of smaller insurers in the area.”

Hood's move is unusual because it is out of step with the Mississippi Insurance Department. George Dale, the state's insurance commissioner, has warned insurers that when it's unclear how the damage was caused, the decision should favor policyholders. But he stopped short of saying insurers should cover hurricane storm-surge damage.

For years, insurance companies have said flood damage isn't covered under their policies, even if it results from an insured event such as a hurricane. A typical homeowner's policy, provided by the Mississippi Insurance Department, says this is the case "regardless of any other cause or event contributing concurrently or in any sequence to the loss."

Hood says insurers don't mention storm surges. "I'm not going to allow an insurance company to bankrupt half of the families, businesses here … by pointing to the fine print that says that they should have known that our hurricane policy doesn't cover storm surge."

State Farm says the lawsuit threatens to undermine the industry's ability to meet its Katrina obligations and respond to other claims in Mississippi and elsewhere. Allstate says it's "unfortunate that a lawsuit has been filed so early in the recovery process." Nationwide says it's "deeply disappointed." USAA says it can't let its members pay for "uncovered losses."

The Louisiana attorney general's office says it's not planning a lawsuit. In Alabama, the attorney general's office says it's "premature" to talk about a lawsuit.

Programs Retrain Displaced Workers Hurricane Survivors Are Being Matched With New Jobs (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 16, 2005

JACKSON, Miss. — Thousands of workers displaced in the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast are being retrained in new programs stretching from Louisiana to Texas and Mississippi.

The programs are designed to find jobs for those forced to relocate or whose employers suspended operations, say state officials in Louisiana and Texas.

Many of the job seekers are likely to be placed in fields such as construction, health care, energy and cleanup, says Barton Smith, director of the Institute for Regional Forecasting at the University of Houston. Because many of them previously worked at casinos, retail shops and logging companies, they need to be trained, he says.

Community and technical colleges in Louisiana this week started a job-training program to match and prepare evacuees with jobs in construction, plumbing, welding and hazardous waste removal.

"We need as many people as possible to help rebuild the New Orleans area and at the same time get them work," says Jim Henderson, senior vice president of workforce development and training at the Louisiana Community & Technical College System.

The federally funded program will probably operate out of 10 community and technical colleges, adult-education centers and mobile computer centers, Henderson says. Under the program, individuals are initially trained for a few weeks before receiving on-the-job training and apprenticeships.

"We'll work in any area that helps rebuild the city. I'll pick up the trash," says Michaela Reid, 32, a former tour guide in the French Quarter. She, husband Andrew, 36, and their two children are staying in Austin but plan to return to New Orleans next week. The couple would like to train for jobs in computer science and law enforcement.

The city of Houston, a major gathering spot for evacuees, on Monday announced a major job fair to connect hurricane victims with local employers in the health care and energy fields, among other industries. An estimated 10,000 to 20,000 of the evacuees are likely to look for jobs in Houston, says the University of Houston's Smith.

The Texas Workforce Commission says it will receive a $75 million emergency grant from the U.S. Labor Department to help fund job-training and relocation programs.

Here in Jackson, state officials are offering job-placement services through the Workforce Investment Act, a 7-year-old federal program. A partnership with local employers provides on-the-job training, says Ross Tucker, vice president of MetroJackson Chamber of Commerce.

Many of the displaced are from storm-damaged towns on the Gulf Coast and in southern Mississippi, 150 miles to 200 miles away, and need jobs. And most of the jobs here are in government, health care and automotive — a far cry from the coast, where gaming, tourism and timber are the big industries.

Meanwhile, local businesses are hiring and training. D&D Construction in nearby Ridgeland, Miss., has hired a handful of people to build homes. Those without experience will be taught on the job, owner Daniel Phillips says. "This doesn't take a college degree."

In their haste to find work for the displaced, state officials say they must carefully balance their needs with those of the unemployed already in their regions.

"It's difficult to give one person an advantage over another because they were displaced by the hurricane," says Angela Griffin, branch director at Jackson Main Job Center, a state agency assisting the displaced. "Someone locally may have lost their job, too, because their business shut down because of the hurricane."

Displaced Health Care Workers Being Courted Areas With Shortages Advertising To Hire (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Displaced health care workers from New Orleans and the Gulf Coast are being lured with signing bonuses, relocation assistance and other perks by hospitals, doctor offices and clinics nationwide.

Classified ads in Gulf Coast newspapers and on websites encourage nurses, therapists, doctors and other health care workers to consider new jobs, either permanently or temporarily.

A shortage of medical workers in many parts of the USA almost guarantees that workers who leave the hurricane-battered areas will find work.

What's more difficult to know is whether the health care workers who accept new jobs will return.

"Recruiters are swooping down on Louisiana," says William Schumacher, who runs a Louisiana-based firm that provides medical staff to hospital emergency departments and is trying to keep doctors in the state. "My fear is that we are going to wake up three months from now when all the volunteers are gone, and there won't be enough staff."

The choice is tough for health care workers. Many are without jobs or income. Recruiters say they are helping, not poaching.

"Even if we didn't exist, these nurses and health professionals would go somewhere else because they have to," says Alan Braynin, CEO of Access Nurses, a San Diego-based staffing agency.

Braynin says temporary nursing positions, which generally last 13 weeks, are ideal for displaced workers.

"We can make the process simple for them to leave, but also to come back," says Braynin.

Some placement firms and companies seeking workers are offering only temp jobs; others are flexible.

San Luis Valley Regional Medical Center, a 59-bed hospital in rural Colorado, is advertising for nurses, physical therapists and radiation technicians for either permanent or temporary positions.

"This is our way we can help those people who have had so much devastation in their lives," says hospital spokesman Leonard Snow. "If they want to stay one month or four months, we'd be happy to accommodate them. If they like it here, we'll help them stay."

For some, the first question is: Should they leave? Amy Grace, an obstetrician/gynecologist who finished her residency and joined a five-doctor practice in New Orleans two months ago, is undecided. She doesn't know when she can return to the city or how many patients will come back. Yet, if she moves to another state, it could take her three to six months to get her license.

"My mind changes from hour to hour," says Grace, who is staying with family in Birmingham, Ala. "One minute I say, 'Yes, I'm going back.' And the next, I think, 'What happens when the next hurricane comes?' "

Katrina's Unsung Victims (WP)

By Jennifer Moses

DOJ_NMG_0006116

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- I keep seeing pictures of the president with his shirt-sleeves rolled up, surveying the damage to New Orleans. But I wonder if he has any idea just who the folks are who have been displaced by Hurricane Katrina. I ask because here in Baton Rouge we keep hearing about the desperately poor, and sometimes criminal, hordes Katrina has washed up on the shores of decent, hardworking, middle-class America: the (mainly black) gangs from the projects who, even during normal times, wreaked havoc on their fellow citizens, not to mention the merely poor -- teen mothers, drug addicts, the chronically unemployed.

But the shelter in which I've been volunteering tells a different story. At the convention center downtown, where the Red Cross is serving hundreds of evacuees, public schoolteachers sleeping in Area 2-C tutor the children of their "neighbors" in 2-B; teenage boys in high-tops and low-riding pants bring snacks to the people in wheelchairs; and, last Sunday, men whose paths had never crossed before sat huddled together watching giant television screens, rooting for the Saints and trading jokes.

Indeed, an aura of normality and order pervades even this bizarre community, built of rows and rows of folding canvas cots, donated bed linens and garbage bags filled with other people's castoff clothing, and peopled by the young and old, black and white, American-born and foreign-born: a United Nations of languages, a stew of stories.

The good news is that, aside from chronic shortages of underwear and canvas bags, people's physical needs are being taken care of, thanks largely to the thousands of Red Cross volunteers and others from all over the country and the world. We have one such volunteer, from London, staying at our house through October. Yet once the immediate crisis ends, "our" volunteer, and others like her, will be going home, as will the hundreds of journalists who, since Katrina hit, can boast that they can locate Baton Rouge on a map.

But what's Mike going to do? Mike is a fifth-generation Cajun New Orleanian. He's worked on the river barges his entire adult life. "I rode out Hugo," he said as he sat on his cot, an expression of pure bewilderment on his deeply lined face. "And I rode out Andrew, and both times we got back on our feet, but this time things is different." His house, his car and all of his belongings are gone; worse, he has virtually no savings and only the most minimal insurance.

And then there's Lydia, a middle-aged black woman who told me that just before the storm hit, the youngest of her five children graduated with honors from the University of New Orleans, joining her four older siblings in the ranks of college graduates. Lydia has worked as a special education aide in the New Orleans public schools for 25 years and two weeks, and so far this month she hasn't seen a dime from either the state or Uncle Sam. Her house? Underwater. Her savings? Nonexistent, all her extra pennies having gone toward her kids' educations.

John is a young man with striking, movie-star looks who arrived at the shelter alone, as his wife had died in the storm. He cried in my arms. Bruce is a retired professor of comparative literature. Randolph is a cook who'd worked for decades at the New Orleans fairgrounds and then at Mike Anderson's, a popular seafood restaurant. Barry and Sylvia had a landscaping business.

Not one of them has a home to go back to, investments to fall back on, or much in the way of savings or insurance. No pension funds; no IRAs; no stocks or bonds or country club memberships or family compounds in Maine or vacations in Europe or facelifts or Pilates classes or an opportunity to go back to school and finally get that doctorate in philosophy or the history of art.

What I'm learning in the shelters is that it's not just the poor who have no place to go and no place to fall back on; it's also ordinary working people who in better times might have been counted as part of the middle class, too.

Where are my new friends going to go?

New Orleans Residents Return Home (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper, Shawn Young, And Betsy Mckay, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Some New Orleans residents returned to their homes and businesses to begin cleaning up the damage left by Hurricane Katrina, and Mayor Ray Nagin said large swaths of the city would be reopened starting tomorrow.

Yesterday's announcement by the mayor amounted to an abandonment of efforts to persuade thousands of holdouts still in the battered city to leave. A New Orleans police spokesman said no one hunkered down in a home nearly three weeks after the storm hit would be forced out despite the lack of power and drinkable water in many parts of the city.

It isn't clear how many of the 180,000 residents -- roughly a third of the city's population -- allowed to return to their New Orleans neighborhoods will want to endure unpleasant living conditions ranging from piles of rotting food to a dearth of basic services. New Orleans public schools remain closed, and the school system has run out of money to pay teachers beyond the day before Katrina hit.

Still, Mr. Nagin's declaration showed that New Orleans is starting to recover much sooner than expected. Signs of recovery were evident yesterday throughout the French Quarter, where residents piled garbage along streets and said they were able to proceed through checkpoints without showing identification or special permits issued by city officials.

Business owners will be allowed to return to the French Quarter, central business district and other sections of New Orleans starting tomorrow. Algiers, a neighborhood of about 50,000 across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter, will reopen to residents Monday, followed later next week by areas that include the historic Garden District. French Quarter residents will be allowed to return Sept. 26.

In an interview, Mr. Nagin said he has "the final say" in deciding when it is safe for residents to return. "The health people are saying they are not seeing any significant risks."

The influx of returning residents worries some federal public-health and environmental officials, who have found high levels of lead in the water and sewage-related bacteria. Air-quality tests have found no significant levels of contaminants, according to the Environmental Protection Agency.

City's Coming Back, But Not To Normal Life (USAT)

By Laura Parker And Alan Levin

USA Today, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The city of New Orleans will reopen four unflooded neighborhoods, including the bawdy, historic French Quarter, to businesses and residents beginning this weekend.

“It is a good day in New Orleans. The sun is shining. We're bringing the city of New Orleans back. This is the first step,” Mayor Ray Nagin said. “The city of New Orleans … will start to breathe again.”

The death toll from Hurricane Katrina in five states stood at 794 people, 558 of them in Louisiana.

Although nearly half of New Orleans is still flooded, Nagin said he was allowing people to return over the coming week to large sections of the city that are dry. Nagin said about 180,000 people could return home to a city that held about 460,000 before Katrina hit.

“We will have life,” he said. “We will have commerce. We will have people getting into … the rhythm that makes this city so unique.”

The Army Corps of Engineers said that, barring rainfall, the city will be drained by Oct. 2.

Most of the city has electricity. But city water is largely undrinkable, schools remain shut, and thousands of waterlogged homes need to be pulled down and rebuilt. Levees need repairs, and a nighttime curfew will be in effect to hold down crime.

Those who return should not expect much, city officials said.

“Just because the electricity is going, it doesn't mean that all the gas stations are open,” mayoral executive assistant Greg Mefert said. “The residents need to have very realistic expectations of how the city is functioning, and they can't expect complete normality and to go about their normal day.”

Meanwhile, Mississippi was struggling to deal with the needs of hundreds of thousands of people whose homes were devastated by Katrina. FEMA said two-thirds of the homes in six coastal counties are uninhabitable. Mississippi sued insurance companies to force them to pay for storm-surge damage; many policies include provisions that exclude losses from floods.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration said Thursday that its analysis showed Katrina was the most destructive storm ever to strike the USA. Its maximum winds of 175 mph were slightly lower than Camille in 1969, but the huge size of Katrina made for much worse destruction.

The Coast Guard said Katrina may have spilled 7 million gallons of oil from facilities in southeastern Louisiana — two-thirds the amount spilled from the Exxon Valdez in Alaska 16 years ago.

'We Will Have Life,' Mayor Promises (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 -- The city of New Orleans will begin to reopen this weekend, Mayor C. Ray Nagin announced on Thursday, the first step toward reversing the unprecedented evacuation and closure of a modern American city.

The city has been largely shuttered, abandoned and militarized since the floods from Hurricane Katrina, but by the weekend, owners of shops, restaurants and other businesses may return to the portions of New Orleans that remained relatively dry, Nagin said. And by Monday, the first residents may begin to filter into the city neighborhood known as Algiers. Residents of Uptown and the French Quarter will follow.

The reentry plan will repopulate areas that, before the storm, were home to 182,000 people, or about a third of the city's residents.

"We will have life, we will have commerce, we will have people getting back into their normal modes of operation and the normal rhythm of the city of New Orleans that is so unique," Nagin said.

Formidable challenges remain, however, even for that third of the population that may return.

Authorities warned residents not to drink or bathe in the water in most of the city because contaminated floodwaters are seeping into waterlines through major breaks. The 911 emergency-call system is not fully operational. Even in the least affected areas, thousands of homes are without power, and the lack of traffic lights has led to accidents among some of the emergency vehicles rolling through city streets.

Asked whether the reentry plan may be premature, Nagin said, "I'm getting all kinds of push that I'm moving a little too slow."

Some residents have already begun sneaking into the city to assess the damage or retrieve clothes. A few have been pleasantly surprised.

Amanda Zirkenbach, 28, returned to her "shotgun double" home in the Mid-City section of New Orleans. With its fancy porch and balustrades, it is typical of many older homes in a city where as many as 37,000 buildings are in historic districts. It is also raised about five feet above the ground.

"The water just came up to the top of the front steps," she said of the home once occupied by her grandparents. "Those old architects knew what they were doing. They built them up higher because they didn't have the modern levees to protect us."

The news could be worse for other portions of the city, some of which may remain underwater until early October, authorities said. Of the 160,000 homes in the city, it is not known how many were destroyed by the flooding.

Nagin said he estimates that about 60,000 may be beyond repair. That could leave tens of thousands of former residents in shelters far away from home for months and possibly longer.

Viewed from the street, hundreds of homes that had been underwater and have since dried show little damage aside from the mud and a waterline. Elsewhere, old wood-frame houses apparently floated in the flood, smashed into one another and splintered. Experts say the structural integrity of many homes may have been undermined, and officials note that the worst damage may be in those homes that have been inundated for two weeks or more.

An official of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers said on Thursday that downtown New Orleans will be clear of floodwaters by Oct. 2, and the eastern part of the city by Sept. 30 -- which is a week earlier than previous estimates. Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes south and east of the city are also expected to be clear of floodwaters by the end of this month, earlier than predicted.

Col. Duane Gapinski said pumps are removing about 7 billion gallons of floodwater a day, although about 45 percent of the city remains inundated. Another official said the Corps has removed 240,000 cubic yards of debris.

Unsure whether businesspeople will return in large enough numbers to serve the residents, Nagin said he has contacted three major businesses about the possibility of temporarily setting up shop in the city's Convention Center and providing food and other necessities.

Health care is another concern, with floodwaters containing dangerous amounts of bacteria.

Nagin said Children's Hospital will be open for emergencies. But Brian Landry, a hospital vice president, said it will likely be a couple of weeks before the Uptown hospital could open its doors.

Landry said staff members who had evacuated will have to be brought back.

Aside from worries that damaged homes could collapse on returnees, another key concern for city officials is law and order.

Nagin touted the fact that, with the emptying of the city, it is "crime-free and drug-free" for the first time in years. "The bad guys have been rooted out," he said.

Authorities said they will do what they can to keep out the criminals who had plagued the city for years. They said the city will initially be under a dusk-to-dawn curfew.

Even though the New Orleans police force has dwindled from 1,750 to 1,350 officers since Hurricane Katrina, Police Superintendent P. Edwin Compass III expressed confidence Thursday that the diminished force could handle the task. "We have a much smaller city to police," he said.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration said Thursday that Hurricane Katrina was the most destructive storm to strike the United States, the Associated Press reported. State and local officials said the death toll as of Thursday was 558 in Louisiana and 218 in Mississippi.

Mayor Announces Plan To Allow Residents To Return (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi And Ashley Powers, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Declaring that his flood-scarred, depopulated town "will breathe again," New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Thursday that the city's historic French Quarter, downtown business district and other viable neighborhoods would reopen under a phased plan starting this weekend.

Defying predictions that the city would stagnate for months until essential services were restored, authorities decided to allow residents and businesses to begin returning to their homes under a staggered resettlement plan.

As many as 180,000 residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina will eventually be allowed to move back into homes and apartments that escaped overwhelming flood and storm damage, the mayor said.

"It is a good day in New Orleans," Nagin said during a televised news conference. "The sun is shining. We're bringing New Orleans back. This is our first step. We are opening up this city and almost 200,000 residents will be able to come back and get this city going once again."

The move will quickly revitalize many of the city's iconic, picturesque sections: the iron-gated balconies and neon-lit strip joints of the French Quarter, the whitewashed Civil War mansions of the Garden District and the hotels and office towers of the Central Business District.

But even as he hailed his city's semi-return, Nagin also acknowledged that dwellings that housed half of the city's 450,000 residents will have to be razed. "Most of the homes that were flooded that stayed in the water for a number of weeks will most likely be destroyed," Nagin said.

Under a plan approved by Nagin and by state and federal officials, business owners will re-enter this weekend. Residents will follow, returning to lightly damaged west bank and central city neighborhoods next week and then to the French Quarter a week from Monday.

"We will have life," Nagin said. "We will have commerce. We will have people getting into their normal modes of operation, and the normal rhythm of the city of New Orleans."

The decision to open large swaths of New Orleans followed the rapid retreat of floodwaters that still cover 40 percent of the city, and swift progress by repair crews in restoring electricity and water service.

The tipping point, Nagin said, was good news that came in a recent round of government-conducted environmental tests. The results showed that remaining floodwaters still contain dangerous bacteria and chemicals, but that the city's air is safe to breathe.

The water, Nagin said, is "not good for you to drink or bathe in, just for flushing and firefighting. We're working feverishly to make sure the water quality gets better. We still have a couple of major breaks and contaminated water that is seeping in through the leaks."

Nagin gave a nod to state officials and to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, whose officials he had blasted a week before for failing to move quickly to aid the city. At his side Thursday was Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, who took over the federal relief effort from former FEMA director Michael D. Brown, who resigned on Monday.

"There has been an uncommon display of unity among federal, state and local folks to put together a re-entry plan," Allen said.

Nagin acknowledged that the city's returning population will not surpass 250,000 until the city replaces thousands of flooded and water-eroded homes -- a massive project that planners and officials say could take years.

A woman who identified herself as a resident of the Lower 9th Ward stepped up and asked Nagin when she could return to her neighborhood, where floodwaters receded only in the last several days.

"Water was up to the roof (in that area) up until three days ago," Nagin replied. "That's most likely the area that will be opened up on the back end" of the city's rebuilding effort.

In Baton Rouge, New Orleans evacuee George Richardson, 40, brightened at the thought of returning home. "Like in `The Wizard of Oz,' if I could clap my heels, I'd be home. If I had three wishes, that'd be one of them," said Richardson, a pathologist who has been sheltered since the flood at the Baton Rouge River Center.

Those returning to their homes in the next several weeks will do so at the risk of new flooding, a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers director said Thursday. Multiple breaches of the levees guarding Lake Pontchartrain will not be completely repaired until next June, said Daniel Hitchings, a regional business director for the Corps' Mississippi Valley Division.

Riccardi reported from New Orleans and Powers from Baton Rouge. Times staff writers Stephen Braun in Washington, Tony Perry in Houston and Ralph Vartabedian in New Orleans contributed to this report.

New Orleans To Open Some Neighborhoods (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 - More than two weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated this city and prompted a mass evacuation, Mayor C. Ray Nagin announced a plan on Thursday for as many as 180,000 residents and business owners to return - at least during the daylight hours.

Mayor Nagin, emphasizing that city services are still minimal, said that residents in certain areas could return to collect belongings and assess damage to their property but that they would be asked to leave at the end of each day.

The tentative re-entry plan calls for residents to be allowed into the Algiers neighborhood by the weekend. Uptown would be accessible by the middle of next week and the French Quarter on Sept. 26. The city's downtown and the other three areas will be open to business owners over the weekend. All are areas that suffered less damage from the storm. But, city officials said, the schedules may change.

"Our strategy is to repopulate the city in the safest areas first and to get enough critical mass going so that the economics of this center city start to flow," Mayor Nagin said. "Then, simultaneously, we will be involved in probably the biggest urban reconstruction project in the country's history."

But the mayor and other officials conceded that the details of how the plan would work remained unclear.

City Attorney Sherry S. Landry acknowledged that some residents might try to stay, and she said those who were out on the streets after dusk might be escorted from the city by military personnel.

Mayor Nagin said he hoped to have a computer system at entry points to track re-entering residents by Social Security number, date of birth and address. "Everybody's going to want to come," he said.

On Thursday, as the death toll from the storm statewide rose to 558, few traffic lights were working. Most water was undrinkable. A makeshift 911 system was still being run by the military. Floodwaters and sludge remained a health risk.

Power was being restored in some areas that are part of the plan, but not in others.

Still, the tentative re-entry plan was one of several signs that conditions were improving. In Houston, the Astrodome, which on Sept. 4 housed 17,500 evacuees, was vacated on Thursday. Many of its remaining 779 inhabitants were moved a short distance across a parking lot to Reliant Arena, part of the same complex. Other evacuees were moved out of the complex to residences.

The people remaining in another part in the complex, Reliant Center, are to be moved on Friday into the Arena, officials said.

In New Orleans, Mayor Nagin said that as many as half of the city's 160,000 homes might have to be destroyed, but that electricity is being restored rapidly to areas that can be saved, and minimal hospital and emergency services will soon be available.

The re-entry announcement came as officials of the Army Corps of Engineer warned that even in a moderate storm the repaired levees might not prevent new flooding.

Daniel Hitchings, regional business director of the Mississippi Valley Division of the Corps of Engineers, said the levees would be repaired to their prestorm standard by next June - in time for the 2006 hurricane season.

Mr. Hitchings said that water might breach some levees during a new rainstorm but that the flooding would not be "life threatening." Some houses in New Orleans, he pointed out, flood even "in a two-inch storm."

Mr. Hitchings said that Mayor Nagin had been briefed about the possibility of new flooding. Rainfall has been uncommonly low since the storm, allowing the Corps of Engineers to drain floodwaters faster than it expected.

Experts have met in Vicksburg, Miss., to consider how to armor the city against any hurricanes that might head for the damaged city.

One stopgap measure mentioned by some in the Corps of Engineers would create a wall atop the earth levees by driving corrugated metal into the soil and then capping the protruding metal with concrete.

After residents move into less damaged areas, Mayor Nagin said, those from heavily damaged areas, like the Lower Ninth Ward, will be given first preference to return. The government will "make sure that there are places for them," he added.

While returning residents may find a city vastly different from the one they fled, crime is now essentially nonexistent, the mayor said. "This city for the first time that anyone can probably imagine is drug free and violence free, and we are intent on keeping that way," the mayor said.

Parts Of New Orleans Will Be Reopened (WT/AP)

By Brett Martel, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Mayor C. Ray Nagin yesterday said large parts of the city will reopen in the next two weeks, including the French Quarter, a plan that would allow about 38 percent of the population to return beginning Monday.

"We will have life. We will have commerce. We will have people getting into their normal modes of operations and the normal rhythm of the city of New Orleans that is so unique," Mr. Nagin said.

The return of residents to areas that suffered little or no flooding and were among the least-damaged parts of the city will mark the beginning of what federal officials predict will be the biggest urban reconstruction project in U.S. history.

"I imagine building a city so original, so unique that everybody's going to want to come," said Mr. Nagin, who predicted that half of the city's nearly half-million population would return in the next three to six months.

President Bush, several hours later in a prime-time address from the French Quarter's Jackson Square, vowed to rebuild the Gulf Coast, primarily with federal money, estimated at $200 billion or beyond.

"This great city will rise again," Mr. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0006122

The re-population of the city would proceed by ZIP code, starting Monday in the Algiers section, a Creole-influenced neighborhood across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter. The city's Uptown section, which includes the Garden District's leafy streets and antebellum mansions, will open in stages next Wednesday and Friday.

The French Quarter -- the very heart and soul of the city's rollicking tourism industry -- will follow on Sept. 26.

"The French Quarter is high and dry, and we feel as though it has good electricity capabilities," the mayor said, "but since it's so historic, we want to double- and triple-check before we fire up all electricity in there to make sure that, because every building is so close, that if a fire breaks out, we won't lose a significant amount of what we cherish in this city."

The announcement came amid progress in restoring power and water service and the day after the release of government tests showing that the floodwaters still contain dangerous bacteria and industrial chemicals, but that the air is safe to breathe.

Mr. Nagin said there should be power in areas where people will be allowed back, an area where about 182,000 of the city's 485,000 residents live. But the water will be good only for flushing toilets, not for drinking and bathing, and there will be a dusk-to-dawn curfew.

Major retailers will use the city's convention center, where people fleeing floodwaters endured days of despair before help arrived, as a makeshift mall to sell returning residents food, wood and other things they will need.

Despite the good news, large sections of New Orleans remained accessible only by boat, and corpses could still be seen out in the open. In flooded streets near the University of New Orleans' campus along Lake Pontchartrain, two bodies were seen floating facedown, and the decomposed corpse of one woman was sprawled on the top step of a church, her skin wrinkled and leathery, her cane lying beside her.

Across five Gulf Coast states, the death toll from Katrina stood at 794, led by 558 in Louisiana.

In the hard-hit Ninth Ward, National Guard Col. Michael Thompson said his troops have seen the bodies of several people who had been killed.

"I've got a lot of police officers on my staff, and they recognize the signs of it. You'd see the entry wound of the bullet and the exit wound," Col. Thompson said. "So it was obvious that something had taken place other than natural death."

He said the two biggest challenges facing his troops were aggressive dogs and poor sanitation. He said pit bulls left behind by evacuating residents have formed packs and were attacking soldiers. One soldier was forced to shoot a dog that attacked him, he said.

Meanwhile, the Army Corps of Engineers said it is getting water pumped out of eastern New Orleans and nearby parishes faster than expected, and most of the area should be dry by the end of this month -- about a week earlier than estimated.

Tourism brings $10 billion to New Orleans annually and accounts for about 15 percent of the city's jobs. The city relies heavily on the dollars that tourists and conventioneers spend in the French Quarter's cafes, strip bars, jazz clubs, restaurants and stores. The dollars also feed the Quarter's cast of characters -- the street musicians, mime artists, palm readers, hot dog vendors, street artists.

Word of the reopening raised spirits in the neighborhood.

"There's no reason why this area shouldn't have been taken care of already -- it's where the money is," said Frank Redmond, who helps run a small French Quarter bar called Evelyn's Place. "If you want to get people back to work, get this area open, and the tourists, the curiosity-seekers, will want to come back and see what happened."

In other developments:

•Mr. Nagin asked mayors across the United States to take censuses of displaced New Orleans residents so the city knows where they are and can communicate with them about reconstruction.

•A total of 482 trailers have been delivered to chemical, natural gas and oil refineries in southwestern Louisiana, authorities said. Workers will live in them while they get the equipment running again.

•Thousands of hurricane survivors who took shelter in the Houston Astrodome packed their possessions yesterday and moved to the Reliant Center, a smaller building, where officials sought to consolidate the dwindling number of refugees who still don't have permanent housing.

About 3,600 remained in Houston's four main shelters, down from a high of 27,100.

Some Of The Uprooted Won't Go Home Again (WP)

By Richard Morin And Lisa Rein, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 15 -- Fewer than half of all New Orleans evacuees living in emergency shelters here said they will move back home, while two-thirds of those who want to relocate planned to settle permanently in the Houston area, according to a survey by The Washington Post, the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation and the Harvard School of Public Health.

The wide-ranging poll found that these survivors of Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath remain physically and emotionally battered but unbroken. They praised God and the U.S. Coast Guard for saving them, but two weeks after the storm, nearly half still sought word about missing loved ones or close friends who may not have been as lucky.

Most already know they have no home left to return to. The overwhelming majority lack insurance to cover their losses. Few have bank checking accounts, savings accounts or credit cards that work. Still, nearly nine in 10 said they were "hopeful" about the future. And while half said they felt depressed about what lies ahead, just a third said they were afraid.

"I'm setting goals for myself, and I'm ready to conquer them," said Lakisha Morris, 30, who was plucked from her roof and spent two nights outdoors on an interstate highway before boarding a bus for Houston. She said she wants to start her own business in this city, possibly day care for the children of fellow evacuees.

The poll vividly documents the immediate and dramatic changes that Hurricane Katrina has brought to two major American cities. It also suggests that what may be occurring is a massive -- and, perhaps, permanent -- transfer of a block of poor people from one city to another. That may have social, economic and political consequences that will be felt for decades, if not generations, in both communities.

Forty-three percent of these evacuees planned to return to New Orleans, the survey found. But just as many -- 44 percent -- said they will settle somewhere else, while the remainder were unsure. Many of those who were planning to return said they will be looking to buy or rent somewhere other than where they lived. Overall, only one in four said they plan to move back into their old homes, the poll found.

Some cannot wait. "Every morning I wake up and pray for them to say we can go back to New Orleans," said Lynette Toca, 26, a homemaker with two young sons who had never been outside her city before they drove to Houston the Saturday before the hurricane swept through on Aug. 29.

According to the poll, most of those who did not plan to go back to New Orleans are already living in their new hometown. Fully two in three of the 44 percent who will not return said they plan to permanently relocate in the Houston area, the city that now is home to about 125,000 New Orleans evacuees.

A total of 680 randomly selected evacuees living temporarily in the Astrodome, Reliant Center and George R. Brown Convention Center, as well as five Red Cross shelters in the Houston area, were interviewed Sept. 10 to 12 for this Post-Kaiser-Harvard survey. More than 8,000 evacuees were living in these facilities and awaiting transfer to other housing when the interviewing was conducted.

More than nine in 10 of these evacuees said they were residents of New Orleans, while the remainder said they were from the surrounding area or elsewhere in Louisiana. The margin of sampling error for the overall results is plus or minus four percentage points. Potential differences between these evacuees and those not living in shelters or those who lived elsewhere in the affected Gulf Coast region make it impossible to conclude that these results accurately reflect the views of all Gulf Coast residents displaced by Katrina.

The Post-Kaiser-Harvard poll suggests these evacuees will start their lives with virtually nothing. Seven in 10 currently do not have a savings or checking account. Just as many have no usable credit cards.

Missing, too, from their lives are the vital support networks of relatives and friends that have temporarily absorbed the bulk of those who fled the Gulf Coast storm zone: Eight in 10 said they have no one that they can stay with until they get back on their feet.

The poll suggests that the story of these evacuees is not merely about how little they were left with -- it is also about how fragile their lives were even before the storm hit. Together, the findings suggest the long-term challenges posed by the evacuees to local and state governments already cutting back services to their neediest citizens.

According to the poll, six in 10 evacuees had family incomes of less than $20,000 last year. Half have children younger than 18. One in eight was unemployed when the storm hit. Seven in 10 said they have no insurance to cover their losses. Fully half have no health insurance. Four in 10 suffer from heart disease, diabetes, high blood pressure or are physically disabled.

When illness or injury strike, they were twice as likely to say they had sought care from hospitals such as the New Orleans Charity Hospital than from either a family doctor or health clinic -- needs for costly services that now will be transferred to hospitals in the Houston area or wherever these evacuees eventually settle.

This survey suggests some of these emergency shelters may be forced to shelter evacuees for weeks and months, or perhaps longer. While half expected to be relocated to an apartment, house or with a volunteer family within a few days, one in five expected to be living in an emergency shelter for at least a few more weeks. Indeed, Houston officials said this week that they have delayed their goal of emptying the temporary shelters by this coming weekend, in part because so many of the remaining evacuees lack resources to set up households on their own.

The survey also provides disquieting clues as to why so many residents remained in New Orleans to face Hurricane Katrina despite orders to evacuate. A third of those who stayed said they never heard the mandatory order to evacuate issued by the mayor the day before the storm hit. Somewhat fewer -- 28 percent -- said they heard the order but did not understand what they were to do. Thirty-six percent acknowledged they heard the order, understood it but did not leave. In hindsight, 56 percent said they could have evacuated, while 42 percent said it was impossible.

Bad decisions, bad luck or sheer stubbornness kept many in town. More than a third said the single biggest reason they did not leave was that they thought the storm would not be as bad as it was, or they decided too late to flee. One in 10 simply did not want to leave. Slightly fewer stayed behind to protect their homes from damage or theft. A handful said they did not want to leave pets.

Angie Oneal, 44, a housekeeper from the Sixth Ward, heard the warnings to leave on her radio. But she stayed to protect her belongings.

"I said to myself, if we went through Bessie, I thought we could go through Katrina," Oneal said. "I thought it was just going to pass over." She worried about the new TV, computer and bedroom set she had just bought.

The days immediately after the storm but before they were evacuated to Houston were filled with terror, pain and uncertainty.

A third of the interviewees said they had been trapped in their homes and had to be rescued; four in 10 said they spent at least a day living outdoors on the street. Four in 10 were rescued by the Coast Guard, the National Guard, police officers or firefighters. Still, half said friends or neighbors helped them to safety (25 percent) or they managed to reach safe havens on their own (24 percent).

A majority said there was a time when they were without food or water. A third were trapped in the city without their prescription drugs. One in five managed to survive the storm, only to be threatened or assaulted by other survivors in the chaos that followed Katrina.

Religious faith has sustained the respondents through their worst days in New Orleans and now during their time in Houston. Eight in 10 said their faith was very important during the past two weeks. Remarkably, 81 percent said the ordeal has strengthened their belief, while only 4 percent said it weakened it.

"We say, God did this for a reason, to clean up the shootings and murders that have become New Orleans," said Dorothy Stukes, 54, a school security officer from Jefferson Parish who said she spent "four days of hell" in the Louisiana Superdome. "Ninety-five percent of us are good people, but now God is going to take care of those that are not."

While the hurricane drew most New Orleans evacuees closer to God, it further estranged many from their government and political leaders. Three-quarters agreed that the response was too slow "and there's no excuse." Seven in 10 disapproved of the way President Bush has handled the recovery effort. But majorities were also critical of Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (58 percent) and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (53 percent). Overall, six in 10 said the initially sluggish government response has made them feel that "government doesn't care" about people like them, according to the poll.

Assistant polling director Claudia Deane contributed to this report.

For Evacuees At Shelter, An Uncertain Next Step (WP)

By Kevin Merida, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

DALLAS, Sept. 15 -- The Dallas Convention Center has been a strange but comforting replacement neighborhood for those whose real 'hoods were drowned by Katrina. Here, the miserable and the hopeful, thrown together by common circumstance, have been trying to sort out their futures.

The sorting has taken place in a gigantic parking garage-turned-shelter run by the American Red Cross. Many of the evacuees who have been living under bright fluorescent ceiling lights, their belongings stacked on cots and air mattresses, have never faced so many life choices so fast. Do I stay in the Dallas area or leave? If I take this apartment, will I be able to afford it in five months? If I take a job in the suburbs, how difficult will it be to get to work and back?

"It's like we-the-people versus an unknown," explains Melvin Hewitt, a Service Employees International Union rep from the Gentilly area of New Orleans.

The enemy is now the unfamiliar, the struggle one of the mind. Some evacuees are restless and desperate to construct new lives, and others are still processing the tragedy -- five days on an overpass, three days on a roof, alligators in the water, bodies floating by. They need a much longer respite from worry so they can heal.

Peggy Lodge, who was folding donated clothes one late afternoon, separating summer from winter garments, said she wouldn't mind staying at the convention center for a year. "See, I got flashbacks now," said Lodge, a janitor on disability.

She was rescued by helicopter from the balcony of her mid-city New Orleans home, and now the sounds of a whirring chopper spook her. A helicopter sighting outside the convention center the other day spurred her to run back inside. "I can't deal with helicopters no more," she said, her voice cracking, her mama sitting nearby. "They came too late for us, they came too late."

Texas officials estimate their state has absorbed more than 200,000 Gulf Coast hurricane survivors, the majority of whom have scattered to apartments and hotels, churches and private homes. But approximately 20,000 remain in convention centers and sports arenas, the last resort for those who had nowhere else to turn or haven't yet decided where they belong.

In Dallas, however, time is running out for shelter residents. A coalition of city, church and business leaders is working furiously to implement an ambitious plan to place all of the convention center's inhabitants in housing by Sunday, to be celebrated by a Mardi Gras-style festival downtown. As of Thursday, the convention center's shelter population had dwindled to 200, from 1,500 a week earlier. Bishop T.D. Jakes, one of the nation's most prominent ministers and a key organizer of the effort, is calling it "Project Exodus."

The plan was hatched last week over a dinner at the home of Dallas Mayor Laura Miller. Among the guests were Jakes and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin. Under the plan, shelter residents would be provided two months' free rent -- including utilities -- in an apartment or single-family home. They would be relocated close to public transportation and be given a package of basic household items -- pots and dishes, linens and towels. A host family would be assigned to ease their transition. 7-Eleven is selling Mardi Gras beads for a buck to raise money for the relocation. Kroger, the grocery chain, has agreed to donate gift cards.

But many shelter residents aren't so eager to go, as Project Exodus volunteers are discovering. The volunteers, in their hot-pink T-shirts, set up a table at the shelter but encountered some trepidation: Where exactly is Duncanville? What's it like in Pleasant Grove? Thus, some evacuees are simply being transferred to another shelter down the street. In fact, the shelter population at Reunion Arena, the city's indefinite way station, has doubled in two days -- from 300 to 600.

"They coming up with everything trying to get us out quick," said Debra Johnson of Uptown New Orleans who is traveling with two children, a husband, a sister-in-law and three nieces. "I don't know nothing about Dallas." Even though she's uneasy, she's willing to give Project Exodus a shot. "I feel like we came here from the Superdome, we've recuperated and it's time to move on," she said. "If I can survive the Superdome, I can survive anything."

What distinguishes the denizens of the shelter from other evacuees is they set up a community of their own in a building. There were hair-braiding sessions and card games, and one man even organized an outdoor barbecue. Informal leaders emerged to challenge the elected ones. When Nagin showed up at the shelter last week, it was union rep Hewitt who asked him some tough questions.

It's a surreal little world, though, living in a space roped off by yellow police tape, the living quarters marked by numbers on pillars, the pillars serving as de facto addresses, as in: I'm staying up at pole 82. Come check me out. Showers were taken outside, by schedule, in a hazmat decontamination tent. A line the length of two city blocks sometimes formed for a grilled-chicken dinner.

A social structure formed around six big-screen television sets. One TV was reserved for news, another for cartoons and other children's programming. The shelter's teenagers and twentysomethings commandeered another set -- must keep current with their pop culture, meaning must see the new videos of Kanye West and Omarion.

Gilbert King, a teacher's aide from St. Bernard Parish who was frustrated with the programming choices, tried unsuccessfully for several days to get a cable line run to a TV that was donated to him. "A lot of these people want to watch all this foolishness," complained King, who wanted to watch more public affairs programs. Nonstop movies were shown on a couple of the other televisions. The other day a bootlegged DVD copy of the recently released "Hustle & Flow" surfaced, to the screaming delight of evacuees.

They had everything they needed in this 200,000-square-foot parking garage -- from grief counselors to computers with Internet access. Just no privacy. Public address announcements were constant, as if you were living in an airport terminal. Police officers, Texas National Guardsmen, Red Cross and Federal Emergency Management Agency officials, medics, clergy and an army of volunteers all invaded the evacuees' limited space.

And don't forget the stars. Colin Powell came and so did Jamie Foxx, who served food in the chow line. Mary Hart of "Entertainment Tonight" arrived with a truckload of kiddie surprises from Toys R Us.

Separate from the shelter is a FEMA-run disaster recovery center housed in another hall of the convention center. This is where evacuees come to do serious business. FEMA gives them a checklist with 21 services and agencies to access -- from setting up a post office box to getting free bus passes, from obtaining food stamps to applying for a low-interest federal loan.

National Travel Systems will arrange for a one-way plane or bus ticket to anywhere. The Internal Revenue Service hands out information about how to amend your 2004 tax return to claim hurricane losses and possibly get a refund.

These large shelters were never intended to be long-term solutions, merely a bridge. But in Dallas, at least, the bridge is about to shut down, forcing some instant decisions by people who are still contending with the awfulness of the past three weeks.

This internal struggle -- What to do? How to feel? Where to go? When to leave? -- was on display the other afternoon in a wandering conversation outside the men's bathroom of the shelter. The two Tyrones -- acquaintances in New Orleans, cot mates in the shelter -- took a squat in a couple of folding chairs.

They had been through the same experience but are of different minds about it.

Tyrone Horton, 39, a forklift driver back home, is focused on finding a job but is proceeding methodically. He has a work prospect in the suburban city of Irving, but he wonders how difficult it will be to get back and forth. He pulls from his pocket a business card from an AmeriSuites representative who offered a free two-week hotel stay.

It was a tempting offer, he admits, a chance to kick back in a real bed with a color television and a private shower. But then what? Without a car, Horton is hesitant to act too fast, feeling like he needs more knowledge of the city first. And yet he recognizes that he needs to get settled somewhere, for his own sanity. "Personally, I just want to get employed. I don't want an idle mind. Sometimes if you don't keep busy, that ain't too good."

The other Tyrone, Tyrone Jenkins, is in a different state -- dispirited, broken. He just sits while Horton is talking, stripping the label off a plastic bottle of Ozark water and then crushing it in his hands. Jenkins, 31, was a construction worker in New Orleans. "I lost a $15,000 car. I lost over $9,000 worth of clothes. I lost $20,000 cash. Now, I ain't got nothing." Jenkins pauses. "I want my car back. I want my clothes back. And I want my cash back."

Jenkins has a mouth full of gold teeth and no smile. He bears a slight resemblance to Mike Tyson. He is wearing Rocawear jeans and a blue-and-gold Rocawear hat, slightly tilted. Most of the clothes he lost in the storm were Rocawear, the hip-hop fashion line associated with rap powerhouses Jay Z and Damon Dash, and that's at the heart of how bummed he is.

But losing $20,000 in cash? That's the most curious of his losses. Jenkins explains that he doesn't believe in banks and had his cash stashed in a big brown grocery bag, hidden in his 2002 Buick LeSabre. Horton listens to Jenkins's story, his eyes conveying the look of utter disbelief. Twenty grand in a brown paper bag? Jenkins goes on: He has a brother on drugs and had to hide his money; otherwise it would've been stolen.

Horton interjects with a dose of common sense. "To say, 'I lost $20,000 and I want it back,' FEMA ain't giving you that back just because you from New Orleans and a victim of the hurricane."

Jenkins is too morose to respond. He has been wearing the same clothes for a week, and when it's suggested that free clothing from the Salvation Army is available, he just scoffs. "How I look walking around in some clothes from the '70s, looking like a hobo?"

Horton, an imposing dude clad in ordinary khaki shorts and a black pullover, has had enough of Jenkins's whining.

"Man, you fault everything," he chides. "Nothing come good from negativity. If you don't have patience, you going to end up at the Dallas County jail -- with no patience."

No response, so Horton tries humor.

"You'll be all right, brother, once you get those Rocawears back. You'll be like Superman."

But Jenkins clearly isn't in a playful mood.

"All jokes aside," Horton says, "we be thankful people. You got people who didn't make it, bro. People in the water. C'mon, man, it's bigger than that."

Jenkins concedes Horton has a point. But that's all he'll say. He just keeps crushing that Ozark water bottle.

New Orleans Neighbor Defends Closing Bridge To Evacuees (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

GRETNA, La. -- Little more than a week after this mostly white suburb became a symbol of callousness for using armed officers to seal one of the last escape routes from New Orleans -- trapping thousands of mostly black evacuees in the flooded city -- the Gretna City Council passed a resolution supporting the police chief's move.

"This wasn't just one man's decision," said Mayor Ronnie Harris on Thursday, as controversy continued about the move. "The whole community backs it."

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Gretna officers blocked the bridge over the Mississippi River that connects their city to New Orleans, exacerbating the sometimes troubled relationship with their neighbor.

Gretna (pop. 17,500) is a stubborn blue-collar city, two-thirds white, that prides itself on how quickly its police respond to 911 calls; it warily eyes its neighbor, a two-thirds black city that is also a perennial contender for the murder capital of the United States. .

Deprived of power, water and food for days after Katrina struck, Gretna was suddenly flooded with thousands of people fleeing New Orleans. The smaller town commandeered buses and moved more than 5,000 to a food station miles away. As number of evacuees spilling into Gretna grew, tensions rose. After arsonists set the local mall on fire, Police Chief Arthur Lawson proposed the blockade.

"I realized we couldn't continue, manpower-wise, fuel-wise," Lawson said Thursday. Armed Gretna police, helped by local sheriff's deputies and bridge police, stood guard and turned hundreds of men, women and children back to New Orleans.

Gretna is not the only community that views New Orleans with distrust. Authorities in St. Bernard Parish, to the south, stacked cars to seal the roads from the Crescent City into their parish. But Gretna's decision has become the symbol of the ultimate act of a bad neighbor, gaining notoriety partly from of an account in The Socialist Worker by two San Francisco emergency workers and labor leaders who were part of a crowd turned back by Gretna police.

Gretna officials have been deluged with angry e-mails, accusing them of racism. On Thursday, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Gretna officials "will have to live" with their decision.

"We allowed people to cross ... because they were dying in the convention center," Nagin said. "We made a decision to protect people. ... They made a decision to protect property."

Paul Ribaul, a 37-year-old engineer for a New Orleans television news station and Gretna native, said that residents of Gretna and other suburbs ringing New Orleans share much in common.

DOJ_NMG_0006128

"We say we're from New Orleans, but we're a suburb," he said. "The reason we don't live there is we don't like the crime, the politics."

Ribaul and many other Gretna residents praised the decision to close the bridge. "It makes you feel safe to live in a city like that," he said.

Critics have detected a racial motive, heatedly denied by most Gretna residents and city officials. Some residents say privately they're glad the city kept blacks out. Blacks in Gretna say that, though they get along with most of their white neighbors, a few harbor strong prejudices.

Still, Gretna's black residents are also wary of people from New Orleans.

"We don't have as much killing over here as in New Orleans," said Lesley Anne Williams, 42. Williams' mother, a lifelong Gretna resident, nonetheless disapproved of the Police Department's decision.

"They probably had a better chance of survival over here," she said of the refugees who were turned back, "especially with all that shooting" in New Orleans.

When Katrina hit Gretna, about 4,000 to 5,000 of the town's residents did not evacuate. Like New Orleans, Gretna lost power and water after Katrina hit. City officials pleaded for help from the state and FEMA but got no response.

Harris said Thursday he was satisfied that the refugees were turned back and that the bridge stayed closed for several more days.

"We didn't even have enough food here to feed our own residents," Harris said. "We took care of our folks. It's something we had to do."

Vietnamese Lose All, This Time To Katrina (USAT)

By Aimee Phan

USA Today, September 16, 2005

After years spent working and sacrificing to build a home and community in the USA, many Vietnamese-Americans have become refugees again. For these Vietnamese, this is the second major displacement within their lifetimes. For older people who escaped in the 1954 flight from the north to the south in the war against the French, this is their third mass evacuation.

While most Americans are still grappling with the chaos in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Vietnamese-Americans have firsthand experience with such catastrophic loss. The almost unbearable prospect of being uprooted to an unfamiliar place, living in detainment camps, starting over from nothing, is all too familiar.

In the early '80s, Vietnamese refugees started settling into enclaves around New Orleans, Biloxi and Mobile, attracted by the familiar humid climate and seeking to earn livings as fishermen and shrimpers. They learned English and passed citizenship requirements. They worked multiple jobs, put children through school and saved money to buy homes. They established businesses, temples and churches. According to the 2000 Census, more than 25,000 Vietnamese lived in Louisiana, nearly 6,000 in Mississippi and about 5,000 in Alabama. They considered these places home when Katrina destroyed everything.

One advantage in being a former refugee is understanding when help is needed. As news of Katrina's devastation spread, Vietnamese-Americans across the country rallied to contribute to relief efforts. With the help of Vietnamese-language radio stations, newspapers and religious organizations, they donated money, food, supplies and even their homes to evacuees.

About 15,000 Vietnamese have fled to Houston, but instead of heading to the Astrodome, many have sought refuge in Asian-American community centers, churches and temples, straining their resources. Thousands more are expected. There is concern the community might be trying to do too much on its own and that evacuees need government help.

The news media coverage and critique of Katrina response have largely been a black-and-white issue. But the recovery of the Vietnamese-Americans is important too, given their long history of displacement. Their experiences and successes should not be forgotten just because they need to be repeated.

The destruction of 20-30 years of work and progress is still devastating. Starting over from scratch takes time, patience and energy, which right now seems impossible to those still exhausted from Katrina. Still, in the following years, it will happen. Vietnamese-Americans have already proven it's possible.

Accidents, Infections New Worry, Clinics Say (USAT)

By Anita Manning

USA Today, September 16, 2005

CHALMETTE, La. — Hurricane Katrina hasn't brought widespread epidemics to the region, officials with the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention say. "What we've seen is what we would expect," says Ali Khan, who is directing the CDC's operation in the New Orleans area.

The complaints include accidental injuries and skin or respiratory infections. "Infectious disease outbreaks are not common following hurricanes," Khan says, and so far, there have been none.

Nevertheless, "The challenge is a lot bigger than in other disasters," Khan says. "We don't have a lot of experience evacuating a large city with this kind of infrastructure damage."

Previous hurricanes, however, taught health officials the value of tetanus vaccination and careful hygiene in shelters.

Immediately after Katrina, only three of the 16 hospitals in the New Orleans metropolitan area remained open. With transportation and communications wiped out, medical workers did what they could. Emergency "clinics started to pop up in elementary schools, halls, other stable locations," CDC epidemiologist Ryan Novak says.

This week, a team from the CDC in Atlanta visited a clinic here in St. Bernard Parish, which Hurricane Katrina hit hard. The clinic is one of 17 such emergency clinics and five hospitals the agency is working with to track trends.

Emergency medical specialist Ken Iserson and a Disaster Medical Assistance Team from Arizona arrived a week after the levees broke. The team of about 30 brought reinforcements to a group of local doctors who had set up a makeshift clinic in a building owned by ExxonMobil. The disaster shut down the company's refinery.

Now, in the midst of the ruined community here, they are serving 20-30 patients a day offering emergency care, immunizations and a pharmacy.

Patients who need more specialized care are airlifted out.

Doctors also care for members of the National Guard, rescue workers, police and firefighters, contractors and ExxonMobil employees.

More than 1,000 shots for hepatitis A, hepatitis B and tetanus have been administered, says Iserson, who is professor of emergency medicine at the University of Arizona Health Sciences Center in Tucson. Patients also come in for medicines for chronic diseases, such as high blood pressure or diabetes.

"We're starting to see our first wound infections," Iserson told the CDC team of Novak, Micah Milton and Dawn Tuckey.

One surprise for CDC workers, Khan says, is how quickly the city is recovering. Officials expected it would be three to six months before businesses and residents returned, but that process is starting in some areas this weekend.

Among the health concerns returnees may face are molds, which can be harmful to people with weak immune systems or lung problems, and tap water that is contaminated and shouldn't be used for drinking, cooking or bathing. Other risks include gas leaks, live electrical wires and carbon monoxide poisoning caused by improper generator use.

Just over a quarter of those who have been treated in hospitals and clinics have suffered injuries, says Carol Rubin, co-leader of the CDC response.

"For the most part, (the injuries were sustained by emergency) responders, and they're trained," she says.

When residents start to return to their homes, "we'll definitely see more injuries, with people using chain saws, falling off ladders, getting up on roofs," Rubin says.

Hope Turns To Anguish At Intensive-care Unit For Some Severely Ill, There Was No Escape (USAT)

By Robert Davis

USA Today, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006130

The intensive-care unit at Lindy Boggs Medical Center in New Orleans was devastated. Just 48 hours after Hurricane Katrina struck, the hospital's generators had failed. There was no blood for transfusions and very little medication besides morphine.

One floor below the ICU, a plea had been written on a piece of cardboard: “Patients dying; please be respectful.”

Today, the 187-bed hospital is empty; 19 bodies have been removed. But the story of the struggle to stay alive there in the dark days after the hurricane underscores the chaos, anger and desperation that overwhelmed the city.

“You think of a hospital as a place that gives treatment. But it had become kind of a medieval nursing facility. We were just providing comfort to the dying. That's what we were doing,” says anesthesiologist James Riopelle, the last of the living to leave. “There was no good solution. There were only bad choices.”

What happened on Wednesday, Aug. 31, in the hospital's intensive-care unit — recounted to USA TODAY by the relatives of two transplant patients and two of the last doctors to leave — reveals the horrifying choices and conflicting realities faced by those who stayed, or were left, behind.

For the two critically ill transplant patients and their families, hope quickly turned to horror when they learned that the rescue boats would be evacuating others instead. Ultimately, the two patients did get out after other patients had been evacuated by firefighters. They made it out thanks to two family members who refused to leave them and to a doctor who returned to ferry them out himself with a stolen boat.

Inside Lindy Boggs that day, doctors began to prepare patients for evacuation, placing cards on each one with one of three letters: “A” meant they could walk out on their own; “B” meant they had medical problems that needed attention; and “C” was condition critical.

Those who got C's — the most desperate for care — were told they would be sent out first.

That all changed, the doctors and family members say, when firefighters from Shreveport, La., arrived and gave hospital staff members new rules for the rescue. The healthiest of the hospital's 120 patients would be evacuated first, the firefighters declared. The most ill or infirm — the C's — would have to remain. For how much longer, no one knew.

“Firefighters are used to trying to save everybody,” Shreveport Fire Chief Kelvin Cochran says. “In this case, they were directed to save only those who had a chance of living. In some cases, that meant people who were breathing and had a pulse were left behind because in the assessment of their doctor, they wouldn't make it.

“That was what made it very difficult for the firefighters emotionally.”

Thiagarajan Ramcharan, a transplant surgeon, knew that two of his patients, Laticia Young, 28, and Carl LaSalle, 32, had suddenly been moved from the top to the bottom of the evacuation list.

Both were critically ill. LaSalle was recovering from a liver and kidney transplant. Young, who had suffered from an autoimmune disease since she was 12, was considered too sick at that moment to survive a transplant operation, but doctors were trying to stabilize her so she could get a new liver.

“I had to tell them what the situation” was after the evacuation orders changed. “It was the worst thing,” says Ramcharan, 35. “Both of these patients were awake. I can't imagine how I told them. I felt bad, and I didn't have an option.”

Young's mother, Elaine Bias, and LaSalle's wife, Jessie, refused to leave the patients' rooms. “I said, ‘This is wrong,' ” Bias says. She had brought her daughter to the hospital and had no intention of leaving her there to die. But Ramcharan told her, “This is out of my hands. There's nothing I can do.”

“I was going crazy because I felt that was wrong,” says Jessie LaSalle. Looking back, she says, her husband wasn't being treated like he was human.

Bias and LaSalle were connected by fate before Katrina hit. Both were in the intensive-care unit playing the role of patient advocate for their daughter and husband, respectively. Both patients were under the care of the transplant team.

As the storm battered the city on Aug. 29, emergency plans kicked in at area hospitals. Generators powered breathing machines, and plans called for the sickest of the sick to be evacuated first.

Downstairs from the Lindy Boggs ICU, in the hospital's hospice ward, patients with cancer and other terminal diseases were already dying, most of them from heat and dehydration, according to Ramcharan. “Those patients did not have a chance for life at all,” he says. He believes the hospice patients account for the bulk of the deaths at Lindy Boggs.

The hospice patients probably died by Tuesday, Aug. 30, Ramcharan says, within 24 hours after the storm knocked out power and sent temperatures in the hospital rising to nearly 100 degrees.

“They never knew what happened, and they would not have known what was going on,” he says. “They didn't suffer.”

But when the flood walls broke and the waters continued to rise Tuesday, the staff grew alarmed. Rescue crews were busy across the city plucking people in danger of drowning from trees and rooftops. There was no way for hospital staff to call for help, and no help came.

“I don't know if people were aware that there were so many people inside (the hospital),” Ramcharan says. “Every time we stepped out, the water was rising.”

Inside Lindy Boggs, the hospital began to slowly shut down as power, water and replenishments of medical supplies were cut off. “It became a trap,” Riopelle says.

The pharmacy was locked, Ramcharan says, as part of standard evacuation procedure. So the only medication available to the doctors was a stash of morphine that Riopelle says was left available so that pets — about 45 dogs, 15 cats and a pair of guinea pigs brought by staff and patients to ride out the storm — could be euthanized if that became necessary.

Riopelle, 56, chose to care for the pets instead of putting them down, and most of them were rescued alive days later.

But by Wednesday morning, with generators failing and patients facing their third day without medication, blood or basics such as clean sheets, one of the elderly patients in the ICU died.

For Bias and LaSalle, it seemed as if death was creeping toward them. “I saw them body-bagging people,” LaSalle says.

There was one “old patient and I don't know what the problem was,” Ramcharan says. “The morgue in the basement was flooded, so we could not take the patient away. He was there for a while.”

When firefighters in boats arrived at the hospital Wednesday afternoon, the plan was to move some of the patients to a dry spot where helicopters could land. But the Shreveport firefighters said those who were likely to die anyway had to stay behind.

Worse, “they said there was a good chance they would not show up tomorrow depending on orders from higher up,” Ramcharan says.

Doctors and hospital staffers huddled and decided that several of the patients in the ICU, among them Young and LaSalle, would be left behind. LaSalle and another patient were on ventilators to help them breathe. The firefighters said they could not take anyone who could not breathe on their own. Young was bleeding internally.

At one point, Riopelle says, he offered Bias morphine for her daughter in case she was in pain. Bias refused the offer. She and LaSalle say they worried that the morphine might have killed their loved ones.

Riopelle and Ramcharan say the dosage was small and would have caused no harm. But both understand why the women might have feared otherwise. Having already been passed over and with no rescue in sight, the families believed they had been left there to die.

By Wednesday night, with the hospital largely emptied and the air heavy with what LaSalle describes as an “odor of death,” the two women clung to the hospital beds in fear.

“I didn't want to leave him because I knew something bad was going to happen,” LaSalle says of her husband. “I was scared, but I knew the Lord was with us. I kept praying and finally he answered our prayers.”

On Thursday, Sept. 1, Ramcharan and other hospital staffers “borrowed” a boat, siphoned some gasoline from abandoned cars and returned to the ICU to get the patients.

When Ramcharan walked into the intensive-care unit about 11 a.m., LaSalle says, “he told us it was time to go.” The two transplant patients were carried downstairs — with LaSalle, 24, ventilating her husband by squeezing air into his lungs with a plastic bag — and placed into the boat.

Bias realized she had left her Bible upstairs. She asked the rescuers to wait and ran back up to the ICU. As she passed the room where the remaining patient lay, the woman reached out for her.

"It broke my heart," she says. "If my daughter had been strong enough to walk, I could have carried that old woman out. But I just couldn't. I hated to leave her."

Ramcharan and the other staffers delivered the patients and their relatives to a dry piece of ground near the local post office that was being used as a helipad.

The doctor took his sick patients to the front of the line. "In the end, he stood by us and got us out of there," LaSalle says.

The patients landed in Dallas at Baylor University Medical Center, where Carl LaSalle Jr. is now awake and breathing on his own. His condition is improving. Jessie LaSalle says her husband still thinks he's in Louisiana. She blames his disorientation on the trauma of being left to die. They have a daughter, Alicia, who turned 5 on Sept. 6.

Laticia Young is still struggling to survive. Her mother fears she won't live for long without a new liver. Her three children, ages 9, 7 and 6, are staying with other relatives.

The doctors say Elaine Bias and Jessie LaSalle saved the lives of their loved ones by refusing to abandon them.

"I hate to use the word 'abandon,' but that is what it was," Ramcharan says, still shaken. He says he has had trouble sleeping since he got out of Lindy Boggs.

"That was the worst night they ever had, and it was the worst night I had ever faced, too. I was absolutely stunned. Like Laticia's mom and the LaSalles, just like them, I was completely stunned."

Katrina's Impact On The Economy Comes Into View (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Hurricane Katrina's broader impact on the economy is becoming more apparent.

Thousands of individuals displaced by the storm have already filed for unemployment benefits and thousands more are expected, according to a Labor Department report. Meanwhile, gauges of manufacturing activity far from the Gulf of Mexico showed softening early this month, and economists and executives expressed concerns about rising energy costs.

Largely because of gasoline-price increases before Katrina, the Labor Department's latest consumer-price index rose 0.5% in August, pushing it up 3.6% from a year ago, the largest increase in four years. More than 90% of the prices used to compile the report were gathered before the storm struck, meaning steeper increases are likely to come.

Outside of energy, however, prices were up modestly; 0.1% for the month and 2.2% from a year earlier. Excluding both food and energy, the so-called "core" rate of inflation was up a modest 0.1% in August from the month before. Medical-care prices were unchanged, the first time they hadn't risen in nearly 30 years, largely because of a puzzling drop in the price of hospital services.

Taken together, the reports underscored the economy's turbulence since the storm hit at the end of last month. Energy-price increases hadn't been feeding broader inflation before the storm, though pressures seemed to be mounting.

That leaves officials at the Federal Reserve in a challenging spot heading into their meeting next week. They can raise the short-term federal-funds rate, the rate charged on overnight bank loans, for the 11th time in 15 months when they meet on Tuesday to forestall incipient inflation. Or they can pause to further assess the damage left by the storm.

First-time jobless claims rose 71,000 to 398,000, after seasonal adjustments, in the week ended Sept. 10, the Labor Department said. It was the highest level in two years. The department estimated Katrina accounted for 68,000 claims -- and that number is likely to be an underestimate, a department statistician said.

"We know there have been much more claims filed at the state level," he said. The filings were hard to count because of the "unprecedented" volume and "unconventional methods" used by the states to collect layoff claims, he said.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York said their indexes of manufacturing activity in the Northeast softened in early September, though they still showed the sector was expanding.

The Philadelphia's Fed index dropped to 2.2 in September from 17.5 in August. In September, 24.4% of the manufacturing executives surveyed in the region said business activity was increasing while 22.2% said it was contracting; the difference of 2.2 percentage points is the basis of the index. The New York Fed's index of manufacturing activity dropped to 17 in September from

23 in August. Projections of activity six months hence also declined, a possible sign of declining confidence, while estimates of the prices paid for materials surged.

In the Philly Fed survey, 86% of those surveyed said energy prices were having a negative effect on orders and production. Just 6% described the effect as "significantly negative." Meanwhile, economists surveyed by the National Association for Business Economics listed soaring energy prices as the nation's top short-run economic problem.

Storm Might Be a Factor as Fed Ponders a Rate Rise (NYT)

By EDMUND L. ANDREWS

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - At least so far, Hurricane Katrina does not appear to have blown the Federal Reserve off course.

As policy makers gear up to decide on interest rates on Tuesday, they are confronting a big short-term shock to the economy but most of the same long-term economic trends that existed before the hurricane.

The economic data for the period before the storm suggested that consumer spending held up despite rising gas prices, that companies were still hiring and that inflation pressures remained a cause for worry.

Many economists expect that trend to resume after a predictable drop in growth as a result of hurricane-related disruptions. On top of that, the Bush administration and Congress are about to rev up the economy with a staggering amount of federal money for relief and reconstruction.

Many lawmakers are now predicting that the federal cost of Katrina could hit $200 billion - more than 10 times the amount for any other natural disaster. None of that spending, or the tax cuts being rushed through Congress, is likely to be offset by reduced spending in other areas.

It remains possible that the Federal Reserve will refrain from raising short-term interest rates next Tuesday, which would be the first time in 11 meetings that it held rates steady. The best reason to do that would be to wait for more evidence of the impact from the hurricane and the spike in gasoline prices in the last two weeks.

But that would be little more than a pause. Fed officials are likely to repeat past declarations that their policy is "accommodative," meaning that interest rates are still below normal and need to go higher, and they are likely to repeat their desire to raise rates at a "measured" pace.

"The main point is that when they sit down, they will conclude that what we want to do is to continue to remove the accommodative policy," said Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America.

Several pieces of new data on Thursday offered the Fed reasons to tread carefully.

Two surveys of manufacturers, by the Federal Reserve banks of Philadelphia and of New York, showed a big drop in new orders and expectations for the months ahead.

The surveys suggested that higher energy prices had begun to reduce expectations.

Asked by the Philadelphia Fed about the impact of energy prices, 58.1 percent of companies said they had had a slightly negative effect and 22.6 percent said they had had a moderately negative effect.

"The manufacturing executives who responded to the survey were significantly less optimistic about future growth this month," said Michael Trebing, a senior analyst at the Philadelphia Fed.

But Mr. Trebing cautioned that the surveys provided limited guidance, noting that the Philadelphia barometer plunged in June and bounced back in July and August.

In a separate report, the Labor Department reported Thursday that the underlying rate of inflation was surprisingly mild in August. Consumer prices jumped 0.5 percent, mostly because of gasoline prices.

The core rate of inflation, excluding food and energy, was only 0.1 percent in August, and those prices were up only 2.1 percent for the year.

Fed officials tend to view jumps in energy prices as one-time events rather than a source of permanent inflation, and a low rate of core inflation is normally a cause for relief.

But many economists predicted on Thursday that high energy prices would lead to higher prices generally, and that core inflation was likely to be much higher in September.

Fed officials were already worried about other sources of inflation, like rising wages and slowing productivity growth, and several policy makers have expressed concern that high energy prices could lead to expectations of higher long-term inflation.

"Rising oil prices, like other unfavorable price shocks, can also feed through and raise underlying core inflation," Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, warned on Sept. 7. "So there is also a risk on the inflation front, and the risk is higher now than it was a year ago."

Ben S. Bernanke, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers and a former Fed governor, predicted on Thursday that Hurricane Katrina would lead to only a temporary slowdown in economic growth and employment.

"Katrina's effects may reduce growth in the short run, but the longer-term growth trajectory remains in place," Mr. Bernanke said in a speech to the National Press Club.

The problem for Fed officials is that the data so far provide no conclusive evidence about the full economic impact of Katrina and the energy price shock.

If the impact on growth is small, a decision to keep interest rates low could aggravate inflation. If high energy prices pinch spending and shatter confidence, higher interest rates could add to the problem.

But as one analyst pointed out, there is nothing the Federal Reserve can do to speed the repair of oil refineries along the Gulf of Mexico or to accelerate job creation for people evacuated from New Orleans.

Gov't Credit Cards For Katrina Draw Fire (AP)

By HOPE YEN, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers and watchdog groups worry that allowing federal employees to charge up to $250,000 on their government-issued credit cards for Hurricane Katrina-related expenses will lead to a repeat of past abuses.

Some of the cards in the past were used to pay for prostitutes, gambling activity, even breast implants, government audits have shown.

"People are concerned this is a risk," said Greg Kutz, managing director of special investigations at the General Accountability Office, which conducts audits at the request of Congress.

About 250,000 federal employees have government credit cards, which typically have a purchase limit of $2,500. At the request of the Bush administration, Congress increased the credit line to $250,000 as part of a massive Katrina recovery bill approved last week. The aim is to make it easier to speed aid to victims.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said the "outrageous increase" was "slipped" into the bill. He is seeking to insert language in a Katrina health bill that would reduce the limit in most cases to $50,000.

Responding to initial criticism, the White House issued new guidelines this week saying agencies must designate in writing which of their staff will receive the new spending privileges. Purchases of more than $50,000 must be preapproved by a senior manager.

"Substantial financial controls already exist but we are currently looking at what additional protections might be useful. If in working with Congress, agencies, and state and local leaders it is determined that additional safeguards are required, then we'll put them in place," Alex Conant, spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, said Wednesday.

Critics say the additional oversight is needed because the cards offer special opportunities for abuse.

Purchases are billed directly to the government, making it difficult to recover losses from wayward federal employees intent on fraud because of the time lag from the purchase date to subsequent billing.

Cronyism also is a danger, as officials have more leeway under the higher limit to purchase more expensive supplies from politically connected companies without the benefit of open bidding and competition. Even if they're detected, time-strapped agency directors often don't pursue disciplinary action, according to audit reports.

In recent years, several GAO audits found hundreds of thousands of dollars of improper expenditures at the Pentagon and other agencies, from purchases of remote control helicopters and airline tickets to Palm Pilots and $2,500 flat-panel computer monitors. Someone even bought a dog.

Navy personnel also in 2002 used separate government travel cards to hire prostitutes at brothels, gamble and attend New York Yankees and Los Angeles Lakers games. One civil employee ran up nearly $35,000 in personal expenses over two years, including breast enlargement surgery for his girlfriend.

The GAO has noted improvements in agency oversight since then, including reducing the number of government cards from more than 500,000 to 250,000 to limit the potential for fraud from lower-level government employees. The Pentagon also has said it installed software to help track when potentially suspect purchases are made.

But as recently as last year, the GAO cited continuing oversight problems at the Veterans Health Administration and said it had no way of knowing - without conducting specific audits - whether improvements at other agencies are actually in effect and working.

The concerns prompted Grassley, as well as Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, the top Democrat on that committee, last week to urge congressional leaders to officially lower the cap to $50,000 to ensure full compliance.

Collins has also signaled separately she might consider creating a special inspector general to monitor spending and no-bid contracts.

"Imagine the fraud we could see," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the watchdog group Project on Government Oversight, noting that recent abuses involved cards with much smaller purchase limits of $2,500.

"For bigger purchases involved in the rebuilding effort, that should involve competition and serious planning. Instead we have far too many people with far too much access to money without any organization or effective oversight," she said.

Civil Rights Group Urges Freeze On Mortgage Foreclosures For Hurricane Victims (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - WASHINGTON-As Hurricane Katrina brought into focus the financial plight of many blacks along the Gulf Coast, a leading U.S. civil rights group urged lenders to freeze mortgage foreclosures and suspend late fees on loans for people affected by the hurricane.

"There are a few steps that can and should be taken by all financial institutions to ensure that the people of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and the other areas affected by Katrina are not further victimized and do not suffer further losses," Hilary Shelton of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said Wednesday.

Speaking to members of a House Financial Services subcommittee, the director of the NAACP's Washington bureau Shelton, said the civil rights group also was concerned about predatory lenders who "must be circling some of the worst-hit areas, salivating at the potential for abuse" of Katrina's victims.

Alabama Congressman Spencer Bachus, the panel's chairman, said federal banking regulators need to help banks in the disaster zones by relaxing some rules.

The storm's devastating impacts on the poorest communities in the Gulf Coast starkly illustrated the differences in how minorities and whites are treated by banks.

Many poor people lost their cash savings, much of it stashed under mattresses and in teapots. Around the country, many low-income minorities shun banks, have never used an ATM machine or applied for a home mortgage. Often, they turn to storefront payday lenders, which charge high interest.

At all income levels, blacks are far more likely to be given high-cost, "subprime" mortgages than whites, according to a Federal Reserve analysis of home lending data.

Most banks and mortgage lenders in the affected areas are letting customers postpone payments on consumer, commercial and mortgage loans.

In a related development, two key Republican lawmakers announced they had drafted a legislative change that would require some of the profits of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to go to financing housing for low-income people in areas hit by Katrina as well as in those where survivors now live. The proposal by Congressmen Michael Oxley of Ohio, and Richard Baker of Louisiana, was being included in legislation before the House to tighten government oversight of the two companies, which together finance more than three-quarters of the home mortgages in the country.

Studies in recent years have shown that a much larger share of black and Hispanic homeowners pays higher interest on their mortgages than do whites in similar circumstances.

The studies have found that disproportionate numbers of blacks and Hispanics have subprime mortgages, which are high-interest loans to homeowners deemed riskier because of tarnished credit histories or other factors. Such home loans are said to be concentrated in minority communities at far higher levels than in white neighborhoods.

The Fed report released Tuesday reviewed home lending data for 2004. It found that percent of blacks and 20 percent of Hispanics got high-interest loans, compared with 9 percent of non-Hispanic whites.

The data did not necessarily indicate widespread discrimination against minorities, the Fed analysts said. The study did not take into account borrowers' credit ratings. Still, even after adjusting for differences in income and location of homes, it found that blacks are nearly twice as likely as whites to get more expensive mortgages.

Bankers from Louisiana and Mississippi who testified at Wednesday's House hearing laid out a list of requests for action by Congress. It included a fund that would allow the government to buy loans of borrowers affected by Katrina who are unable to make payments on them.

A few banks may need direct government aid in addition to remain in business, C.R. "Rusty" Cloutier, president and chief executive officer of MidSouth Bank of Lafayette, Louisiana, told the subcommittee.

"Community banks will be essential to the survival of communities in the affected areas," Cloutier said. "Small businesses will only be able to rebuild if community banks are healthy and able to respond to their needs."

Officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. have said there could be problems for banks in the region whose customers are unable to repay loans, but the effect would be mitigated when disaster relief kicks in. The banks in the area generally were in a strong financial condition before Katrina hit, regulators and bankers say.

La. Frees Prisoners To Ease Crowding (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 16, 2005

BATON ROUGE — Kevin Dunkley and Ernest McFadden waited to board a Greyhound bus to Dallas and start a new life.

The two men are among about 1,000 inmates released in the past week by the Louisiana corrections department to ease crowding caused when two large prisons flooded.

All the released inmates had been in a 90-day prison program — suspended last week — for parole- and probation-violators who get extensive counseling while incarcerated. None has a record of violent or sexual crimes, said Cecil Goudeau, program manager for the Louisiana division of probation and parole.

“These were minimum-security people,” Goudeau said. The released inmates will remain on probation or parole and be tested for drug use.

“They were just released to the streets a little earlier,” Goudeau said.

Dunkley, 26, and McFadden, 20, are cousins who have spent their lives in New Orleans. Their nearest relative is in Dallas.

The two men were released Monday from the state prison in Angola, where they had been taken after Hurricane Katrina flooded the prison in New Orleans.

About 8,200 inmates from New Orleans and nearby Jefferson Parish were moved to other state and local prisons.

McFadden and Dunkley said they began the 90-day prison program after they failed drug tests — a violation of their parole for drug dealing.

The two men rode a bus Monday to Baton Rouge with a dozen other released inmates, Dunkley said. They have form letters explaining their release “due to exigent circumstances created by Hurricane Katrina” and a $10 check from the state.

After they spent Monday night at a Red Cross shelter, a priest bought them bus tickets. The parole office gave them approval to leave the state. If they want to stay beyond 30 days, the Texas parole office will have to agree to supervise them, Goudeau said.

Dunkley never wants to see New Orleans again: "I want to try to do something different."

White House Backs NASA Plan For Vehicles (New York Times)

By William J. Broad

New York Times, September 16, 2005

The White House has approved NASA's plan to replace the nation's aging fleet of winged spaceships with a new generation of vehicles meant to carry human explorers back to the Moon and onward to Mars and beyond, aerospace experts said yesterday.

The new rockets and spaceships are a radical departure for the space program, rearranging the components of the space shuttle into a new design expected to be more powerful that the shuttle but also safer. The shuttle has had two fatal accidents in 114 missions.

"It's a thumbs-up for NASA to pursue the shuttle-derived vehicle," said John M. Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University and an adviser to the NASA initiative. "The question is the schedule, not the basic approach."

Other experts, who refused to be identified because the space agency will not formally announce the proposal formally, also spoke about the plan yesterday.

The redesign proposal was first reported in August by agency officials and private experts. Unlike the shuttle, the new vehicles would separate the jobs of hauling people and cargo into orbit and would put the payloads atop the rockets - as far as possible from the dangers of firing engines and falling debris, which were responsible for the accidents that destroyed the Challenger in 1986 and the Columbia in 2003.

But by making the rockets from shuttle parts, the new plan would draw on the shuttle's existing network of thousands of contractors and technologies, in theory speeding its completion and lowering its cost.

The plan has been ready for unveiling for roughly six weeks but was held up because of delays in White House approval.

Yesterday, the aerospace experts said Michael D. Griffin, NASA's administrator, met with White House officials on Wednesday and won a preliminary approval for the project despite continuing questions about how to pay for it.

One problem is that the existing shuttle is still consuming a large share of the agency's budget. A complicating factor, they added, is growing fiscal pressure on Washington because of the government's unexpected need to help rebuild New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

The Bush administration has called for the shuttles to be retired by 2010. Dr. Griffin had wanted the first of the replacement vehicles to be ready to fly by 2011. But the experts said yesterday that the earliest conceivable date for the first flight of the replacement was now 2012.

The smaller rocket, for carrying people, would still dwarf the shuttle, which stands 184 feet high. The larger one, for lifting heavy cargoes and spaceships but not people, would rise to a height of some 350 feet, rivaling the Saturn 5 rockets that sent astronauts to the Moon.

In theory, the cargo hauler would have its first test flights in 2016 and 2017 and first hurl people toward the Moon in 2018, the experts said.

Social Security Legislation Could Be Shelved (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds will recommend to the House Republican leadership that the party drop its effort to restructure Social Security, at least for this year, House Republican aides confirmed yesterday.

Reynolds's move, first reported yesterday on the Web site of the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call, is fresh evidence that Hurricane Katrina is having a dramatic impact on the GOP's agenda. House and Senate leaders had already pushed off consideration of cuts in taxes and entitlement spending until the end of October. President Bush's tax reform panel has delayed release of its recommendations.

Now, Social Security legislation, which already faced a steep uphill climb, might be shelved indefinitely. Senate Republican leaders had decided they could not move on Social Security until the House did. But with the Senate at a stalemate, House political strategists want to pull back as well.

"With everything else that Congress has to deal with, from Katrina to immigration to . . . who knows, there's just so much on the plate, never mind that the Senate is bogged down in [Supreme Court] confirmation hearings," said a House GOP strategist, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the full House leadership has yet to render a final decision. "Why would you want to make vulnerable members take a vote on something that's not going anywhere? You could make the case that it would be suicide."

Reynolds (R-N.Y.) made his stand in a showdown with House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), according to two witnesses. At a committee luncheon Wednesday, Thomas told panel members he was pushing forward with broad retirement security legislation that would include measures to strengthen private pensions, promote personal savings and add private investment accounts to Social Security.

Reynolds then stood to say he would recommend to the leadership that it do no such thing.

Thomas would not comment on the events. "I don't talk about closed-door meetings or what went on in closed-door meetings, and if someone who was in a closed-door meeting did, they're doing a great disservice to their colleagues," he said.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said he could not confirm the events either. Until Reynolds makes his agenda recommendations to the full GOP leadership, Forti said he would not discuss Reynolds's views on Social Security.

But he did not deny the report.

"It's more than just Katrina," said a different House Republican aide, pointing to sky-high gasoline prices, anger over the war in Iraq and President Bush's sagging approval ratings.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee pointed out other factors: Republican lawmakers' own low approval ratings and continuing struggles with ethics questions.

David John, a proponent of Social Security private accounts at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said Reynolds's views are well known but hardly the last word. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the previous NRCC chairman, was also a vocal opponent of Social Security legislation, arguing that it could be politically disastrous.

"This is pretty much business as usual at the NRCC," he said.

Health Premiums Rise 6.6% (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

Health insurance premiums for federal employees and retirees will rise an average of 6.6 percent next year, the lowest increase in nine years, the Bush administration said yesterday.

Still, an official with one federal employee union branded the increase "outrageous," noting that average employee contributions to their health premiums will rise faster than the portion paid by the government.

Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, which oversees the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, said the government has consistently provided workers more health care options while doing its best to hold down costs.

"[W]e are maintaining a high-quality health-care program that provides excellent benefits at a reasonable cost," Springer said in a statement.

Next year's increase will be the government's smallest since 1997, when average premiums rose 2.4 percent. Independent studies predict a 10 percent increase in health insurance premiums for private sector employees next year, OPM officials said. Federal employees will have 279 health care plans to choose from, up from 249 this year.

An employee with the standard family coverage under Blue Cross and Blue Shield -- the most popular plan, covering more than half of all participants -- will pay $17.53 more in premiums every two weeks, bringing the biweekly cost to $135.59. Standard coverage for an individual will rise by $7.36, to $58.07 biweekly.

Across all plans, a federal worker with family coverage will pay an average of $12.79 more in premiums every two weeks, for a total biweekly cost of $130.17. At the same time, the government will contribute $16.83 more toward that worker's health coverage, for a total biweekly cost of $306.82. The worker's portion of the premium will rise 10.9 percent, compared with a 5.8 percent boost in the government's portion -- the disparity that rankles the union.

"Federal workers are once again being short-changed," said Enid Doggett, a spokeswoman for the American Federation of Government Employees.

Similarly, for an individual, the average will rise $5.30 every two weeks, for a total biweekly payment of $57.66. The government's contribution for that individual's coverage will rise $7.71 every two weeks, for a total biweekly payment of $134.98. That is a 10.1 percent increase in what the individual pays, and a 6.1 percent increase in what the government pays.

The program provides health insurance coverage to about 8 million government workers, retirees and their family members worldwide, including many in the District, Maryland and Virginia.

Staff writers Stephen Barr and Eric Yoder contributed to this report.

Nationwide Survey Includes Data on Teenage Sex Habits (NYT)

By TAMAR LEWIN

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

The National Center for Health Statistics released the government's most comprehensive survey of American sexual practices and reproductive health yesterday, delving for the first time into such sensitive areas as the prevalence of oral sex among teenagers and same-sex activity among adults.

Oral sex among teenagers has in recent years become a topic of rampant speculation and little solid data, apart from a 1995 Urban Institute study of adolescent boys. The new statistics confirm that study's findings that oral sex is very much part of the teenage sexual repertory. According to the survey, more than half of all teenagers aged 15 to 19 have engaged in oral sex - including nearly a quarter of those who have never had intercourse.

Among the findings in the new study, "Sexual Behavior and Selected Health Measures," were the following:

¶Men age 30 to 44 have had a median of six to eight sexual partners in their lifetimes; women's median was about four.

¶Among both men and women age 15 to 44, about two-thirds have had only one sexual partner in the last year. Ten percent of the men and 7 percent of the women have had three or more partners in that time.

¶About 4 percent of men and women described themselves as homosexual or bisexual, but in a finding that surprised the researchers, 14 percent of the women aged 18 to 29 reported at least one homosexual experience, more than twice the proportion for young men.

The report offers new information about homosexuality in the United States. Among adults ages 15 to 44, almost 3 percent of men and 4 percent of women reported having a sexual experience with a member of the same sex within the past year, and over their lifetimes, 6 percent of men and 11 percent of women had such experiences. About 1 percent of men and 3 percent of women had had both male and female sexual partners in the previous 12 months.

Nearly 6 percent of all men ages 15 to 44 reported having oral sex with another man at some time in their lives, and nearly 4 percent reported having anal sex with another man.

The data comes from the 2002 National Survey of Family Growth, a survey of 12,571 men and women ages 15 to 44. The survey contractor was the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research, which trained more than 200 women to collect the data by having the subject answer sensitive questions on a computer, without revealing the answers to the interviewer.

Although the National Center for Health Statistics has periodically conducted that survey among women for 32 years, the 2002 version was the first to include both sexes, and to move beyond fertility and child-bearing into broader questions of sexual behavior and sexual orientation.

The new findings on teenagers and oral sex have been of special interest to health experts.

"After years of provocative headlines and breathless stories based mostly on anecdote, we finally have some solid data," said Sarah Brown, director of the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy. "The news is probably not as bad as adults might have been led to believe, but it is likely not as good as most parents might wish."

The proportion of teenagers who have given or received oral sex was slightly higher than the proportion who have had intercourse, the survey found, with 55 percent of the boys and 54 percent of the girls having given or received oral sex, while 49 percent of the boys and 53 percent of the girls have had intercourse.

"One thing that surprised me is that we expected, based on anecdotal evidence, that girls might be more likely to give oral sex and boys more likely to receive it, but we didn't find that at all," said Dr. Jennifer Manlove, of Child Trends, which, like Ms. Brown's group, released an analysis of the data, "There's more gender equality than we expected."

The government data does not provide any indication of the age at which oral sex first occurred, how often it occurred, or how many partners a teen had had. But the survey found that nearly all teenagers who have had sexual intercourse have also had oral sex: 88 percent of the boys and 83 percent of the girls.

"A very significant proportion of teens has had experience with oral sex, even if they haven't had sexual intercourse and may think of themselves as virgins," Dr. Manlove said. "We're not sure whether these teens who have not had sexual intercourse are engaging in oral sex because they view it as a way to maintain their technical virginity or even because they regard it as an easy method of birth control."

While many of the findings in the government report parallel those of the last large-scale study of American sexual behavior, a 1992 study of 18- to 59-year-olds by the University of Chicago's National Opinion Research Center, the lead author of the new study said it found a new and unexpected increase in lesbian activity among young women. It may not be such a surprise among those of college age, who speak of LUG's - lesbians until graduation.

"There are signs of change among 15- to 29-year-old women, a group of women too young to have been be included in the 1992 study," said William Mosher, the lead author.

When asked, "Have you ever had any sexual experience of any kind with any female?" 14 percent of the 18- to 29-year-old women said yes, compared with slightly under 10 percent of the 30- to 44-year-olds. That difference was surprising, Dr. Mosher said, since on questions about lifetime experience, older people usually report more than younger ones.

The study also asked about sexual attraction. Among men 18 to 44, 90 percent said they thought of themselves as heterosexual, 2 percent as homosexual, 2 percent as bisexual and 4 percent as "something else," findings similar to those in 1992.

Among women, 86 percent said they were attracted to only men and 10 percent "mostly to males." In the 1992 survey, only 3 percent said they were "mostly" attracted to males.

Ophelia Inches Along The N.C. Coast Storm Pounds Outer Banks (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 16, 2005

ATLANTIC BEACH, N.C. — Hurricane Ophelia's soaking crawl through this state seemed unending on Thursday as it battered beach towns up and down the coast.

From Atlantic Beach north to Cape Hatteras and Nags Head, Ophelia whipped rain, wind and surf hour after hour. Even seasoned hurricane hands marveled at the storm's endurance.

A weakened Ophelia could smack Massachusetts' Cape Cod this weekend. Tropical storm watches have been issued there. And North Carolina will still feel its winds today.

DOJ_NMG_0006141

"I've been through five hurricanes, and this is the worst," said Linda Massengill, 42. "That was the longest night of my life. We're talking about high winds for 18 hours, and between 1 and 5 this morning, the whole house was shaking. I won't do this again. I'll leave."

Damage was significant because the storm stalled off the coast. Rather than a brief lashing, people withstood hours of a relentless 80-mph blast.

The storm gnawed siding from homes, pulled down power lines and peeled off the roofs and smashed signs of several businesses elsewhere in town. The surf hurled rocks the size of basketballs onto a parking lot. Traffic lights, blanked by power outages, dangled in the wind.

Ophelia spared some of the more populated tourist towns of the Outer Banks, such as Nags Head, from major damage. But the Cape Hatteras National Seashore took a pounding. Ophelia spun just off Cape Hatteras with sustained winds of 75 mph and barely moved at a speed of 3 mph.

Bad luck for Ginger Pharr and Kat Clewy. The two had come to Atlantic Beach to train for a triathlon. They spent the night with their dog, Bella, listening to Ophelia howl.

"It was such a slow mover, that made it seem a lot worse than it was," said Pharr, 48.

State Highway 12, the two-lane road that runs down the narrow spine of the Cape Hatteras Seashore, was mostly deserted late Thursday.

Squalls battered the island. Sand, blown from towering seaside dunes, covered the road like a fresh coat of gray and beige snow. In spots, it drifted several inches deep.

Not enough to deter Matt Krieger. He and Ellie, a golden retriever-Labrador mix, sloshed in the surf at Oregon Inlet. Baitfish banged their snouts on the side of a bucket at his feet.

Krieger, 43, of Virginia Beach, Va., monitored Ophelia's plodding pace and direction on The Weather Channel and decided that Thursday looked like a fine day for fishing.

"I've been through so many of these," he said. "The worst is definitely over."

Ophelia Brings N.C. Heavy Rains, Minimal Flooding (WP)

By Alan Cooperman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BUXTON, N.C., Sept. 15 -- After lashing the North Carolina coast for two days and testing the post-Katrina readiness of disaster agencies, Hurricane Ophelia appeared on Thursday to be weakening and heading back out to sea.

Although the Outer Banks islands of Ocracoke and Hatteras were still in danger of heavy winds and surging water, the hurricane's slow and meandering path spared most coastal areas of the severe flooding that had been predicted.

By evening, its winds were blowing about 75 mph, just enough to earn Ophelia classification as a hurricane. Authorities blamed one death on the storm, from a rain-slicked traffic accident inland near the state capital of Raleigh.

A hurricane warning for North Carolina's coast was scaled back to a tropical storm warning, which extended north to Cape Charles Light, Va., including the mouth of Chesapeake Bay. With the storm tracking to the north, a tropical storm watch was issued for southeastern Massachusetts, including Cape Cod, Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard.

But here on the Outer Banks, residents were breathing easier: Ophelia turned out to be more like a drunken sailor than a belligerent one, bumping and bruising the coast before staggering off in circles.

Watching its movement on weather radar was like "watching someone make a funnel cake, just dripping the batter all around," said Tony Spencer, emergency management director for North Carolina's coastal Hyde County.

Determined to avoid a repeat of the response to Hurricane Katrina, federal, state and local authorities had gone into high gear early in the week.

They positioned five swift-water rescue teams, each made up of 50 National Guardsmen, a few miles inland along the state's entire coast. They ordered evacuations in dozens of low-lying areas, bringing 2,000 people into 45 shelters at schools and community centers Wednesday night, according to Bill Furney, spokesman for the state Division of Emergency Management.

DOJ_NMG_0006142

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, still under fire for its response to Katrina, stationed 250 workers along the coast and put Coast Guard Rear Adm. Brian Peterman in charge of the federal response to the hurricane.

But as Ophelia stayed off the coast and slowly moved north, parallel to the barrier islands, coastal communities began cleaning up fallen debris and counting their blessings.

"All of our roads are passable. All our shelters are closed, and people have gone home," said Rose Faucette, an emergency worker in Beaufort County, which has been pummeled by past hurricanes, including Isabel in 2003. "We were very lucky."

State officials said Ophelia knocked out electricity to 240,000 customers on Wednesday. By Thursday morning, the number without power was down to 80,000, and utility crews were quickly restoring telephone and electrical lines.

The biggest remaining concern was an expected surge of water Thursday night from the Pamlico Sound across the southern Outer Banks, which officials feared could flood beach houses and cut off roads. "That's when you'll see most of the flooding," Gov. Mike Easley (D) said at a morning briefing.

Earlier, the hurricane's sustained winds had blown the water toward the mainland, exposing as much as a mile of sand on the bay side of Hatteras Island.

Despite a mandatory evacuation on Hatteras and Ocracoke, hundreds of local residents remained in their homes. Here in Buxton, a small town on Hatteras, Keith Gray, 40, put on an orange anorak and went scavenging with his son, Aaron, 16, for valuables in the exposed sand.

The wind blew out a side window of their pickup truck, but they pulled a claw hammer and some other tools from the empty basin of the Buxton Harbor Marina, where half a dozen boats were sitting on their exposed keels. They had to shout to be heard in the 60-mph wind.

"Is that a jet?" Aaron asked, looking up as a powerful gust swirled sand against his bare legs.

"Just the wind," his father said.

Severe Hurricanes Increasing, Study Finds (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

A new study concludes that rising sea temperatures have been accompanied by a significant global increase in the most destructive hurricanes, adding fuel to an international debate over whether global warming contributed to the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

The study, published today in the journal Science, is the second in six weeks to draw this conclusion, but other climatologists dispute the findings and argue that a recent spate of severe storms reflects nothing more than normal weather variability.

Katrina's destructiveness has given a sharp new edge to the ongoing debate over whether the United States should do more to curb greenhouse gas emissions linked to global warming. Domestic and European critics have pointed to Katrina as a reason to take action, while skeptics say climate activists are capitalizing on a national disaster to further their own agenda.

According to data gathered by researchers at the School of Earth and Atmospheric Sciences at Georgia Tech and the National Center for Atmospheric Research, the number of major Category 4 and 5 hurricanes worldwide has nearly doubled over the past 35 years, even though the total number of hurricanes, including weaker ones, has dropped since the 1990s. Katrina was a Category 4 storm when it made landfall.

Using satellite data, the four researchers found that the average number of Category 4 and 5 hurricanes -- those with winds of 131 mph or higher -- rose from 10 a year in the 1970s to 18 a year since 1990. Average tropical sea surface temperatures have increased as much as 1 degree Fahrenheit during the same period, after remaining stable between 1900 and the mid-1960s.

Georgia Tech atmospheric scientist Judith A. Curry -- co-author of the study with colleagues Peter J. Webster and Hai-Ru Chang, and NCAR's Greg J. Holland -- said in an interview that their survey, coupled with computer models and scientists' understanding of how hurricanes work, has given the researchers a better sense of how rising sea temperatures are linked to more-intense storms.

"There is increasing confidence, as the result of our study, that there's some level of greenhouse warming in what we're seeing," Curry said. "Is it the whole story? We don't know."

Higher ocean temperatures result in more water vapor in the air, which, combined with certain wind patterns, helps power stronger hurricanes, Webster said. Small increases in sea temperature, he added, can "exponentially provide more and more fuel for the hurricanes."

Other studies and computer models also have pointed to an increase in storm intensity: Massachusetts Institute of Technology atmospheric scientist Kerry A. Emanuel wrote last month in the journal Nature that the duration and maximum wind speeds of storms in the North Atlantic and North Pacific have increased about 50 percent since the mid-1970s. The storms' growing violence stemmed in part from higher ocean temperatures, he concluded.

Some researchers, however, question the connection with more severe hurricanes and cyclones. Gerry Bell, the lead seasonal hurricane forecaster at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, said the rise in strong hurricanes reflects a natural weather pattern spanning several decades. Hurricanes in the Atlantic Ocean were more powerful in the 1950s and '60s, weakened in the 1970s, '80s and early '90s, and have strengthened again since 1995.

"It's not linked to global warming or anything like that," Bell said. "This is normal climate variability. It's just that this trend lasts for decades."

Florida State University meteorology and oceanography professor James O'Brien, who writes for the online free-market journal Tech Central Station, said his survey of government data on Atlantic storms between 1850 and 2005 shows that "there's no indication of an increase in intensity."

But both Emanuel and Gavin Schmidt, a climatologist at NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, said today's Science paper is important because it examines worldwide hurricane patterns.

"If you look at it on the global basis, it makes that signal of global warming easier to see," Schmidt said. "You have to be extremely conservative -- with a small 'c' -- to think [rising sea temperatures and stronger hurricanes] are not related."

And some hurricane experts who previously have questioned the influence of global warming now say the evidence is mounting that it has contributed to recent intense tropical storms.

Florida International University researcher Hugh Willoughby, who headed NOAA's hurricane research division between 1995 and 2003, said the recent two hurricane studies are "very persuasive" and helped move him "toward the climate corner" of the debate.

"It's really hard to find any holes in this, and I'm the kind of person who's inclined to look for holes," he said of the new study in Science. The arguments against the connection between climate change and more intense storms, he added, are "looking weaker and weaker as time goes by."

Katrina reanimated a transatlantic argument over global warming policy as critics of the Bush administration have seized on it to promote mandatory limits on greenhouse gas emissions.

"The American president shuts his eyes to the economic and human damage that the failure to protect the climate inflicts on his country and the world through natural catastrophes like Katrina," Germany's environmental minister, Jurgen Trittin, wrote in an opinion piece printed Aug. 30 in the Frankfurter Rundschau newspaper.

But Bill Holbrook, spokesman for Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), said the senator has no intention of pushing for new emissions curbs.

"It is reprehensible for a politician to promote an agenda by twisting a tragedy Americans feel so deeply about, particularly when there is no merit to his ideas," Holbrook said of Trittin. "Policy decisions should be based on sound science, and the notion that Katrina's intensity is somehow attributable to global warming has been widely dismissed by scientific experts."

Arguing that the science of global warming remains uncertain, President Bush in 2001 disavowed the Kyoto treaty that sets mandatory targets for reducing greenhouse gas emissions, and he has pursued policies calling for more research and voluntary efforts to limit emissions.

Experts Assess Deregulation As Factor In '03 Blackout (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

DOJ_NMG_0006144

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - Twenty-five months after a blackout darkened cities from New York to Toronto and Detroit, the Energy Department and its Canadian counterpart held their first public technical discussion on the episode Thursday to talk about one factor widely considered to have been behind it: the deregulation of the electric system.

Engineers, government officials and executives said at the meeting that amid its restructuring the industry needed further changes to reduce the frequency of blackouts as utilities that formerly generated power, transmitted it and delivered it were broken up into separate entities of competing businesses.

"The most serious mistake we can make is pretending that markets do things that they do not do," said Kellan Fluckiger, executive director of the electricity division at the Alberta Department of Energy. "Markets allocate risk, they allocate capital, they provide price signals. Markets do not have a conscience, they do not provide social policy, and they do not do things they are not paid to do."

For example, participants at the meeting said, utilities that once ran the system sometimes added transmission lines to increase reliability of electric power. When they did so, their costs would be reimbursed through the regulatory process; now there is less incentive to take on such efforts, and several participants pointed out that in fact investment in transmission had lagged.

The blackout of 2003 began on Aug. 14 and in some places lasted more than two days. A binational report issued three months afterward did not list deregulation as a cause, instead citing factors like failure to trim trees, train operators and install control systems that could have kept track of the status of all power lines and generators.

Much of the investigation leading to that report was managed by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the architect of utility restructuring in the United States. The report called for a separate study - it did not say by whom - on the role of deregulation in the blackout, but that study has never been done.

Experts at Thursday's meeting said the changes in the industry had had several adverse effects, including a loss of experience among personnel. One member of the panel, Jack Casazza, a 60-year veteran of the industry, said the changes had brought lawyers and M.B.A.'s to the head of these competitive companies, rather than engineers.

"They may be decent people, fine bankers, fine lawyers, wonderful golfers," Mr. Casazza said, "but they don't have the background."

He also said that while the old utilities had often maintained large reserve margins of electricity, to minimize the chance of shortages, some market participants now preferred lower margins, to drive up prices.

Others pointed out that information like a power plant's maximum capacity, and its state of repair on any given day, was now considered proprietary and so was not readily available to system operators, which manage regional power grids.

The North American Electric Reliability Council, whose members come from utilities, marketers, customers and federal agencies, said in a paper submitted for the meeting that the increased demands that deregulation's wider trading had placed on the transmission system "require the grid to be operated closer to its reliability limits more of the time than was the case in the past."

That requires better training and control equipment, said the group, which was founded after a vast blackout in the Northeast in 1965.

Still, not all the industry's changes have affected reliability adversely, participants said. In a paper written for the meeting, Dave Goulding, chief executive of the Ontario Independent Electricity System Operator, said "competition leads to trade and greater interconnectedness," which could increase reliability.

The energy bill signed into law by President Bush on Aug. 8 provides a mechanism for creating mandatory reliability rules. It allows the federal government to designate a private group, probably the North American Electric Reliability Council, as an official "electric reliability organization," with authority to set the rules. But that group pointed out in its paper that while the designated organization would assess the adequacy of the system, it would not have the authority to require anybody to build a generating station or a transmission line.

Soaring Natural-Gas Prices Point To Record-High Electricity Costs (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

While many consumers have focused in recent weeks on the high price of gasoline, utilities are grappling with enormous natural-gas bills that threaten to push another form of energy, electricity, to unprecedented price levels.

Even before Hurricane Katrina, the price of natural gas had doubled during the past two years. The storm's destruction has roiled energy markets, sending natural-gas and oil prices to record levels and foreshadowing eventual rate increases for electricity in the Southeast, where utilities must rebuild heavily damaged systems.

Now, as the winter heating season approaches for much of the country, consumers face a double threat. Many will see record costs on their bills for the natural gas that fuels their furnaces, stoves and clothes dryers. Consumers -- and businesses -- also will get hit with higher charges for electricity made by power plants that burn pricey natural gas.

Regulators and utilities are adopting a variety of approaches to deal with the surge in natural-gas costs, which coincides with record demand for electricity across the nation. Texas has imposed a moratorium on electricity-rate adjustments. Other states are trying to spread utility costs over more than a year or are offering discounts to ease the squeeze or encourage conservation. The high prices are getting special attention in Texas and California, the two most populous states and also the most dependent on natural gas for power generation.

Utility regulators can try to hold the line on electricity rates for a while, but they can't do anything about commodities markets. Natural-gas prices "are ground zero for us -- the hottest issue we face," says Susan Kennedy, a member of the California Public Utilities Commission in San Francisco. Unfortunately, she adds, "it's one expense we have no control over."

California went through an energy crisis in 2000-01 that was prompted by a surge in natural-gas costs and subsequent rise in electricity prices based on those costs. Natural gas in the state often was priced at levels three times as high as those nationwide. In June 2001, for example, gas cost $11.71 per million British thermal units, or BTUs, in Southern California and $3.56 elsewhere in the country.

Currently, power generators are being quoted natural-gas prices for this fall and winter that also look extremely high -- $11.34 for contracts on the New York Mercantile Exchange for October, $11.97 for November and $12.45 for December deliveries. All surpass prices for September that were less than $10. They translate into raw power prices, not adjusted for inflation, that are high even before adding regular utility costs that would push the retail cost up substantially.

Only about 20% of the nation's electricity comes from power plants fueled by natural gas. In most states, high prices for gas-fired generation are tempered somewhat by lower costs for nuclear and coal-fired plants or hydroelectricity, but the exception is in states with deregulated markets where the highest-priced form of generation typically sets the spot-market price.

That's the case for states in the Northeast, the Midwest and the mid-Atlantic region. The only protections consumers have in those states against high prices for spot-market natural gas and electricity are long-term arrangements that lock in lower prices or other hedging provisions.

PECO Energy, the Exelon Corp. utility that serves Philadelphia, has locked in prices for its electricity through 2010 under contracts with its power-generation affiliate. But most such arrangements, made when states first deregulated their markets in the late 1990s, are expiring. Customers of Commonwealth Edison in Chicago, another Exelon company, will be exposed to greater commodity risk after contracts there expire next year.

Texas utility regulators last week extracted a promise from utilities there not to raise electricity prices in response to natural-gas costs that have surged past $10 per million BTUs, five times the levels of a few years ago. Regulators "asked everybody to volunteer" not to change their prices before Oct. 1, said Chris Schein, spokesman for TXU Corp. in Dallas, the biggest electricity generator and seller in the state. The moratorium was premised on an assumption that "current prices are an anomaly associated with Hurricane Katrina," he said.

But many people are skeptical that natural-gas prices will ease much in October, and TXU's stock recently soared above $100 a share, up 66% so far this year, based on expectations of both higher electricity rates and increased sales of electricity due to the upwelling of demand from Katrina-related arrivals.

TXU agreed to make no change before Oct. 10, but it also has told state regulators it will implement a rate increase when the moratorium ends that will be based on a $9.74 price for gas -- around the levels before Katrina hit. Residential rates will be going up 12% in October, taking total increases to 65% since 2002.

Under Texas's deregulation law, utilities peg their power prices to the underlying cost of natural gas, the primary fuel used to make electricity there. The moratorium means that TXU's rate today is based on a natural-gas price, at $7.87 a unit, that's 31% below the prevailing market price for natural gas that the state uses, which is a 20-day rolling average. That's good for consumers. But it means that the utility's competitors, who try to keep their prices slightly below TXU's, also are suffering, in some cases finding themselves having to charge more than TXU, for the first time. That will put pressure on regulators to let costs flow through to consumers to prevent significant losses for electricity suppliers.

It takes a while for high fuel prices to work their way through the electric industry although the lag time has been getting shorter. Puget Sound Energy, in Bellevue, Wash., won the right to adjust rates quickly three years ago, and now is able to do so without going through a full-blown rate review, which usually takes a year. The company hopes to raise rates 4.4% for residential customers on Nov. 1.

Consolidated Edison, the utility serving New York City and environs, is able to reprice its electricity each month, based on fuel costs. Those costs made up 60% of its billed amount for September, versus 53% a year earlier. Overall, bills are up 8.4%, year over year.

Other states are looking for ways to soften the blow to consumers. FPL Group Inc.'s Florida Power & Light says its 2005 fuel bill, mostly for natural gas and oil, will be $770 million higher, or 19% more, than the $4.05 billion it had budgeted. Next year, it expects its fuel costs to top $6.2 billion with natural-gas costs averaging $10.09 a unit. That would represent a further 29% increase. High fuel costs will push up electric rates by 15% for many residential customers and by 20% to 36% for commercial and industrial consumers.

FPL plans to spread out some of the 2005 expense over two years, instead of collecting it all this year. It's also proposing to waive the higher fuel cost for residential customers using less than 1,000 kilowatt hours of electricity each month, hoping to encourage conservation.

Worried about the impact of high prices on industry, California regulators on Sept. 8 approved a two-tier rate structure that will give some business customers of PG&E Corp.'s Pacific Gas & Electric Co. unit and Edison International's Southern California Edison unit a 25% discount, declining to zero by the sixth year. Utilities pledged use these "economic development" rates only for new arrivals or to dissuade companies from leaving the state.

While the "economic development" rates will help some users, they may irk some existing customers who face higher costs next year. Pacific Gas & Electric said it will raise rates by about $600 million in 2006, mostly because of fuel costs, resulting in a 10.8% rate increase for residential consumers. Medium-size businesses, which bore a larger share of earlier increases, will see their cost rise more modestly, by 3.5%.

High fuel prices are straining deregulated energy markets in a way that hasn't been seen since the Western energy crisis. Until now, Texas officials have prided themselves on having market-based mechanisms that they describe as "symmetrical." That is, higher costs for fuel can be passed through to consumers fairly quickly. But the moratorium recognizes growing resistance to repeated increases.

Prohibiting utilities from passing higher costs through can present a problem, though. California did it in 2000 because it thought the costs were unfair to consumers. But the result was enormous utility losses that eventually drove Pacific Gas & Electric into bankruptcy proceedings, from which it has since emerged.

Many companies are exploring their options, too. Amy's Kitchen Inc., a natural-food maker in Santa Rosa, Calif., recently bought 50 acres near Medford, Ore., for a new processing plant. It wanted to expand in California, but couldn't get the rate relief it needed fast enough. "Short-term, our hands are tied," says controller Andy Kopral, adding that companies have to pay whatever they're billed. The quest, he added, "is to get help in the long term" -- even if that means moving.

Growing Fears Over Airline Pensions (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Concern about the impact of the bankruptcies of Delta and Northwest airlines on workers' pensions has led to urgent calls in Washington for immediate pension relief.

Harry Reid, Senate minority leader, said: "Congress has an immediate opportunity to pass legislation enabling both companies to keep pension plans for workers in place."

Johnny Isakson, senator from Georgia, where Delta is based, told the Financial Times on Thursday: "We want to bring the bill to the floor as early as next week. The airlines stated they wanted to preserve their defined benefit plans and their ability to do that is tied to whether we can get pension reform passed." On Thursday night Delta warned that it might miss pension payments for 3,500 retirees.

The sense of urgency comes as the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, the federal agency that insures defined benefit pension plans, said it could assume liabilities of $8.4bn from Delta's pension plan if it was terminated. That would mark its biggest pension termination. Northwest's liabilities were smaller, at $2.8bn, the PBGC said on Thursday.

Lawmakers have proposed extending the time for companies with underfunded pension plans to make up the gap from four years. Mr Isakson has suggested 20 years. The Bush administration had backed seven years.

Delta has told lawmakers that the only way it can avoid an immediate termination is if the 20-year proposal is passed. That has the support of Northwest and American, but not Continental. Although support is building in the Senate, the proposals have had little backing in the House, according to one airline lobbyist.

A report from the Congressional Budget Office on Thursday underlined the risks the PBGC faces. The report estimates the PBGC's accumulated deficit could climb to $142bn over the next 20 years, if it is calculated in the way that a private insurer calculates risk.

While some analysts dispute that number, they agree with the Center On Federal Financial Institutions that without reform, such as changing the way the agency charges premiums to corporations, the PBGC will run out of money by 2022. Doug Elliott, the Center's president, said: "The real problem is a systematic imbalance for 30 years in the premiums they were allowed to charge and how Congress set up the funding and other rules. They are hitting a period when bigger companies are going under."

Claims from failed pension plans reached $14.3bn in 2000-04, 18 times larger than the $783m in claims booked between 1995 and 1999. Airline pension failures would easily top those figures. United has already dumped $6.6bn of liabilities. If Northwest and Delta do so the total airlines' liability would hit $17.8bn.

Employees could also lose out. If the PBGC takes over a plan, it typically pays pensions up to a cap of about $46,000. That is far lower than a typical pilot's pension.

Coffee, Tea … Or Bankruptcy? (WSJ)

By Robert Crandall

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Delta and Northwest Airlines' bankruptcy filings are the latest consequences of the troubles afflicting the long-established, or "legacy," airlines. Inflexible work rules, above-market wage rates, under-funded fixed benefit pension plans, huge debt burdens, outdated business practices and high fuel costs burden the legacy carriers with enormous disadvantages relative to newer carriers who are flying by different rules.

To deal with these burdens, the legacy carriers have made dramatic changes. During the four years ending last December, they collectively reduced capital spending by 62% while simultaneously taking on $16 billion of new debt to cover losses; they cut annual labor costs by more than $6 billion and total annual expenses by more than $20 billion, and they eliminated more than 125,000 jobs. Despite these efforts, the industry recorded losses of more than $30 billion, is losing billions more in 2005, and seems poised for still more losses in 2006. Sisyphus wouldn't trade places with today's airline managers!

Sky-high fuel prices have recently made things worse, but lower fuel prices will not solve the industry's problems. In most industries, producers are able to pass on raw material price increases to their customers, as they are doing today. For a variety of reasons, including very intense competition which limits any one carrier's pricing power, the airline industry has consistently failed to earn adequate profits; cumulatively, the industry has lost money since its inception.

While analysts are closely focused on fuel prices -- and occasionally note the major cost differences between low-lost carriers and their legacy competitors -- little is said about the many unique burdens imposed on airlines by inappropriate laws and regulations. These include taxes and fees representing more than 25% of a typical ticket's purchase price; labor laws enabling unions to drive compensation far above the amounts paid in other industries for similar work; and continuing underinvestment in the operation and construction of the air traffic control system and aviation infrastructure.

Among the most egregious of these burdens are those imposed by the nation's bankruptcy statutes, which allow a failed carrier to use Chapter 11 to dramatically reduce its costs. In bankruptcy, airlines renegotiate aircraft and facility leases, disavow selected contractual obligations, revise or abrogate labor contracts, and even repudiate pension obligations -- all the while continuing to operate. Airlines often remain in bankruptcy for extended periods of time.

Chapter 11 also protects inefficient, unprofitable capacity, since aircraft are always worth more in the air than on the ground. Without Chapter 11, failed airlines might have to liquidate, selling off their physical and operating assets. This would remove capacity from the system and restore some measure of pricing power to the industry's remaining participants.

Chapter 11 also undermines responsible managements. In an intensely competitive industry providing a commodity product, the "dumbest competitor" -- unrestrained by fear of failure -- sets the standard. Thus, when irresponsible union demands are granted, or an improvident management adds unrewarding capacity or uneconomic service features, other managements are compelled to choose between matching the new "industry standard" and tolerating labor unrest and lost revenues. Since experience has established that matching irresponsibility is the better long-term business strategy, few managements have been able to resist the perpetual game of "follow the leader."

While few in either management or labor aspire to bankruptcy, the knowledge that liquidation is unlikely has unquestionably been a factor in encouraging excessive demands by labor and imprudent actions by management. But the probability of liquidation rather than reorganization would likely provide substantial incentives for more responsible labor-management relationships, more cost-effective labor contracts, and more carefully reasoned business plans.

Revising the bankruptcy laws would certainly cause hardship for the communities and employees most involved with failed airlines. On the other hand, revising the rules would offer expanded opportunities for new competitors and for legacy carriers whose managements, unions and employees are most willing to adapt to new realities. Since the U.S. badly needs a vibrant, growing and successful aviation industry, new policies are clearly in order.

To build a better airline industry we need bankruptcy laws designed to incentivize success and penalize failure. We need labor laws that better balance the power of unions and management. We need to recognize that travel drives economic activity of many kinds and benefits every community, and should revise the currently onerous structure of fees and taxes, which seems premised on the notion that only the airlines and their passengers benefit from the airline system. Finally, we need administration and Congressional support for legislation to provide the FAA with the resources to build and operate an aviation infrastructure consistent with both U. S. aviation leadership and growing consumer demand.

Mr. Crandall is a former chairman and CEO of American Airlines.

Come Fly With Congress (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

This week's bankruptcy filings raise the possibility that Delta and Northwest will join United Airlines and US Airways in dumping their pension obligations onto taxpayers. Members of Congress will howl, but it's time for the politicians to admit their own role in co-piloting the airline industry into Chapter 11.

The immediate causes of the Northwest and Delta filings are failed labor negotiations and bad luck. Northwest is struggling with striking mechanics who refused to join other unions in negotiating $1.4 billion in annual savings to prevent bankruptcy. Delta has its own high-cost union contracts and has long been bleeding cash. Hurricane Katrina and sky-high fuel costs were the tipping point.

But the root of the problem for these "legacy" carriers is the burden of pension costs. And one tantalizing option is to use bankruptcy to pass them off to the taxpayer via the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. (PBGC). Congress created this government-run insurance system in 1974, promising to "protect workers" when companies failed. But as always with such government guarantees, Congress only created a future "moral hazard" that is now coming due.

Management and labor would agree in flush times on big pension obligations because they knew the taxpayer was their safety net. The PBGC charges paltry premiums that in no way cover the huge liabilities rolling in from steel, airline and retail industries. Its current deficit exceeds $23 billion, while pensions nationwide are underfunded by an estimated $450 billion. Delta and Northwest alone could dump another $12.4 billion in unfunded liabilities on the agency, with other airlines likely to follow.

By the way, current airline management isn't the major villain here. Northwest CEO Doug Steenland has been warning about the pension problems for years, and has suggested sensible reforms that might have saved both retirees and Northwest. (See his op-ed on this page, November 16, 2004.) But Congress typically dawdled, and bankruptcy eventually became the better part of financial triage. Some of the biggest losers could be airline employees who'd receive only a fraction of their promised pension. So the PBGC is one more case of Congress writing checks it can't cover.

The feds have also burdened airlines in other ways. The Railway Labor Act discourages union compromise, taxes are piled onto ticket prices, foreign investment is all but prohibited, and the antitrust lawyers at Justice have blocked sensible mergers. (See Robert Crandall nearby.) In a classic case of the latter, Justice barred a US Airways and United merger on the ground of unfair competitive advantage, only to see them both go bankrupt.

One hopeful bit of speculation this week is that perhaps the Delta and Northwest Chapter 11 filings were coordinated. The two airlines have compatible routes that would make them ideal merger partners, and bankruptcy is a perfect place to deal with the pilot integration issues that are the biggest reason airline mergers can fail.

In any case, the presence of four airlines in Chapter 11 at the same time suggests that something's got to give. United is already struggling to get enough capital to emerge from bankruptcy, despite its pared down pension costs. Sooner or later one of these carriers will exit not as a going concern, but stage left, via Chapter 7 liquidation. Especially compared with that alternative, a Delta-Northwest merger would make sense.

The impulse on Capitol Hill will be to provide yet another bailout, hoping that Northwest and Delta can keep their pension plans. As if the politicians haven't done enough harm already. The Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pension Committee has already passed another "reform" that would give most companies 20 more years to get their pension plans in order, meaning 20 more years to grow the PBGC's future liabilities. If the Members really wanted to help, they'd leave the airlines alone and find a way to phase out PBGC guarantees.

Unions Struggle To Retain Strength (WSJ)

By Kris Maher, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Union leaders expect the bankruptcy filings of Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines to increase pressure on other carriers to seek further cost cutting from their workers. The troubling reality for unions: There seems to be very little they can do to stop the trend.

Many workers -- like the mechanics at Northwest, who refused to make concessions and went on strike -- can be supplanted by replacement workers. Those like the pilots at Delta and Northwest who agree to concessions have found they weren't enough to avoid bankruptcy proceedings, where further erosion of benefits and pay are likely.

Union leaders expect the tough times to extend to other carriers, as airlines try to get unions to accept similar concessions to avoid being at a competitive disadvantage. "It sets a pattern which many companies not in crisis emulate opportunistically," says Ron Blackwell, chief economist for the AFL-CIO.

The latest round of airline woes has come as the labor movement's fissures have widened, raising questions as to whether some of organized labor's problems are self-inflicted. This summer's defections from the AFL-CIO by four major unions -- representing more than one-third of the labor federation's members -- highlight existing tensions among unions and unwillingness to back fellow unions during strikes.

The harsh challenges confronting unions in the airline industry, while more extreme than those in other corners of the labor movement, illustrate the problems facing all of organized labor as employers press harder to lower labor costs for active and retired workers in the name of being globally competitive. "Unions are in an environment of shrinking alternatives," says Marick F. Masters, a professor of business administration at the University of Pittsburgh. "There are just not many good options left at this time."

Strikes by some workers, especially pilots, could prove more difficult to deal with than the mechanics strike at Northwest, though such an action could only help to push an airline toward a bankruptcy filing in the current economic climate. Consumers and the public don't look as sympathetically on striking workers and are more willing to cross picket lines, making it easier for companies to withstand strikes. "You retain the right to strike on paper, but in practice what you have is the right to lose your job," says Harley Shaiken, a labor-and-economics professor at the University of California at Berkeley.

The concession option hasn't helped workers. Last year, pilots at Northwest agreed to $265 million in annual concessions for two years, while pilots at Delta agreed to $1 billion in annual givebacks for five years. Neither action was enough to offset other costs, such as rising fuel prices.

Labor leaders believe the real problem facing airline unions is the ease with which companies can seek and emerge from bankruptcy courts, free of labor-contract obligations abrogated by the court. "Most of our strategy has been trumped by bankruptcy law," says Duane Woerth, president of the Air Line Pilots Association, which represents 5,200 active pilots at Northwest and 6,500 active pilots at Delta.

Mr. Woerth, who blames management strategies for the airlines' troubles, said he believes pilots will be less willing to accept cuts in the future. "What I've heard loud and clear from workers is that they're done making concessions," he says. "When you're down to 1980s wages and you've lost your pensions, you're not willing to give any more."

AMR Corp., parent of American Airlines, which got concessions from its unions in previous years, said it will look for other ways to improve efficiency. "We can't predict the future, especially given fuel prices, but we're working hard together to do everything to increase revenues and reduce costs to better serve our customers," a spokesman said. A spokesman for Continental Airlines, another of the old-line airlines, said it doesn't intend to seek further labor givebacks after obtaining concessions earlier this year.

Some labor officials say it is important for unions to keep negotiating with management through bankruptcy proceedings. Candice Johnson, a spokeswoman for the Communications Workers of America, says the union was able to negotiate with US Airways through two recent rounds of bankruptcy proceedings. At one point, the company wanted 6,000 reservation agents represented by the union to take wage cuts of as much as 34%. The union negotiated 12.9% cuts. "Often we were up against draconian cuts," says Ms. Johnson. "It was very important to keep negotiating."

Mr. Woerth says the union will focus on organizing pilots at other airlines, such as JetBlue Airways, AirTran Airways and Spirit Airlines, in an effort to raise wages across the industry.

Iran Offers To Spread Nuclear Technology (USAT)

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his country is willing to provide other Islamic nations with nuclear technology. Ahmadinejad made the comments after meeting Turkey's prime minister on the sidelines of a gathering of world leaders at the United Nations.

Ahmadinejad repeated promises that Iran will not pursue nuclear weapons, the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency reported. Then he added: “Iran is ready to transfer nuclear know-how to the Islamic countries due to their need.”

Iran has said it is determined to pursue its nuclear program to process uranium and produce energy, despite European attempts to limit it. The United States accuses Iran of secretly seeking to develop nuclear weapons, a charge Tehran denies.

Meanwhile, talks in Beijing on North Korea's nuclear program came to a standstill as the communist nation continued its refusal to halt atomic bomb development until it receives a nuclear reactor to generate power.

Arrest warrant issued for Milosevic's wife

A judge ordered the arrest of the wife of former Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic for failing to attend her corruption trial in Belgrade. Mirjana Markovic has been in self-imposed exile in Russia since 2003. A previous arrest warrant was revoked in June after her lawyer, Zdenko Tomanovic, promised she would attend the hearing. Markovic left Serbia ahead of charges she illegally gave government-owned luxury apartments to her grandson's nanny and to officials from her JUL communist party. Milosevic has been on trial since 2002 at a United Nations war crimes tribunal in The Hague, Netherlands, for his alleged role in atrocities committed during the Balkan wars of the 1990s.

Fire sweeps fireworks stands in Mexico

A fire tore through Mexico's most famous fireworks market, setting off a chain of explosions that destroyed hundreds of open-air stands just ahead of the country's Independence Day celebrations. Mexico State Civil Defense Director Roberto Vazquez said dozens of people likely were injured in the blaze and explosions in Tultepec, a few miles northeast of Mexico City.

Vazquez said authorities were checking reports that someone had thrown a lit firecracker inside the San Pablito Market and it set off a chain of explosions. As many as 300 stands covering several acres in the market were destroyed, he said. Television images showed a tall plume of gray smoke rising from a broad, charred swath of gutted market stalls.

Tehran Offers Nuclear Expertise (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK -- Iran's president said yesterday that his country is ready to share its nuclear know-how with other Islamic countries, the latest setback to a U.N.-backed effort to halt Tehran's nuclear programs.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in his first foreign trip since his election in June, again denied Bush administration charges that Iran is secretly seeking nuclear weapons.

But after a meeting with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan on the sidelines of the U.N. summit here, Mr. Ahmadinejad, for the first time, offered to share the fruits of Iran's nuclear programs with other Muslim countries.

"The Islamic Republic never seeks such weapons of mass destruction, and with respect to the needs of Islamic countries, we are ready to transfer nuclear know-how to these countries," Mr. Ahmadinejad said, according to Iranian press accounts.

He repeated his denials of Iran's intent to make atomic bombs in a get-acquainted meeting with U.S. reporters and editors yesterday morning, saying such suspicions put a heavy burden on his country.

"How do you prove you are not a bad person?" he asked.

The offer to share nuclear technology prompted a worried U.S. reaction. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli told a briefing, "Iran, as its record demonstrates, has a long history of trying to develop weapons of mass destruction, supporting terror.

"We view with concern any suggestion that Iran would seek to contribute to very destabilizing and unhelpful international behavior."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had been trying to rally support for a vote next week by the United Nations' Vienna, Austria-based nuclear watchdog to refer Iran's nuclear programs to the Security Council -- a first step toward possible sanctions.

The tougher line had been backed earlier by European Union powers Britain, France and Germany, which have taken the diplomatic lead in an unsuccessful effort to resolve the standoff.

But Miss Rice conceded that the United States might not have the votes at what was supposed to be a climactic vote by the board of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) on Monday.

"If we get a referral that will be good, but I think the issue of a referral is something we'll be working on for a while," Miss Rice said in an interview with the Fox News editorial board conducted Wednesday evening and released in full yesterday.

"I'm not so concerned about exactly when it happens, because I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to be [held] on September 19," she added.

Top French, German and English officials met with the Iranian president late yesterday after talks with Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and also signaled that any tough action against Iran would probably be delayed.

DOJ_NMG_0006152

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw declined to comment on the substance of a meeting between the three major European powers -- Britain, France and Germany -- and the recently elected Iranian leader.

"Our aim all the way through in this when we started these negotiations was to keep the matter out of the Security Council," Mr. Straw told reporters. "What we're going to do is to listen carefully to what the president is going to say on Saturday afternoon and we'll take it from there."

"We want to pursue the dialogue. ... We think there is still room for negotiations," said French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin before the meeting with Mr. Ahmadinejad.

U.S. and European officials had previously expressed hope that they could win at least a strong majority of the 35-nation IAEA board to refer Iran to the Security Council in Monday's vote. But China and Russia, who have Security Council vetoes, oppose the referral, and India has been cool to the idea as well.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei also favors delaying a vote, saying Iran should be given a deadline to reverse its decision to resume steps toward enriching uranium.

Enriched uranium can be used to fuel nuclear reactors or to make atomic bombs.

The Iranian leader's offer to share nuclear technology tracked past Iranian efforts to expand the IAEA negotiations to include other Islamic and regional countries.

The IAEA has rejected that suggestion, insisting that it is Iran's record and programs that are at issue.

Diplomats in Vienna have speculated that Iran benefits from any delay in the vote, as a new group of mostly nonaligned countries will be joining the U.N. agency board soon.

Russian President Vladimir Putin, who is expected to discuss the Iranian standoff in his White House visit with President Bush today, met Mr. Ahmadinejad yesterday and praised Russia's "long-standing and very close relationship" with Iran.

With the Russian president at his side, Mr. Ahmadinejad replied, "A powerful Russia is Iran's best friend, and a powerful Iran is Russia's best friend."

U.S. Agenda On Iran Lacking Key Support (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 -- Despite an intense lobbying effort at the most senior levels, the Bush administration failed to persuade three key countries Thursday to back the United States in pressuring Iran to give up sensitive aspects of its nuclear energy program, diplomats and officials said.

Russia, China and India either publicly or privately turned down U.S. requests to help report Iran's case next week to the U.N. Security Council, which has the authority to impose economic sanctions or an oil embargo.

The administration has the reluctant support of the European Union for the first time in more than two years, but that will not be enough. Without backing from one of the three others, U.S. officials indicated they were preparing to abandon, for now, a quest to move the matter into the council.

The decision left the administration scrambling for a Plan B, and U.S. and European diplomats said there were backroom negotiations, on the margins of a U.N. summit in New York, to forge a compromise among countries with influence on the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Some officials said they were considering the possibility of an IAEA resolution that would set a concrete deadline for Iran to comply with a series of measures. If Iran failed, the IAEA board would automatically take the matter to the Security Council.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who met with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh on Thursday and will meet with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Friday, acknowledged that Washington might lack a convincing majority if the IAEA votes on whether to refer Iran's case to the council when it meets Monday in Vienna.

"If we get a referralon September 19, that will be good, but I think the issue of a referral is something that we'll be working for a while," Rice told Fox News. "I'm not so concerned about exactly when it happens, because I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to be on September 19," she said.

Her comments were the strongest public indication yet that the administration was reversing course after expressing confidence, as recently as last week, that it was closer than at any time in the past to taking the matter to the Security Council. U.S. and foreign diplomats said India, which recently forged a major new security and nuclear alliance with the United States, could not be persuaded to join the U.S. strategy. India, which has close economic, political and cultural ties to Iran, has said it supports Iran's right to a nuclear energy program.

India's position, which U.S. officials have said they had not anticipated, has been deeply embarrassing for the White House at a time when it is trying to win congressional support for the India deal. Some officials, who would discuss the diplomatic calculations underway only on condition of anonymity, said the administration preferred to give up the chance of winning a slim majority in the IAEA next week rather than seek a vote that India would publicly oppose.

Iran insists its nuclear efforts are aimed at producing nuclear energy, not bombs. The Bush administration has said that the energy program, built in secret over 18 years and exposed in 2002, is just a cover for a weapons program. Iran has built facilities to enrich uranium to fuel its energy program. But the facilities could produce bomb-grade uranium, and the Bush administration wants the Iranians to give them up.

While many countries appear to share U.S. suspicions about Iran's intentions, they have profound differences with the Bush administration over how to respond, and are apprehensive about the goals of a U.S. president who has said that "all options are on the table" in dealing with Tehran.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said the differences were tactical, rather than strategic, and that efforts were underway to "convince the Iranians to return to the talks" they started with the Europeans in the fall of 2003.

Iran bolted the talks in August after receiving European proposals that would have required Tehran to permanently give upmuch of the nuclear energy program it has already built. Burns said he would devote the next several days to working with the Russians on the Iran issue.

Even the Europeans, frustrated after two tumultuous years of negotiations with Iran over the future of its nuclear program, said they prefer to avoid going to the Security Council.

"Our aim all the way through in this when we started these negotiations was to keep the matter out of the Security Council," British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw told reporters after a half-hour meeting Thursday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. "What we're going to do is to listen carefully to what [Ahmadinejad] is going to say on Saturday afternoon and we'll take it from there."

Ahmadinejad, who has been holding his own round of talks with world leaders attending the U.N. summit, met with Straw and the French and German foreign ministers. The European ministers held an earlier 90-minute meeting with Iran's foreign minister and Ahmadinejad's national security adviser.

The newly elected hard-line Iranian president has little foreign policy experience. But he told reporters Thursday he plans to present new proposals to resolve the impasse when he addresses the conference Saturday. He said Iran's aims are peaceful and that "any improper use of production for nuclear arms should be prevented."

U.S. Report Says Iran Seeks To Acquire Nuclear Weapons (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Iran is concealing many of its nuclear facilities from international controls and the activities show it is seeking nuclear weapons, according to a U.S. government report.

The computer slide presentation developed by the Energy Department for the International Atomic Energy Agency also shows that Iran's nuclear program closely resembles Pakistan's nuclear arms programs.

"Iran's past history of concealment and deception and nuclear fuel cycle infrastructure are most consistent with an intent to acquire nuclear weapons," the report said.

The report, first made public Wednesday by ABC News, states that Iran has a "confirmed record of hiding sensitive nuclear fuel cycle activities from the IAEA."

DOJ_NMG_0006154

The presentation contains numerous photographs, including satellite imagery, showing that Iran built "dummy buildings" to hide an underground vehicle entrance and ventilator shafts at its Natanz facility.

Iran has violated IAEA safeguards and provided false information about centrifuge development, plutonium experiments and military involvement in nuclear activity, the 43-page report stated.

The presentation was shown recently at the U.S. mission to the IAEA in Vienna at a briefing for IAEA representatives. It was produced by the Energy Department's Los Alamos National Laboratory and Pacific Northwest National Laboratories.

Seven of Iran's 13 nuclear-related facilities were kept secret until 2002, including enrichment plants at Lashkar-Abad, Tehran, Natanz, and uranium processing at Adrekan and Gachin, the report said.

"Iran's nuclear program is well-scaled for a weapons capability, as a comparison to [Pakistan's] nuclear weapons infrastructure shows," the report said. "When one also considers Iran's concealment and deception activities, it's difficult to escape the conclusion that Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons."

The Bush administration is pressing the IAEA to refer the issue of Iran's covert nuclear program to the United Nations Security Council, after months of diplomatic efforts by the governments of Britain, France and Germany have produced few results.

The United Nations could then impose economic sanctions against Iran or possibly a future authorization for the use of force.

The report states that Iran's uranium ore resources are insufficient for Tehran to produce enough fuel for civilian electrical power generating reactors.

"However, Iran's uranium resources are more than sufficient to support a nuclear weapons capability," the report said.

For example, Iran's Gachin uranium ore mine is producing about 21 tons of ore annually, enough to produce about four nuclear bombs per year, the report said.

Satellite photographs included in the report show that Iran's gas centrifuge facility and its heavy water plants closely resemble nuclear plants in Pakistan. The report does not identify the country as Pakistan, but U.S. officials said the photographs show Pakistani nuclear infrastructure.

The report also includes a comparison of nuclear weapons delivery vehicles and shows how Iran's Shahab-3 missile closely resembles Pakistan's Ghauri missile. Both have a range of up to 930 miles. Both are based on North Korea's No-Dong missile.

The report notes that the Shahab-3 can carry a warhead weighing up to 2,200 pounds, and the Ghauri can carry a 1,540-pound warhead.

The report said that after Iran was caught with an "extensive concealment and deception record," the government in Tehran claimed that its nuclear program was for a peaceful nuclear fuel cycle.

However, the report said the lack of uranium ore reserves could not support nuclear power plants but "are well scaled to give Iran a significant number of nuclear weapons."

Iran Seeks Compromise In N-fuel Stand-off (FT)

By Our International Staff

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Iran is to propose international joint ventures in its nuclear programme as a means of providing an “objective guarantee” that it cannot be diverted to weapons use, senior Iranian officials have told the Financial Times.

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's new president, is set to make the new proposal on Saturday before the United Nations General Assembly.

“Iran will suggest international co-operation for uranium enrichment, and invite Europe, Russia, China and South Africa to joint ventures in which Iran keeps its nuclear fuel cycle while the international community can make sure there is no diversion,” said a senior official involved in two years of talks with the European Union on Iran's nuclear programme.

“The co-operation is not necessarily for new [nuclear] sites it can be in the sites we already have,” said Ali Agha-Mohammadi, spokesman for the Supreme National Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0006155

It is not clear whether Iran's suggestion would include the more sensitive sites in the country and European diplomats were sceptical that it would be acceptable to their governments.

Nicholas Burns, US undersecretary of state, also emphasised the US position that Iran should not be allowed to develop a nuclear fuel cycle capability.

The proposal could complicate the troubled attempt by the US and the EU to refer Iran to the UN Security Council over its nuclear programme, which Tehran insists is purely peaceful.

The US and the EU, which suspect Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, have been pushing to report Tehran to the UN for concealing elements of its nuclear programme in the past.

The central disagreement in the talks with Iran over its nuclear programme has been Europe's desire that Tehran give up uranium enrichment as the only "objective guarantee" that the programme is purely civil.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, will discuss the issue next week. But faced with opposition from China, Russia and India, diplomatic efforts have shifted to bring Iran back to the negotiating table and renew its suspension of fuel cycle development.

"We are waiting for a signal from Iran," said Mr Burns.

"The issue of a referral is something that we'll be working for a while," Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, told Fox News yesterday. "I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to be on September 19."

Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA director-general, has already suggested giving Iran more time to meet international concerns.

"We have to think about the tactics for September 19 because the tactics we have followed so far have not borne fruit," added a European diplomat.

Iran Promises Proposals to End Nuclear Stalemate (NYT)

By STEVEN R. WEISMAN and WARREN HOGE

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran said yesterday that his country would present new proposals tomorrow to try to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear programs, but he provided no details.

European diplomats indicated that they might defer their effort to bring Iran to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive action if sufficient progress was made in talking with Iran's leaders.

At a breakfast meeting the Iranian discussed at length why his country needed nuclear power and insisted Iran would continue to pursue nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

At the United Nations last evening, Mr. Ahmadinejad also met with Secretary General Kofi Annan and the foreign ministers of Britain, France, Germany and the European Union and told them he would be making the details public in a speech to the General Assembly tomorrow.

Emerging from the evening meeting, Jack Straw, Britain's foreign secretary, said, "What we are going to do is to listen carefully to what the president says Saturday afternoon and take it from there."

The speech is expected to outline a proposal aimed at resuscitating the stalled negotiations over Iran's nuclear program.

As part of those talks, Iran had suspended certain uranium conversion activities, which the West believes were a precursor to making a nuclear weapon, but then resumed the uranium work last month, saying a European offer of economic benefits in return for a full cessation of uranium activities was inadequate.

In the past the United States and the Europeans have said they may turn to the Security Council for possible sanctions, although Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice indicated yesterday that such action might not be imminent.

"I am not so concerned about exactly when it happens," she said, according to the Fox News Web site, "because I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to come on Sept. 19." That is the next scheduled meeting of the board of the International

Atomic Energy Agency, which the United States and some European nations were hoping would refer Iran to the Security Council.

Secretary Straw said the session yesterday was "useful" because it offered the Europeans the first opportunity to meet Mr. Ahmadinejad, who was elected in June. Earlier in the day, the four Europeans met with Dr. Ali A. Larijani, Iran's new chief nuclear negotiator, for the first time.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, speaking to editors, reporters and television interviewers in the morning, described atomic energy as "a blessing given by God."

He said: "It's an opportunity. It is a clean energy. It is a healthy energy." He added that Iran needed nuclear energy because it could not rely forever on its oil resources.

Asked repeatedly whether Iran had not discredited itself by its failure to disclose past nuclear activities, Mr. Ahmadinejad said Iran did not have nuclear weapons and "there is absolutely no proof of a violation on the part of Iran" of its pledge to keep its nuclear program peaceful.

He was referring to a succession of reports by the International Atomic Energy Agency citing Iran's lack of cooperation in disclosing all its programs, but also noting that inspectors had no proof of an actual nuclear weapons program. Mr. Ahmadinejad displayed impatience over what he said was the difficulty in disproving an unfounded allegation, saying, "Usually, you cannot prove that sort of thing. How can you prove that you are not a bad person?"

Britain, France and Germany, along with India and several other countries, are trying to persuade Iran to once again suspend its uranium conversion program. Asked whether he would consider such a step as a gesture, Mr. Ahmadinejad avoided answering.

Wearing a tan windbreaker and an open-collar shirt, Mr. Ahmadinejad appeared relaxed as he held court at a large table at the Hotel Intercontinental in his first broad meeting with American news media.

Western diplomats have said for several days that they understood Mr. Ahmadinejad would offer proposals, but they did not expect anything different or new.

Iran, for example, has called on the Europeans to broaden the talks to include Muslim nations also interested in nuclear energy issues. European and American officials have rejected that idea and have been cool to other proposals, like one from South Africa in which Iran would be allowed to produce nuclear fuel but would have to send it to another country for enrichment.

Joschka Fischer, Germany's foreign minister, said after last night's meeting that "Europe's position is unchanged." He said there was a need to be "realistic" and not make threats.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said that Iran would continue to work with the International Atomic Energy Agency in allowing inspections, and that Iran would observe a rule requiring it to give 180 days' notice if it processes uranium to the next step, which would be enrichment, requiring the use of centrifuges.

At present Iran is converting raw uranium in a form known as yellowcake into a gas, which it could in theory enrich to weapons grade.

Mr. Ahmadinejad seemed comfortable with some of the technical details of the nuclear controversy, but he turned to his negotiator, Dr. Larijani, for the specifics in international agreements. Over all, Mr. Ahmadinejad accused the West of a double standard, wanting nuclear power for the West but not for Iran.

"There is some kind of inequality and injustice being created," he said. Anyone asking Iran to take conciliatory steps, like suspending its uranium conversion, should recognize that this work is legal under international agreements.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, a former mayor of Tehran, has traveled little outside his country, but expressed great admiration for the American people, American diversity and its great natural resources. "The capabilities of America can be beneficial for all other nations," he said.

Thus, he said, he was surprised at the initial American response to Hurricane Katrina. "We expected more," he said.

On other subjects, Mr. Ahmadinejad said that Iranians would have close ties with the Iraqis, but that the roots of the current insurgency lay with the American military presence. "Insecurity and the control of the occupation are linked to one another," he said. "After all, Iraq is an occupied country."

Iran's Leader Critical In First U.S. Visit (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 -- Newly elected Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, making his first trip to the United States, introduced himself to the U.S. media Thursday morning, displaying a dash of defiance at U.S. charges over Iran's nuclear program and a warning that the era of big-power dominance in international relations has ended.

Meeting over breakfast with about a dozen journalists in a Midtown Manhattan hotel conference room, Ahmadinejad blamed the Bush administration's policies for instability in Iraq. A veteran of Iran's war against Iraq, the president described the removal of Saddam Hussein as "necessary" but said the task should have been left to Iraqis.

"It is the occupiers who have responsibility for stability in Iraq," he said, adding later, "The root of the problem is the presence of foreign troops."

Ahmadinejad, who was an obscure provincial politician when he was elected mayor of Tehran in 2003, was the surprise winner in June's presidential elections. His anonymity outside Iran has helped keep alive accusations that he was photographed with American hostages at the U.S. Embassy in 1979, a charge repeated during his visit here and categorically denied by the president over breakfast.

Seeming relaxed in a tan sports jacket and open collar but initially almost timid, Ahmadinejad, 49, opened his session with journalists expressing condolences for the victims of Hurricane Katrina. He said he was puzzled by how the storm received its name. "The letter K," offered CBS News's Mike Wallace, launching a discussion of the idiosyncratic American practice of personifying some of the nation's most destructive natural disasters.

Later, Ahmadinejad returned to the subject of Katrina to poke at the Bush administration's response and perhaps draw lessons about solidarity among Americans. He compared the delivery of aid to victims in the Gulf Coast unfavorably with the response to natural disasters in the Islamic republic.

"When this hurricane occurred we were all were extremely sad," Ahmadinejad said, speaking through a translator. "We thought Americans would act more quickly and help their fellow Americans. We expected more." He added: "During the very first day of the hurricane, people could have brought more and limited the extent of the tragedy."

Perhaps the most contentious issue Ahmadinejad faces during this visit is continuing opposition from the United States and European Union to Iran's nuclear program. Iran insists the program -- developed in secret for 18 years -- is for peaceful energy use; the Bush administration charges a crash nuclear weapons project is hidden beneath the veneer of a peaceful program.

The United States had hoped to win referral of the matter to the U.N. Security Council at next Monday's meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency, but U.S. officials failed to win broad support for such a move during talks here this week on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly.

Ahmadinejad said he had arrived with new proposals to resolve the impasse but declined to reveal them in advance of their public unveiling Saturday. He said Iran had no intention of building nuclear weapons but asserted that every nation had a right to develop nuclear power.

"We believe that atomic energy is a blessing given by God; it is an opportunity given to all nations," he said, adding that "any improper use of production for nuclear arms should be prevented."

During his discussions with other leaders here, Ahmadinejad has advanced the idea of transferring "nuclear know-how to the Islamic countries due to their need," according to the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency.

During the breakfast, Ahmadinejad said there is "no proof of a violation by Iran" of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, "just an allegation." He complained: "How can you prove you are not a bad person? You can't prove that."

Ahmadinejad's visit here has been dogged by protesters asserting that, as a student leader, he played a role in the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and seizure of U.S. hostages during the 1979 Iranian revolution. "This is an allegation that has absolutely no basis," he said. Alluding to the power of the media gathered at the breakfast, he added: "Sometimes I read rumors about the president of Iran -- and I laugh at them."

Asked his impressions of the United States, Ahmadinejad said it is a large, rich and diverse country but "the attitude of the American government has created problems with other countries." The United States "should not humiliate others, should not consider itself superior to others," he said. "We think the era of utilization of force and pressure in international relations has ended. Today, the will of the people will prevail, as it did in the election in Iran."

Bush To Pressure Putin On Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. In Washington And Greg White In Moscow, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

U.S. President George W. Bush hopes to persuade Russian President Vladimir Putin to toughen his stance on Iran, to further open his country's oil and gas reserves to foreign investment and to take steps to speed Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, when the two men meet at the White House.

Bush administration officials, in previewing Friday's one-day summit, described relations between Washington and Moscow these days as a mix of cooperation and tension, along with a dollop of indifference on the Russian side.

Much has changed from two years ago, when Mr. Bush used a Camp David gathering to praise Mr. Putin's Russia as "a country in which democracy and freedom and the rule of law thrive." Since then, the Kremlin has rolled back democratic institutions, used the tax and court systems to partially nationalize the country's largest oil company and jail its billionaire owner, meddled clumsily in the politics of its neighbors and cooperated with China in efforts to reduce U.S. influence in the strategic region of Central Asia.

Despite these setbacks, President Bush still puts much stock in his rapport with Mr. Putin, with whom he has met nearly 20 times.

The first item on today's agenda, U.S. officials say, will be to urge Mr. Putin to look more favorably on European and U.S. efforts to persuade Iran to give up its alleged nuclear-weapons ambitions.

The U.S., along with Britain, France and Germany, are threatening to take Iran to the United Nations Security Council unless it agrees to rules to prevent its civilian nuclear program from being used for military aims. But Russia and China, both of which have veto power within the council, oppose that idea. "This will be a major issue" in the summit talks, said one senior administration official.

Mr. Bush will also try to get a feel from President Putin on what transpired in his private talks at the U.N. on Wednesday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the official said.

On the energy front, the White House is pleased by what appears to be increased activity among Russian oil and gas companies to move more aggressively on new exploration and pipeline projects, including some with Western partners.

"I've noticed a definite change in the Russians' attitude toward our energy relationship" in the past few months, said one U.S. diplomat.

State gas titan OAO Gazprom was expected to announce on Friday its short list of foreign partners on a long-awaited liquefied-natural-gas project that would target the U.S. market. And Russia appears to be moving ahead with plans to build a new pipeline that would carry oil to the country's arctic coast, putting it within tanker range of U.S. ports.

Bush officials say that on the trade front, both sides must resolve a number of prickly issues within U.S.-Russian negotiations on Russian WTO membership, which could happen sometime next year. The toughest problems revolve around Russian rules on energy services, bank subsidiaries, aviation and intellectual-property protections. The U.S. still hopes to wrap up the trade talks by the end of the year.

Some of the trickiest talk could focus on Moscow's influence over former Soviet republics, which Russia views as its turf. After popular revolutions brought pro-Western leaders to power in Georgia and Ukraine in the past two years, the Bush administration has come to see the region as a testing ground for its new focus on democratization around the world.

The U.S. also has begun to look with some alarm on the growing ties between Moscow and Beijing. China and Russia held joint military maneuvers last month.

MOSCOW -- Last month President Vladimir Putin's broadly televised public activities included flying a strategic bomber, driving an old Soviet-era Volga automobile, overseeing naval maneuvers on board a nuclear missile cruiser, inaugurating a highway tunnel and visiting a children's cancer hospital, where he had a friendly meal with a sick boy and ordered that a new, state-of-the-art ward be constructed without delay. He listened to the defense minister's report on Russian-Chinese military maneuvers and presided over grand celebrations of the 1,000th anniversary of the city of Kazan, attended by Russian regional leaders and presidents of most of the former Soviet republics. Western political scholars and journalists who met with him during the first week of September were nearly unanimous in their favorable impression of the Russian leader: "Energetic" and "confident" were the most frequent assessments heard from those who attended.

He looks, in fact, like a man interested in reelection. So much so that political commentators are once again guessing about whether he will stay in power beyond 2008, when his second -- and last -- term expires. To be sure, several loyal officials have suggested ways to overcome the constitutional obstacle to a third term. But with the next election still 2 1/2 years away, the Kremlin appears to remain undecided as to how to preserve the political status quo in Russia in 2008. Putin's heightened activity may just be a way of demonstrating that he is fully in charge and that he remains the ultimate decision maker on all important national issues, including the "challenge of 2008."

With the Kremlin's control over politics and society having tightened this past year, there is little for Putin to worry about from parliamentary factions, the media or outside opponents. While public opinion polls show unrelenting discontent with government policies, Putin's own approval rating, which had dropped somewhat, popped back up to 70 percent in August.

Even the smoldering youth activism that had caused the Kremlin concern -- some of the more radical groups were harassed and even prosecuted -- doesn't seem to pose much of a threat to the ruling elite. According to an August poll, 82 percent of young people share none of the ideas of these youth groups -- an apparent indication of a widespread rejection of activism as such.

With oil revenue growing steadily, the public generally apathetic, and the elites bought or intimidated into submission, Putin and his inner circle have reason to feel confident and high-spirited. But the Kremlin is still apprehensive about autonomous civic activism and won't ease its efforts to preempt any kind of genuine public initiative.

Sometimes this leads to peculiar political innovations. Consider the newly introduced representative body known as the Public Chamber. It was described by Putin as a "channel of influence of civil societies, of the citizens of the Russian Federation on the decisions made in the country."

Under the terms of the law establishing it, the Public Chamber will consist of Russians who "have done great service to the society and state." And who is to decide which honorable citizens are to be recognized by a grateful nation? The political style of Putin's Russia suggests the answer: The members will be handpicked by Putin himself, or nearly so. He will appoint one-third of the 126 Public Chamber members, and these core members will be the dominant force in selecting the remaining 84.

Putin has said that these people should be "politically maximally unengaged." The nomination process has so far been strictly secret (like all Kremlin decisions), but leaks and rumors have brought forth about a dozen names. Their main defining features are -- not unexpectedly -- their loyalty and special favors done for the Kremlin. At least two of the rumored candidates -- a famous female gymnast and a highly popular theater director -- are signatories to a recent collective letter supporting the conviction of Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the oil tycoon and potential political rival prosecuted by Putin's government. Others include a female college student from a provincial city who's also a commissar of Nashi, a government-sponsored youth movement masterminded by the Kremlin, and an unknown functionary of a government-sponsored association of journalists.

These are only rumors, of course, but whoever is chosen for the Public Chamber, this is not a body that will be doing much to channel public influence. The Kremlin would never risk granting real authority to anyone who has not proved his or her loyalty. If it is indeed concerned about feedback from the public, the concern has been overwhelmed by a far more important priority: the urge to keep society under control. The only question is whether Putin's regained political confidence will cause him to mistake the obliging recommendations of his loyalists for the actual voice of the people.

President Bush created a bit of a stir Wednesday when he inexplicably walked out in the middle of an important U.N. Security Council meeting on terrorism, right in the middle of a speech by the leader of Benin.

Delegates thought it was another example of American arrogance -- U.S. officials are notorious for leaving meetings in mid-session, especially at the General Assembly. Russia's Vladimir Putin , Britain's Tony Blair and China's Hu Jintao sat patiently through the less-than-riveting address.

But it appears that Bush meant no insult, judging from a note he handed to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice shortly before he left.

Bush, after waiting while a member of his security detail swept a nearby bathroom, used the facilities and return to the meeting a few minutes later.The Big Picture

Some people simply can't get with the program. Take Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), for example. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced Wednesday that he was sending a bipartisan House Appropriations Committee trip to New Orleans to check things out.

But Obey, the committee's top Democrat, demurred. "At this point, all efforts should be focused on helping those in need and recovering the dead," Obey said in a statement. "There will be plenty of time for politicians to play visiting fireman, but right now any congressional trip can't help but end up being a dog-and-pony show," he said, attacking a congressional tradition nearly as sacred as pork itself.

"I've seen congressional trips in these situations become photo ops that take time and energy away from emergency activities," continued Obey, a three-decade veteran of the committee. "We need to give emergency responders a week or so to do their work and stabilize the situation before we divert their attention by asking them to be congressional travel guides. Photo ops can come later. We have no business posing for them now. At this point, one of the watchdogs we may need is a watchdog to keep Congress from getting in the way of people doing real work."

Turns out the committee isn't likely to be going for a while, but an assorted bipartisan group of 20 House members is taking off this weekend.

The Senate, which, fortunately, values tradition, dogs and little ponies, would not be deterred.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) promptly announced yesterday that they would be leading a delegation leaving today on a one-day trip "to assess Katrina rescue and recovery efforts." The delegation "will hold . . . media availabilities" at Harrah's casino in New Orleans, in Pass Christian, Miss. and at the airport in Mobile, Ala., the announcement said.

The delegation includes the two leaders and GOP Sens. Thad Cochran (Miss.), Susan Collins (Maine), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), James M. Inhofe (Okla.), Richard C. Shelby (Ala.) and John W. Warner (Va.). The Democratic senators are Max Baucus (Mont.), Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) and Debbie Stabenow (Mich.).A Heck of a (New) Job

North Koreans Insist On Demand For New Reactor In Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By JOSEPH KAHN

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 15 - North Korea on Thursday refused to drop a new demand that the outside world build it a nuclear reactor before it dismantles its nuclear weapons, leaving six-nation negotiations here on the verge of collapse.

The United States and North Korea identified its demand for a light-water nuclear reactor as the main sticking point in the talks, which have continued fitfully over two years and failed to produce even a joint statement of principles. While this round will continue for at least another day, Christopher Hill, the chief American negotiator, made it clear on Thursday that the gap had widened over three days of talks. "The only thing North Korea is interested in discussing is a light-water reactor," Mr. Hill said. "No country is going to provide North Korea with a light-water reactor. So we have reached a bit of a standoff."

That leaves the Bush administration with an unhappy choice - go on indefinitely with talks that have produced no result, or seek a consensus to impose international penalties on North Korea against the wishes of most countries in the region.

One goal for the United States in these talks, analysts say, is to show enough sincerity and flexibility to convince Asian nations that fault lies with North Korea and that imposing penalties is the only viable option.

North Korea is eager to show that it wants to dismantle its nuclear arms program and would do so but for the unreasonable demands of the United States, which it accuses of having a "hostile policy" intended to overthrow its government.

Those competing agendas were on display on Thursday. The United States said the other four regional powers participating in the talks, South Korea, Russia, Japan, and the host, China, agreed that North Korea's condition that it receive a reactor before ending its arms program was impossible to meet.

North Korea said that the other parties had agreed that it was justified in requesting a light-water reactor and that only the United States had refused to discuss the matter.

Hyun Hak Bong, a spokesman for the North Korean delegation at the talks, said his government considered a new nuclear plant an essential gesture of good will from the United States. Mr. Hyun said Washington had not kept its word in the past, so the donation of the plant must precede any North Korean concessions.

"Providing a light-water reactor is a matter of principle for building trust," Mr. Hyun told reporters outside the talks in Beijing. "The United States says it cannot give us a light-water reactor no matter what."

"It is telling us to give up" the nuclear program "first without doing its part," he added.

Light-water nuclear reactors are not easily diverted to weapons use. North Korea was promised two light-water reactors to end its nuclear arms program in a 1994 deal reached with the Clinton administration. No plants were delivered and the deal failed in 2002, when the Bush administration accused North Korea of enriching uranium for atomic bombs.

Mr. Hill said North Korea's condition could not be met legally.

N. Korea Nuclear Talks Mired In 'Major Disagreements' (WT)

By Shigemi Sato And Jun Kwanwoo, Agence France-presse

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

BEIJING -- Talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear-weapons program are deadlocked due to "major disagreements" between the North and the United States, delegates said yesterday.

"There wasn't any progress today. ... We are in a bit of a standoff at the moment," U.S. envoy Christopher R. Hill told reporters after a day of meetings with his North Korean counterpart and other chief delegates.

Mr. Hill, an assistant secretary of state, said there were "major disagreements" between the United States and North Korea, echoing the assessments of Japan and host country China.

The dispute centers on the North's demand that the international community help it build light-water atomic reactors to generate electricity in exchange for ending its nuclear-weapons program.

The United States and Japan have refused, with Washington saying the cost and time frame are impractical and that the Stalinist state cannot be trusted to confine a reactor to civilian use.

"The differences of our positions are so great that the talks are stalemated," Japan's top envoy Kenichiro Sasae told reporters.

"North Korea's demand for a light-water reactor is strong. We are not in a position to accept it as it is. The prospect is bleak unless this question is resolved," Mr. Sasae said.

In an attempt to settle their differences, Mr. Hill and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Gye-gwan, held a 90-minute one-on-one meeting yesterday but failed to reach a compromise, with one official saying both left the session with "stiff faces."

A spokesman for the North Korean delegation agreed yesterday that the talks were "not making progress" due to the dispute over light-water reactors.

DOJ_NMG_0006162

"While other participating countries expressed understanding on this issue, the United States unreasonably vowed not to provide light-water reactors," said spokesman Hyun Hak-bong.

Mr. Hill, however, rejected the North's claims that all parties except the United States were willing.

"No delegation was prepared to offer North Korea a light-water reactor," Mr. Hill said.

He urged the North to accept "a pretty good deal" he put on the table.

"The deal consists of really a lot of what the DPRK [North Korea] should want -- security guarantees, a recognition package, access to international financial institutions, a very serious energy package," he said.

The talks involving the two Koreas, Japan, Russia, China and the United States resumed on Tuesday after a five-week recess. Still, there was no sign they have broken down, with Mr. Hill and the North Koreans indicating they will continue discussions today.

"Everybody has got an interest in solving this problem through diplomatic means. ... There will be a point at which we look at the deadline, but we are not at that point yet," Mr. Hill said.

The talks are aimed at persuading North Korea, which says it has nuclear weapons, to give them up verifiably and irreversibly in exchange for security guarantees as well as energy and economic aid.

But they have become bogged down by Pyongyang's insistence that its right to peaceful atomic energy be included in a statement of principles the six nations are trying to adopt to denuclearize the Korean Peninsula.

Differences of opinion between the six have became stark, with the United States and Japan insisting that light-water reactors were out of the question and South Korea saying they should remain an option.

China and Russia also have sided with North Korea on the nuclear-energy issue, though not as vocally as Seoul.

Mr. Hill said it would take up to a decade to build a light-water reactor and cost $2 billion to $3 billion; he urged the North to accept instead a South Korean offer to run power lines across the border.

Under a now-defunct 1994 agreement, two light-water reactors were to have been built by a U.S.-led consortium to replace North Korea's existing graphite-moderated reactors, which can produce weapons-grade plutonium.

But construction was suspended after the United States in 2002 accused the North of developing a secret uranium-enrichment program.

Failure to reach an agreement in Beijing could prompt the United States to take the issue to the U.N. Security Council and press for sanctions.

Talks Deadlock Over N. Korea's Demand For Reactor (WP)

By Edward Cody, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 15 -- U.S. and North Korean diplomats acknowledged an irreconcilable deadlock Thursday in long-stalled nuclear disarmament talks, casting doubt on the future of Chinese-sponsored six-party negotiations.

The stalemate, based on the North Korean demand that it be given a light-water nuclear reactor to produce electricity, brought the current round of discussions to a rancorous standstill after three days. Representatives of the participating countries, which also include South Korea, Japan and Russia, did not indicate they would abandon the negotiations, but none outlined a way to keep talks going.

"We're in a bit of a standoff at this point," said Christopher Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs and chief U.S. negotiator. "We'll have to see where this leads."

If the talks break down permanently, the Bush administration has suggested referring the issue of North Korea's nuclear weapons program to the U.N. Security Council for possible economic and other sanctions. Other participants in the talks, including China, which has veto power on the Security Council, have indicated they would not favor that course. North Korea has warned it would consider such a step tantamount to war.

Chinese diplomats, who sponsor and act as referees in the six-party talks, were meeting with their North Korean counterparts to explore salvaging the discussions.

Hill said he planned to meet with Chinese diplomats on Friday, but he made it clear that neither side seemed ready to budge. "I think it's fair to say we have a rather major disagreement on this point," he said.

A breakdown would represent a major setback for the Beijing government, which since August 2003 has taken a prominent leadership role in seeking a diplomatic solution to one of Asia's most intractable problems. Barring a dramatic turnabout by North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, however, it was difficult to see how the gap could be bridged, diplomats said.

"The talks are deadlocked," said the chief Japanese delegate, Kenichiro Sasae. "The differences between positions remain large and there are no prospects of agreement."

A North Korean spokesman, Hyun Hak Bong, said in a statement that his government's demand for a light-water reactor was a litmus test of whether the United States has abandoned hostility toward Pyongyang.

"Providing a light-water reactor is a matter of principle for building trust," the statement said. "The United States says it cannot give us a light-water reactor no matter what. It is telling us to give up the nuclear first without doing its part."

The Bush administration has demanded that North Korea relinquish not only its nuclear weapons program but also its ambition to build a nuclear reactor to produce electricity. Hill said the U.S. government believes that North Korea cannot be trusted on the issue, because it converted a research reactor in the 1990s into a source of weapons-grade plutonium.

Such a plant is out of the question, Hill said, because North Korea expelled U.N. weapons inspectors at the end of 2002 and, in January 2003, withdrew from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. The nation's energy needs can be supplied by a South Korean-proposed program that is included in the Chinese-drafted plan under discussion here, he added.

North Korea Poses Aid Puzzle (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

BEIJING -- The main market in Kang Chon Ha's hometown in North Korea is flush with illicit commodities: rice and corn donated by foreign governments to feed the impoverished country's hungriest and most vulnerable people.

"Senior officials sell it out the back door" of county warehouses, says Mr. Kang, a trader who supplied small vendors across North Korea before fleeing last year, and who uses a pseudonym because he fears retribution against relatives still there. "They'll do anything to make money."

The widespread availability of donated food in North Korea's booming markets shows how difficult it is for relief organizations to work with a government that, frustrated aid workers and others say, is often more interested in preserving its power than in protecting its citizens. Reports of diverted aid also are deepening mistrust of the government among other nations -- including those negotiating with Pyongyang over the future of its nuclear capabilities.

Yesterday, talks under way here since Tuesday remained at an impasse, the latest stumbling block being the North's demand for a light-water nuclear reactor in return for it abandoning atomic weapons. The U.S. long has said the world can't trust that Pyongyang won't convert a civilian nuclear program to military use.

It is impossible to know exactly how much aid is diverted -- to markets as well as to the military and other groups favored by the regime -- given tight North Korean restrictions on monitoring. But experts say it could be substantial.

A decade after the start of a famine that may have killed more than a million people, and despite massive deliveries of food aid, the situation remains precarious. Thirty-seven percent of all North Korean children are malnourished, as are a third of mothers, according to data from the United Nations' World Food Program. That makes it impossible to walk away, aid officials say.

"In North Korea, you have a ruthless government that is holding its own people hostage," says Marcus Noland, a Korea expert at the Institute for International Economics in Washington. "That is the basic ethical dilemma."

Now, North Korea says the crisis is easing and it wants to stop receiving emergency food shipments and instead get more extensive development assistance. Officials last week told Richard Ragan, the head of the World Food Program office in Pyongyang, that his organization -- which last year provided nearly 300,000 metric tons of grain to the North -- should make the shift by the end of the year.

Song Se Il, a diplomat at Pyongyang's United Nations mission, said his government has decided to "discontinue" emergency aid because the "the amount received is small" and the "prospect for future humanitarian assistance is not good." He declined to comment further.

WFP officials say the North Koreans told them they feared becoming too dependent on aid. But many experts say they believe Pyongyang is chafing at the conditions attached to help from the WFP. They say Pyongyang may assume, incorrectly, that development aid would come with fewer strings attached.

North Korean officials "complain that over the past several years, aid shipments have declined while conditions have increased," says Mr. Ragan. "You've got white vehicles everywhere and people pushing on monitoring, pushing on access. They don't like it."

But even after a lot of pushing, aid experts say, oversight remains relatively weak. Despite repeated requests over 10 years, North Korea has refused to give the WFP a list of all institutions receiving the food aid it supplies. WFP officials also must give several days' advance notice of inspection visits.

WFP workers aren't allowed to interview people who aren't already receiving aid, making it difficult to verify food is going to those most in need. And, with few exceptions, they also are barred from visiting markets, an increasingly important conduit for diverted food donations.

"We believe that the vast bulk of what donors provide goes to the people it is intended for," says Gerald Bourke, the WFP spokesman in Beijing. Mr. Bourke says the WFP's ability to monitor aid flows in North Korea has "gotten a lot better over time, but there's still a long way to go."

Mr. Ragan says he doesn't believe the North Korean government has a policy of diverting WFP aid to the military or to markets. But he says that, given the sheer amount of food the agency is moving, some is going to "end up going the wrong way."

Aid officials and experts say that efforts by the WFP and others to improve monitoring have been undercut by large shipments of aid and subsidized food from South Korea and China with relatively few conditions attached. South Korea recently agreed to send 500,000 metric tons of rice to North Korea this year.

Seoul says it is planning 20 site visits to track the shipment. That compares with hundreds of site visits per month conducted by WFP officials on a smaller amount of aid. Also, South Korea is shipping rice, favored by the elite, and especially vulnerable to diversion, instead of less desirable grains more likely to be consumed by the truly needy.

South Korea's Unification Ministry says it has tried to "increase the transparency of food distribution" in the North. Han Ki Soon, director of the ministry's Cooperation Fund Division, dismissed criticism that Seoul's laxer standards could be detrimental to the WFP's efforts.

Defectors report seeing regular supplies of South Korean rice in markets, along with rice and other grains donated by the U.S., Japan and others. One man who fled North Korea this year says "aid rice is sold everywhere." In his town in the northeastern part of the country, white bags of donated food line market stalls.

Some aid officials say bags from aid deliveries are often being reused. But defectors say it is easy to tell the imported rice and other grains from those grown in North Korea, which tend to be of lower quality.

A video shot surreptitiously in July 2004 in a large market in Chongjin, a city on the northeast coast, and obtained by a Japanese nongovernmental organization, showed plentiful supplies of food in sacks from donor countries, including some marked with an American flag and others from South Korea.

Some argue that diversion of aid isn't an entirely bad thing. Lee Seung Yong, a project coordinator at Good Friends, a South Korean NGO, says, "it would be better if all the aid went to those who need it most," but that all aid helps "push the price of rice down, indirectly giving a benefit to the poor."

Flows of aid to the market clearly do help lower prices. The WFP says the mere announcement of South Korea's plans to make its large shipment of aid this year sent food prices lower. And that helps anyone who buys food in the markets, a common practice among North Koreans; government restrictions have loosened in recent years and a large amount of food goes through markets rather than the so-called public distribution system.

But, says Stephan Haggard, a professor at the University of California, San Diego, "there are serious questions in a situation like this, about whether the effects are trickling down."

Mr. Haggard, the author of a recent paper on food aid and human rights in North Korea, says that many disadvantaged people, especially children, the elderly and the growing number of people who have lost industrial jobs as a result of economic changes, don't earn the wages necessary to be able to shop in the market. That is why aid agencies have targeted them for assistance in the first place.

"People who don't have market resources, who can't command the resources to buy food in the market" are those being hurt most by the diversion, says Mr. Haggard.

Court Says West Bank Barrier Must Detour by 5 Arab Villages (NYT)

By GREG MYRE

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

JERUSALEM, Sept. 15 - Israel's highest court ruled Thursday that part of Israel's West Bank separation barrier had imposed major hardships on Palestinian villagers and must be rerouted. It was the second such decision by the court.

However, the nine judges on the High Court of Justice also said in their unanimous ruling that Israel could build the barrier inside the West Bank, provided the government did so for security needs and not political considerations.

They criticized an advisory ruling last year by the International Court of Justice in The Hague that said all sections of the barrier inside the West Bank violated international law and should be torn down. The Israeli court said the international court had failed to consider security needs.

The immediate impact of Thursday's ruling will be to require Israel to revise a small section of the barrier built near the Jewish settlement at Alfei Menashe, where more than 5,000 settlers live.

Five Palestinian villages in the area, with about 1,200 people, brought the petition, contending the barrier was illegal. They said it left them in a tiny enclave, making it difficult and sometimes impossible to reach jobs, schools, farm land, hospitals and commercial centers.

"The enclave creates a chokehold around the villages," the court ruled. "It seriously damages the entire fabric of life."

The villagers must have permits to live in their homes. To travel to other Palestinian areas, they go through Israeli-controlled gates that are currently open from about 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., residents said.

"With this decision, we will be connected to our brothers and relatives again," said Yassin Marabeh, 47, the mayor of one village, Ras Tira.

The court said that Israel "must, within a reasonable period, reconsider the various alternatives for the separation fence route" and explore security options that "injure the fabric of life of the residents of the villages of the enclave to a lesser extent."

The court, while not specifying a new route, ruled that Israel could build the barrier in the West Bank, which the court described as being under "belligerent occupation," as long as Israel's security concerns are balanced with Palestinian needs and human rights.

The Palestinian leadership says Israel is free to build a barrier on the West Bank boundary, its pre-1967 border, which is often referred to as the Green Line. But Palestinians object to having the barrier inside the West Bank, on land they are seeking for a future state.

Israel's deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert, told Israel Radio on Thursday, "The importance is that the court made it legal for a fence beyond the Green Line and decided the World Court ruling is not binding."

Moshe Negbi, a prominent Israeli legal commentator, agreed that the Israeli government had won an important victory in receiving the court's blessing to build in the West Bank, even if some sections of the fence must be adjusted.

Thursday's ruling was quite similar to one handed down by the Israeli court in June 2004 in response to a petition by several West Bank Palestinian villages northwest of Jerusalem. Israel responded by rerouting that section of the barrier. It still runs inside the West Bank, though it places less land on the Israeli side than previously planned.

Israel says the barrier is essential to defend against Palestinian suicide bombings and other attacks. The number of suicide bombings has come down dramatically since Israel began building the barrier three years ago, as other security measures have also been put into effect. A truce between the two sides was declared in February.

Along Israel's planned route, the barrier is to stretch for some 400 miles, and about one-third has been completed. Under the plan, about 10 percent of the West Bank would be on the Israeli side of the barrier.

Most of the nearly 250,000 West Bank settlers would be protected by the barrier, as well as Israelis living in East Jerusalem, which has been annexed by Israel.

In the Gaza Strip on Thursday, Palestinian and Egyptian security forces tried but largely failed to impose some order along their border, where civilians have been going back and forth freely since the Israeli troops completed their withdrawal on Monday. The security forces restricted the number of people crossing for much of the day.

But on Thursday afternoon, large numbers of Palestinians overwhelmed the security forces and hundreds poured into Egypt in scenes familiar from recent days. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Court Orders Rerouting Of Barrier (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

TEL AVIV -- Israel's Supreme Court yesterday ordered the government to dismantle and reroute a portion of its West Bank security barrier, ruling on behalf of five Palestinian villages isolated by the obstacle.

But even as the 9-0 ruling opened future challenges to the two-year-old network of electronic fence and concrete walls, the judges for the first time confirmed the legality of erecting a separation barrier inside the West Bank to protect Israeli citizens.

The decision rejected the July 2004 opinion by the United Nations' judicial arm that the more-than 400-mile obstacle -- built to repel terrorist attacks against Israelis and one-third complete -- violates international law because it is built on territory under military occupation.

While the court criticized the International Court of Justice's sweeping rejection of building the security barrier in the West Bank, it ruled that the specific sections of the fence must not unreasonably hamper living conditions for Palestinians.

The court sided with a group of Palestinian villages near the West Bank city of Qalqilyah whose residents were cut off from relatives, mosques and social services in larger Arab towns after being closed inside an Israeli enclave created to protect the Jewish settlement of Alfei Menashe.

"The enclave creates a chokehold around the villages. It seriously damages the entire fabric of life," wrote Israeli Chief Justice Aharon Barak in the 66-page decision. "Based upon the factual basis as presented to us, the existing route of the fence seems strange ... We are by no means persuaded that there is a decisive security-military reason for setting the fence route where it presently is."

Israel's defense ministry now must consider alternatives to the path that separates about 1,200 Palestinians in five small villages from the rest of the West Bank. According to the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which brought the petition on behalf of the Palestinian villages of Wadi a-Rasha and Ras a-Tira, at least four more legal challenges to the fence's route in other areas are making their way to the Israeli Supreme Court.

The first third of the fence already has been completed around the northern hub of the West Bank, and another 100 miles are being built. The government shifted the planned path of the fence earlier this year after a June 2004 Supreme Court ruling forced the government to reconsider blueprints for a fence route in between the village of Beit Surik and the Jerusalem suburb of Mevasseret Tziyon.

The decision yesterday marks the first time the court has instructed the government to tear down a part of the fence that already has been built.

Dana Alexander, the head of the legal department of Association for Civil Rights in Israel, said the decision marks an important precedent.

DOJ_NMG_0006167

"The court ordered the government to dismantle the existing fence," she said. "That means all the existing parts of the fence can be submitted to judicial review, and if they are found to violate Palestinian rights unjustifiably, the state can be ordered to dismantle the fence."

Sharon Tells U.N. It's Time For Palestinian Peace Steps (NYT)

By JOEL BRINKLEY

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 - Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel spoke Thursday to the General Assembly, a body he has long considered a tool of the enemy, and challenged the Palestinians to demonstrate their commitment to peace now that Israel has completed its withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

"The State of Israel proved that it is willing to make painful concessions in order to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians," he said, his tone confident and firm. "I call on the Palestinian leadership to show determination and leadership and to eliminate terror, violence and the culture of hatred from our relations."

The audience reaction was polite, as is the custom here, but even that might have been more than Mr. Sharon would have expected in the past.

Through several decades in public life, Mr. Sharon had never before spoken to the United Nations. Just a few months ago it might have seemed unthinkable that he would stand before the world forum that has tried to pass countless resolutions criticizing Israel and precious few aimed at the Palestinians, in the Israeli view.

But this week, he said, numerous world leaders, including some from Islamic nations, have approached him in the halls of the United Nations building, asking to shake his hand and congratulating him on Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. Mr. Sharon, in an interview later, said he was pleased by that reception, though he declined to name the other leaders.

Nonetheless, in his address, Mr. Sharon could not help but refer to Israel's sorry history with the United Nations.

He said Israelis had not forgotten "dozens of harsh and unjust decisions made by the United Nations over the years." Referring to Iran, he added: "We know that, even today, there are those who sit here as representatives of a country whose leadership calls to wipe Israel off the face of the earth. And no one speaks out."

In the speech and in the interview, he described the decision to withdraw from Gaza as painful - "very hard, very hard and complicated."

But to the United Nations, he insisted, "Now it is the Palestinians' turn to prove the desire for peace."

While Mr. Sharon's speech was more conciliatory toward the Palestinians than is his custom, he said little to suggest that Israel planned any more conciliatory moves toward the Palestinians right now, though he did say that following a path toward peace was "my calling and primary mission for coming years."

His remarks brought criticism from some of his right-wing opponents in Israel. Furthermore, unless Mr. Sharon announces new concessions to coincide with any serious actions toward peace that the Palestinians may take, he could find himself in conflict with the Bush administration.

In recent weeks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said several times that she expects Israel and the Palestinians to take simultaneous steps toward peace in the months ahead.

Israel, she said in an interview last month, should withdraw from more West Bank cities and loosen roadblocks and checkpoints that restrict Palestinian travel, while Palestinian authorities should disarm Hamas and other Palestinian factions intent on continuing the uprising and should work to govern Gaza responsibly.

In the interview, Mr. Sharon's voice turned hard as he said: "The focus should be on Gaza now. It is the time now for the Palestinians to take steps to show they can rule. We left Gaza. We are not there. They will be tested now. Can they run a country? Can they stop the violence?"

Mr. Sharon did reiterate that Israel "is committed to the road map," referring to the peace plan that the United States and its allies proposed in 2003, "and the Sharm el Sheik understandings" early this year. At Sharm el Sheik, an Egyptian city on the Red Sea, Israel agreed to release some Palestinian prisoners and to withdraw from five West Bank cities.

In his speech, Mr. Sharon made no obvious effort to tailor his remarks to curry favor with the other leaders meeting at the United Nations this week. He did not back away from positions that many here oppose. He opened his address by noting, "I arrived here from Jerusalem, the capital of the Jewish people for over 3,000 years, and the undivided and eternal capital of the State of Israel."

Palestinians hope to establish the capital of their state in part of Jerusalem, and many nations represented here are sympathetic to that goal.

Nasser al-Kidwa, the Palestinian Authority's foreign minister, sat silently through the speech and at its end folded his arms and did not join in the applause. Later, Mr. Sharon offered a long and impassioned defense of Israel's security fence, which surrounds much of the West Bank and in many places cuts into it. Israel's high court ruled Thursday that Israel must reroute part of it.

"We will continue to build it until it is completed," he said, "as would any other country defending its citizens."

But in the end the prime minister returned to the difficulties that have prevented him from appearing here before now.

"I hope," he said to the General Assembly, "that the comprehensive reforms that the United Nations is undergoing in its 60th anniversary year will include a fundamental change and improvement in the approach of the United Nations, its organizations and institutions, toward the State of Israel."

Later, he said: "It was important for people to hear it. It was important that I say it clearly."

U.S. Renews Push On China's Yuan (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration is turning up the heat on Beijing to allow the Chinese yuan to rise against the dollar, reigniting an economic dispute that had appeared settled.

Treasury Department officials are disappointed that China's eight-week-old promise to let the yuan move with market forces has resulted in only a tiny increase in its exchange value. They warn that Beijing is courting a backlash from U.S. lawmakers who say China's undervalued currency is robbing American companies of business and American workers of jobs.

Treasury Secretary John Snow has invited the Chinese finance minister, Jin Renqing, to meet during a gathering in Washington on Sept. 23-24 of senior economic officials from the Group of Seven major industrialized nations. The Chinese have indicated they plan to attend, but haven't yet formally accepted.

"The secretary will emphasize the need for the Chinese to demonstrate that the regime they've put in place will allow for greater flexibility in the yuan," said a Treasury official. In essence, Mr. Snow plans to tell the Chinese that it's not enough to say that the yuan can rise; they must also allow it to do so in a significant way.

"There has to be movement," the official said, although the administration doesn't have a specific percentage figure in mind.

The yuan had been fixed at about 8.3 to the dollar for more than a decade when Chinese officials, facing intense U.S. and European pressure, announced on July 21 that the currency would be immediately revalued by 2.1% and allowed to move in a way that would reflect the dictates of supply and demand. Since then, however, the yuan has barely budged and the currency has climbed a total of just 2.37% since the announcement.

In public, Treasury officials diplomatically say they understand the Chinese need time to implement the new system. "We have been very supportive of the reforming of the exchange-rate regime, but implied in that support is taking them at their word that over time they'll achieve greater flexibility and an exchange rate that increasingly reflects underlying supply and demand," Timothy Adams, Treasury's undersecretary for international affairs, said in an interview. "We expect that to occur."

Congressional actions -- both past and prospective -- leave little time for patience. The Treasury Department is due to release on Oct. 15 a biannual report to Congress on international currencies, and Mr. Snow promised months ago that unless China implemented significant reforms the fall report would "likely" cite China for manipulating its currency to gain an edge in international trade. That would trigger a legal requirement that the U.S. initiate formal negotiations with China over the currency question.

Mr. Snow is scheduled to travel to China in mid-October, and Treasury is likely to delay release of the report until after his return, Mr. Adams said.

The renewal of the confrontation comes at a time of tension in a spectrum of U.S.-China issues, from textile trade to copyright piracy to Chinese bids for American companies. In a meeting in New York this week, Chinese President Hu Jintao told President Bush that he would address U.S. concerns about its $162 billion trade deficit with China and about Chinese intellectual-property violations, according to Mike Green, the White House China expert.

Mr. Bush, who plans to visit China in November, also raised with Mr. Hu concerns about the yuan. "It's in China's long-term economic interests and the world's economic interest for China to make further moves toward a flexible and market-oriented exchange rate," Mr. Green told reporters after the two leaders met.

While monetary authorities rarely announce currency moves in advance, the Chinese appear to be signaling that they don't plan another revaluation soon. Yu Yongding, a member of the monetary policy-making committee of the People's Bank of China, told Dow Jones Newswires recently that the Chinese authorities "need another, say, four or five months" to evaluate the new currency regime before making any big moves.

"I don't know if there will be further revaluation in the short term," said Mr. Yu. "The authorities need time to observe the effect of the small revaluation on economic growth that itself is in the process of changing even without the revaluation."

Many U.S. manufacturers, represented by groups like the National Association of Manufacturers, are pressing their representatives in Washington to take stronger action against China. "We are very disappointed in the way the Chinese have actually put their new regime to use," said Frank Vargo, NAM's vice president for international economic affairs. "It looks a lot like the old regime, except 2% up, which is trivial."

At least two anti-China bills are looming in Congress. One, sponsored by Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) would impose a 27.5% tariff on all Chinese goods entering the U.S. to counterbalance the allegedly unfair advantage the yuan's weakness gives Chinese companies over their U.S. competitors.

The administration opposes that bill as far too sweeping a punishment, and after talks with Mr. Snow and Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan this summer, the sponsors agreed to hold that bill back in anticipation of what turned out to be China's July 21 announcement of its new approach to the yuan. The bill is likely to resurface, however, particularly if Sens. Schumer and Graham feel the administration isn't being tough enough on China, by, for example, failing to brand China a currency manipulator in the October report.

A separate bill, already passed by the House and awaiting action in the Senate, would allow the Commerce Department to impose import duties against Chinese goods to counter the effects of government subsidies to Chinese firms.

"Protectionist pressures are really there," said the Treasury official. "Aside from something Katrina-related, there would be no more popular bill on the Hill right now than something protectionist aimed at China."

The Chinese authorities "have to recognize that," the official said.

EU Trade Chief Dismisses Bush Trade Claim (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Peter Mandelson, European Union trade commissioner, on Thursday accused President George W. Bush of “playing to the gallery” by calling for the global elimination of tariffs and subsidies, saying US farmers would oppose such a sweeping measure.

Mr Mandelson's comments came just one day after he and his counterpart Rob Portman, US trade representative, launched the most serious effort yet to agree on an agricultural liberalisation package as part of the Doha Round of global trade talks.

Mr Bush, speaking at the United Nations on Wednesday, said the US was “ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to the free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same”.

DOJ_NMG_0006170

US officials said the president's statement was intended only to reaffirm his strong commitment to a successful outcome of the Doha talks, which are entering a critical period in the run-up to a December meeting of trade ministers from 146 nations in Hong Kong.

But Mr Mandelson, in an interview with BBC radio, said that, while he welcomed such ambition, "it is easy to make these grandiose commitments.

"Some will say he is playing to the gallery, and some will say that he is making these sort of lavish promises in the almost certain knowledge that the rest of the world cannot or won't follow suit and therefore he will get a free pass."

He added: "There will be very, very many American farmers who will be waking up to hear his words and choking on their cornflakes."

The issue of agricultural tariffs and subsidies remains the most divisive one in the Doha talks. Mr Portman, in an interview on Wednesday with the FT, said he and Mr Mandelson were "working in a constructive way" to bridge their gaps. For instance, the two are negotiating over specific numbers for reducing tariffs on agricultural imports, rather than simply arguing over general principles.

"We were at loggerheads and now we're at the point where we're talking and talking specifics," he said.

But Mr Mandelson's comments underscored how difficult those talks will be. The EU is insisting on maintaining high tariffs for a range of sensitive products, while Mr Portman said US farmers would support only a deal that promised substantial new market access and strictly limited the number of products excluded from deep tariff cuts.

Tony Blair, the UK prime minister who holds the EU presidency, said in a speech at the UN that he would do everything possible to avoid failure at the Hong Kong ministerial. "I am not prepared to have that at least, not without the most monumental struggle," he said.

He said that too many countries were bluffing in the negotiations. "We need to start calling those bluffs and make people understand that if we do end up with failure that will echo right around the world." Pascal Lamy, director-general of the World Trade Organisation, also said yesterday he would use a "hands-on" approach to try to prevent failure at Hong Kong. Earlier this week when he said a transatlantic rapprochement on agriculture was "urgent" for the rest of the negotiations to make progress.

"That sort of finger-pointing must be done carefully," he said. "It's a bit of a risk but I came [to the WTO] with a bit of capital, a bit of trust, from the members and I think I have to spend it."

US Says Venezuela Fails To Combat Drug Trafficking (FT)

By Andy Webb-vidal

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

The US on Thursday struck Venezuela off its list of countries deemed to be co-operating in the war on drugs, injecting a new source of tension into deteriorating relations between Washington and Caracas.

In a statement released by the White House, President George W. Bush said Venezuela, as well as Burma, had "failed demonstrably" to adhere to their international counternarcotics obligations during the past year.

Venezuela's "decertification", as the measure is called, had been expected in the wake of a decision by President Hugo Chávez last month to suspend a co-operation agreement with the US Drug Enforcement Administration. While Mr Chávez has accused the DEA's officials of "spying", US officials have alleged elements within the Venezuelan authorities have become complicit with drugs-trafficking groups.

As much as a third of the cocaine smuggled from Colombia, the world's top producer, to the US and Europe passes through Venezuela, drugs experts calculate - a volume equivalent to about 165 tonnes.

Jose Vicente Rangel, vice-president, said Venezuela was unruffled by the decision. "We could also propose the decertification of the United States in its war against drugs-trafficking," he said.

Despite the decertification, unusually the Bush administration has decided to continue some assistance, much of which is likely to be aimed at opposition-linked civil groups.

DOJ_NMG_0006171

John Walters, director of US National Drug Control Policy, said: “While Venezuela will be subject to sanctions, the president determined it is in the vital national interests of the US to continue selected US assistance.”

It is possible selective sanctions might include an obligation on the US to vote against advancing loans to Venezuela in multinational lending agencies, such as the Inter-American Development Bank. But in practice some observers had suggested that economic sanctions on Venezuela as a result of decertification would have come to less than $1m, a negligible amount for oil-rich Venezuela.

Venezuela continues to maintain bilateral counter-narcotics agreements with the principal countries of Europe.

Merkel Tries To Retune Her Economic Message (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

FRANKFURT -- Just days before Sunday's German election, front-runner Angela Merkel is struggling to retune her message on the economy, which is supposed to be her strongest issue but has been weakening her lead in the polls.

Ms. Merkel's center-right coalition is still firmly ahead of rivals but polling just short of an absolute majority in Parliament. Calling on her supporters to give her an outright victory and a mandate for economic change, Ms. Merkel shuffled economic advisers and attempted to refocus attention on Germany's high unemployment and low growth under incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

German media have focused on her tax adviser, Paul Kirchhof, whose belief in flat-rate income taxes Mr. Schroeder has criticized heavily. Under pressure from within her own Christian Democrats party, Ms. Merkel has reduced Mr. Kirchhof's importance by inviting the party's most popular finance expert, Friedrich Merz, into the campaign. Mr. Merz fell out with Ms. Merkel last year.

"Given the condition of our country we need everybody who can help," Ms. Merkel said on Wednesday when accepting Mr. Merz back into the fold. In recent weeks Ms. Merkel has struggled to explain to voters that her legislative program wouldn't go as far as Mr. Kirchhof's radical ideas.

Pollsters say most voters view Mr. Kirchhof's advocacy of a 25% flat tax on all incomes as unfair on lower earners. Ms. Merkel hasn't endorsed a flat tax, but Mr. Schroeder's attacks on it, along with his personal popularity, have helped his party narrow the Christian Democrats' once-huge lead to about eight points. Mr. Kirchhof on Tuesday acknowledged the storm by saying he should play a "tandem" role with Mr. Merz.

"The Kirchhof debate has spread a strong uncertainty among the population about what would happen. Many voters fear the cutbacks to the welfare state could be deeper than expected," said Josef Esser, political-science professor at Frankfurt University.

While voters think the Social Democrats are stronger on protecting the less affluent, they give Ms. Merkel more credit for competence on cutting unemployment, boosting economic growth and balancing public finances, according to polling institute TNS Emnid.

Mr. Schroeder has been playing up themes other than unemployment, reminding voters that he firmly opposed the war in Iraq while Ms. Merkel was more accommodating of the U.S. position.

Underlining the German election's impact across Europe, EU competition commissioner Neelie Kroes caused a stir in Brussels on Thursday by endorsing Ms. Merkel, saying a female chancellor of Germany would be "a gift for Europe."

Members of the European Union's executive arm normally don't endorse candidates in national elections. Leftwingers in the European Parliament attacked Ms. Kroes, but conservatives backed her.

Mr. Schroeder's recovery appeared to level off this week among voters who expressed a preference. Germany's electoral system awards extra seats to the main parties when minor parties don't reach a 5% support threshold, and when their strength is concentrated within regions. Both factors could help give Ms. Merkel's party a clear majority.

The Front-Runner in Germany Runs Scared (NYT)

By MARK LANDLER

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

MAINZ, Germany, Sept. 15 - Three days before an election that has become unexpectedly suspenseful, Angela Merkel turned up on Thursday in this ancient city on the Rhine with a blunt message: Chancellor Gerhard Schröder has failed, and his government ought to be thrown out.

"A person who doesn't have the support of his own party can't put Germany on the right path," said Mrs. Merkel, who, as leader of the opposition Christian Democratic Union, is poised to achieve two firsts: the first woman to become German chancellor and the first former East German to lead the reunified country.

"He promised they would reduce unemployment by two million," Mrs. Merkel declared, recalling a target that Mr. Schröder set before his second term. "Instead it grew. That's the truth."

Her audience of several hundred cheered often, if not quite passionately. Orange placards with the name "Angie" bobbed above the crowd, as the afternoon sun dipped behind Mainz's red-stone cathedral.

Mrs. Merkel is not a feel-good politician. Her stump speeches are lengthy, serious and larded with details. She rarely smiles, and responds to hecklers with a curt tone. She does not look like an Angie.

Yet Mrs. Merkel's sense of grim purpose may suit the moment. After spending four months with a seemingly unassailable lead in the polls, she finds herself in a dogfight with Mr. Schröder.

Mrs. Merkel, 51, is still likely to become chancellor after the vote on Sunday. But her preferred coalition, with the Free Democratic Party, has been falling just short of a majority in the most recent polls. She may have to settle for leading a so-called grand coalition of her Christian Democratic Union and Mr. Schröder's Social Democratic Party.

Given the aura of political invincibility that has enveloped Mrs. Merkel since a weakened Mr. Schröder called for elections in May, that would be seen almost as a defeat.

The campaign has been bumpy for Mrs. Merkel, with a few missteps by her and more blatant gaffes by some of her allies. But what has made the real difference, political analysts say, has been a nimble performance by Mr. Schröder down the stretch.

He has achieved a sort of role reversal, putting Mrs. Merkel on the defensive for her proposals, while largely avoiding any discussion of his own government's record. "For months, the C.D.U. has been seen as representing a new government," said Gerd Langguth, the author of a biography of Mrs. Merkel. "Everybody is asking, 'What would Merkel do,' not, 'What has Schröder done?' "

Mrs. Merkel has played into that strategy, with her penchant for offering detailed policy prescriptions. On Thursday, as she began an explanation of how her party's tax proposals would affect people in various income brackets, people began drifting away from the rally.

"We're telling you before the election what we will do after the election," she said. "We don't want people to be afraid, so that's why we're telling you in clear terms what we plan to do."

In his speeches, Mr. Schröder sticks to generalities about his efforts, while cheerfully ripping into Mrs. Merkel's proposals.

The Christian Democrats have given the chancellor some easy targets, starting with a plan to raise the value-added tax to 18 percent, from 16 percent. Mrs. Merkel said it was needed to plug Germany's ballooning budget deficit; Mr. Schröder said it would hurt lower-income people.

Then Mrs. Merkel appointed Paul Kirchhof, an academic who advocates a flat tax, as her economic adviser. She was initially praised for her boldness, but she has been forced to defend Mr. Kirchhof, to whom the chancellor derisively refers as "the professor from Heidelberg."

This week, under pressure from party leaders, she welcomed back Friedrich Merz, a party authority on budget matters, who had resigned his post last year after a clash with Mrs. Merkel.

Although she has a remarkable personal story - the shy daughter of a Lutheran minister in East Germany who rose to the top of a male-dominated West German party - Mrs. Merkel rarely invokes it.

To her supporters in the crowd in this historical German town, however, Mrs. Merkel's shortcomings as a candidate are less important than her message.

"She has so much courage," said Hanna Kaltenbach, 58. "Schröder is a media star, but he is shallow."

Andreas Baldauf, 22, a business student at the University of Mannheim, said: "Gerhard Schröder had seven years to fix the situation, and he didn't. It's time to give Angie a chance."

As Mrs. Merkel left the stage, "Angie," the 1970's song by the Rolling Stones, warbled from loudspeakers. It has become the theme song of her campaign, and the crowd did not seem bothered to hear Mick Jagger sing, "All the dreams we held so close seemed to all go up in smoke."

Germans Haven't Forgotten Schroeder's Unfulfilled Pledge (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BREMEN, Germany -- When he took office seven years ago, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder made a big promise he didn't keep.

"My most important job is the fight against the scourge of unemployment," he declared in his victory speech after winning the 1998 election. During the campaign, he told Germany's 4 million jobless that he would slash unemployment. Voters should kick him out of office if he failed, he added later.

Today, Germany's jobless rate is worse than ever; the number of people out of work hit a post-World War II high this year. German voters haven't forgotten Schroeder's pledge, and polls suggest they are ready to depose him in Sunday's national elections.

Angela Merkel, the candidate of the Christian Democrats who wants Schroeder's job, and her allies have been relentless in their reminders. "You have spent seven years making empty promises," she said in Parliament last week, telling lawmakers that Schroeder was "a man who has had his chance."

The criticism rings familiar to Schroeder, 61, who defeated longtime German leader Helmut Kohl by harping on the same thing. He called Kohl "the chancellor of unemployment" and ripped him for not having done more to invigorate the economy.

Germany exports more goods than any other country and has the world's third-largest economy. But it has been dogged by high jobless rates and weak economic growth for the better part of two decades. An aging workforce, generous social welfare programs and a cultural resistance to change have stymied efforts by a succession of governments to fix the economic problems.

Schroeder's Social Democrats and their partner in government, the Greens party, were hobbled by large deficits stemming from the huge public investment to unify the country after the Berlin Wall collapsed. The coalition did trim social benefits and cut some taxes to encourage companies to hire more workers, but the strategy has not panned out. Many of Germany's biggest industrial companies remain profitable, but have shifted jobs to Eastern Europe and other regions where it is cheaper to operate.

"He really thought that curbing costs would improve the situation and reduce unemployment -- he really believed that," said Michael Vester, a professor at the University of Hannover, in Schroeder's home town. "But this was an error. It didn't work."

In addition to the worsening job climate, average personal incomes have stagnated on Schroeder's watch. That, in turn, has caused Germans to consume less, hurting economic growth.

Things got so bad that Schroeder decided in May to call new elections a year early. With many lawmakers in his own party abandoning him, he said German voters needed to decide whether the country should continue his policies. In public, he looked tired and beaten. Some analysts suggested that he had lost his enthusiasm for the job.

Since then, Schroeder has recovered some of his zest on the campaign trail. His coalition, known as "red-green" for the colors of its two parties, has gained in the polls by predicting that Merkel's Christian Democrats will shred Germany's social safety net and cut taxes for the rich. But he's offered few new ideas, and polls indicate he faces long odds to win another term.

At a rally in Bremen, a river port in northern Germany, about 4,000 people turned out in a drizzle Wednesday to hear Schroeder defend his record. He seemed to draw energy from the crowd as he pumped his fists in the air and thundered into the microphone.

He talked about climate change, the war in Iraq, health care, social justice, relations with Russia and automobile fuel standards. But he didn't say much about jobs or make any more promises. When he did talk about the economy, he accused the media of ignoring the good news, pointing to a World Bank study that ranked Germany fifth in business innovation.

"I am proud of this, I am proud of this!" Schroeder said. He acknowledged that more economic changes were necessary, but didn't go into detail. "They will be done -- by us -- so that the social justice in this country remains intact."

Several voters at the party-sponsored event said they would vote for Schroeder and the Social Democrats, but only reluctantly.

Bruno Schroeder, 54, a former financial adviser, said he would support the chancellor (who is no relation), mostly because he disliked Merkel more. He said he usually votes for the Social Democrats, but complained that Schroeder's performance "could have been better."

"He needed to do a better job showing the country the direction in which we need to go," he added.

Thorben Harleng, 26, a student, was also unenthusiastic. When asked what Schroeder needed to focus on, Harleng responded simply: "Jobs." But he said he would vote to reelect the chancellor, calling him a better choice than Merkel. "I don't think she could have done any better," he said.

That Schroeder has made the race close is a testament to his political skills. Though the polls show that Germans favor the Christian Democrats over the Social Democrats, on a personal level, Schroeder tops Merkel, who tends to be reserved and dour, in voter popularity. They think he outshined her last week in a one-on-one debate.

"What is Schroeder's trick in having the contour of 5 million unemployed people disappear in a campaign puff of smoke?" the Frankfurter Allgemeine newspaper said in an editorial this week. "It is the work of a great political illusionist."

Clinton Gathers World Leaders (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 15 -- The U.N. General Assembly may have failed this week to come up with a stirring plan to combat the world's ills. But there was former president Bill Clinton -- once said to have harbored an ambition to become secretary general -- assembling his own mini-General Assembly of presidents, prime ministers, kings and other pooh-bahs on Thursday to devise specific plans for addressing poverty, global warming, religious conflict and better governance.

The inaugural meeting of what he has dubbed the Clinton Global Initiative will stretch over three days of seminars and speeches, bringing together 800 movers and shakers who paid $15,000 each for a seat. If the opening session is any guidepost, the meetings resemble the gabfests at Davos, the annual global economic summit held in Switzerland, or the Renaissance Weekends that Clinton attended as president. But Clinton added a catch -- each of the attendees is required to commit to doing something to improve the world.

"This is more than a photo op, more than business as usual," Clinton said as he opened the session. "All of us come to meetings, we study issues, we say what we think, and too often we complain when the governments that we seek to influence ignore what we think is our sound advice."

So every person attending is required to make a commitment in writing. More than 50 commitments have been made, totaling more than $300 million. Clinton announced four specific commitments -- signed on the spot for the cameras -- which included a $100 million Africa investment fund and a plan to fight HIV-AIDS through micro-enterprise development. One commitment was made by the Clinton initiative itself -- a pledge that all of its activities would be "carbon neutral," promising to mitigate the effects of plane travel and conference preparation by financing renewable energy projects that replace fossil-fuel energy sources.

"What is happening here is the kind of intense dialogue between different people and cultures which should take place at the U.N. but can't anymore because of highly ritualistic structures, protocol and conflict avoidance," said Richard C. Holbrooke, a former U.N. ambassador under Clinton who made the HIV-AIDS commitment.

The initiative, which will take up three floors of a midtown hotel and promises as many motorcade tie-ups as the General Assembly, is the former president's most ambitious attempt to define his post-presidency. Along with the heads of state, former senior Clinton administration officials packed the hall Thursday afternoon.

Organizational mix-ups also gave the event a touch of Clinton nostalgia, as scores of delegates discovered that their credentials were not ready and the meeting began 20 minutes late because people ignored pleas to sit down.

DOJ_NMG_0006175

Clinton has strived to keep his project nonpartisan. He presided over an opening roundtable discussion that included King Abdullah of Jordan, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) participated in another panel.

Rice's attendance was noteworthy, coming after nearly 10 years of Republicans' often tough attacks on Bill Clinton's foreign policy. Her predecessor, Colin L. Powell, once told a friend that he had to cancel an appearance at an AIDS conference in Nigeria early in President Bush's first term after Clinton decided to attend. But Clinton and former president George H.W. Bush have worked closely together in the past year, raising money for victims of the Indian Ocean tsunami and Hurricane Katrina.

Clinton was clearly in his element during the roundtable discussion, as he moderated a broad-ranging and polite exchange between the young king, the seasoned British prime minister and the poised Republican secretary of state. He tossed around ideas -- such as an insurance fund for investors in the Gaza Strip -- and sprinkled a plethora of statistics and facts throughout his commentary. He steered clear of Iraq, the contentious issue that most consumes Jordan, Britain and the United States.

"I don't want to get too much in the weeds," Clinton said, but he bemoaned the expiration of something called the worldwide Multi-Fiber Arrangement , which he said hurt African nations. Lesotho, "with the third-highest AIDS rate in the world, they had 2,000 jobs [before passage of Clinton's Africa free-trade agreement] and 50,000 after, and now have lost 15,000 jobs." What, he asked, should be done about this?

Neither Blair nor Rice rushed to answer Clinton's question.

At another point, Clinton said he had not been away from politics long enough to force them to answer whether high oil prices made their lives easier, a reference to the growing attractiveness of alternative energy sources.

Thomas F. McLarty III, former Clinton White House chief of staff, said the diverse gathering was a "picture worth a thousand words," but he was especially amused that Clinton had enlisted former aide George Stephanopoulos to make a presentation. Stephanopoulos, now anchor of the ABC News program "This Week," earned Clinton's ire by writing a tell-all book. Clinton will appear on "This Week" on Sunday to promote his initiative.

This Conference Will Not Be Like So Many Before It (FT)

By Bill Clinton

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Sixty years ago, the San Francisco Conference launched the United Nations, even before the second world war had ended. Ten years ago, after terrible bloodshed in the Balkans, the Dayton proximity talks brought long-overdue peace to Bosnia. I hope that future historians will also think of 2005 as another step forward in the not-very-advanced -science of conference-making.

This week, the inaugural Clinton Global Initiative (CGI), a three-day programme, is taking place in New York. More than 40 heads of state are joining me and a large number of participants from a broad swath of civil society: non-governmental organisation activists, legislators, policy experts, business leaders, journalists and writers from every continent. This will be a different kind of conference. At this conference, the activists will have access to the presidents and vice versa. And we will do a lot more than talk. International conferences always sound ambitious, but are rarely places where searching questions are answered. Too often, these sessions are glorified photo opportunities. Then it is business as usual the next day. That is simply not good enough. We need action.

That is exactly what we will try to get at CGI to address four critical challenges: poverty, religious strife, climate change and governance. All difficult – but all solvable. This conference is different because it asks everyone who attends to make a concrete commitment of one kind or another – a cash pledge, or a promise of service or some kind of specific executable plan.

As the conference begins, we have already received some important commitments, including a $100m (£55m) pledge from the Hunter Foundation to support holistic approaches for development; a study by McKinsey, Oxfam and Tufts University on the private sector's role in disaster response; and a public -education campaign to increase -awareness of the UN Millennium -Development Goals led by Bob Rubin and Don Evans.

As the world moves rapidly and -inexorably towards being more and more interconnected, I think a more open conversation between the world's "haves" and "have-nots" will benefit both. We need to move forward together.

To do so, we must answer some hard, troubling questions. Why is capitalism so robust in some places and failing in others? Why are countries rich in -mineral resources often so poor in -democratic resources? How can we stimulate economies in developing nations and contain environmental damage at the same time? What simple legal and political steps can we take to harness the tremendous energies of the world's billions of poor? When we have some answers, we have to act on them to make change.

I do not claim for a second that this initiative will solve all of these -extraordinarily tough questions, but one thing is clear – the vast majority of us, from all religions and races, all political views, all walks of life, want a better world. There is more that unites us than separates us.

Getting all hese people in one place to focus on these critical problems with a commitment to what each of us can really do to change them is an important first step, and this week it is a step that hundreds of us – activists, presidents and chief executives from every political party and religious affiliation – are taking together.

Fox Promises Electoral Order In 2006 (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

The past five years have been tough political sledding for Mexican President Vicente Fox, the first non-Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) president in 70 years. But his sixth and final year in the job may yet prove the most challenging.

The reason is the looming July 2006 presidential elections. Election year instability in Mexico was avoided in 2000 but over time it has tended to be the rule rather than the exception. In an interview Wednesday at the Mexican Mission to the United Nations in New York, Mr. Fox emphasized the country's established 10-year record of fiscal stability and political reform that he predicts will guarantee a smooth transition of power.

His facts are straight. But still, there is the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD) and its candidate, Mexico City mayor and leftist firebrand Andres Manuel López Obrador, to worry about. This hard-charging, demagogic socialist with overt authoritarian instincts conceivably could win. Equally worrying are the stunts he might pull if he loses. He has a record of fomenting street violence when he doesn't get his way.

In an otherwise tame environment Mr. López Obrador might not seem so menacing. But his appearance on the national scene comes at a time when there is a frightening rise in organized crime -- a consequence of fierce competition among armed gangs to fill U.S. demand for illicit drugs -- in parts of Mexico, particularly along the U.S. border. Another factor is the weakness of the Mexican economy, largely because government policies haven't responded to the pressures of global competition. Modernizers view these failings with dismay. Mr. López Obrador sees them as an opportunity for populist rebellion.

Mr. Fox's sanguine view comes in large part from his confidence in the Federal Electoral Institute (IFE) and the tribunal that watches over it. The nation, the president assured me, has "not only reached full democracy, full liberty of expression, communication and information" but also has developed the "democratic, strong institutions" necessary for a successful election. Mexico, Mr. Fox asserted, has secured these gains over the past decade under the governance of two different political parties.

In 2000 the IFE acted impressively, ensuring fairness and transparency despite pressure from the PRI to preserve the status quo. Mr. Fox's predecessor, Ernesto Zedillo, earned high marks for his commitment to an independent IFE even though it led to a victory of the National Action Party (PAN) and Mr. Fox. Now Mr. Fox is pledging to be equally impartial, recognizing that Mexico's next six years will depend heavily on confidence in the rule of law. "I don't have any doubts that the process will go as it should be expected to go," he told me.

That Mexicans yearn for a continuation of the transparent, rule-based electoral process that IFE managed in 2000 is undoubtedly true. But that doesn't mean that "AMLO" will cooperate. Mexicans recall what happened when Mr. López Obrador lost the Tabasco governor's race in 1994 by a wide margin to PRIsta Roberto Madrazo. Deciding that his loss was due to Mr.

Madrazo's exuberant spending, he led a blockade of oil wells. His supporters also organized a massive sit-in, camping out in tents in the Tabasco capital city's main square. Mr. López Obrador called it peaceful civil disobedience but as downtown Villahermosa began to smell like a bear pit, his opponents decided to strike back. Violence erupted before the whole thing was finally put to rest.

A year later, Mr. López Obrador led another, more serious, blockade of government-owned oil operations in Tabasco. It lasted 19 days, covered 60 wells and cost millions in lost output. In Mexico City, corruption scandals have plagued his government, but he counters by painting himself as a downtrodden outsider pledging to uproot the status quo. In truth, he most resembles the career politicians whose machine kept the PRI in power for so long, except that he has a stronger-than-average instinct for the jugular. With the vote still 10 months off, AMLO is already signaling to his machine bureaucracy in Mexico City that he believes the IFE is against him and that he's prepared to make a stink if he loses in a close race.

When I asked Mr. Fox about candidates who might not respect the rule of law, he told me he didn't want to get into names of individuals or parties. But he did say that he believes Mexico has learned from the past through pain and that Mexicans know that returning to authoritarianism, corruption, impunity, populism or demagoguery are dead ends. There is "no way back to the paternalism of controlling the poor through government programs," he said, and Mexicans know that. They are for "stability, the rule of law, discipline and order in public finance and against indebting the country."

In other words, the president believes Mexicans will reject the left-wing populism of Mr. López Obrador and vote instead for a continuation of his government's fiscal stability. Yet he may be underestimating the discontent generated by a sluggish economy, a factor that could produce a tight race.

Even if a pragmatic PRI candidate like Roberto Madrazo or a more long-shot candidate like the PAN's Felipe Calderon were to win, there is the question of AMLO's regard for the rule of law. Referring to what happened in Tabasco, Mr. Fox said, "That situation will not repeat itself in Mexico today because the system has proven for 10 years in a row that elections are respected."

Mr. Fox's commitment to the process is important. But enforcing the rule of law will take more. On security, he points out that his government has pacified Chiapas, modestly reduced crime and turned back the surge in kidnapping. And he remains convinced that the organized crime due to drug trafficking can be handled providing the U.S. makes it a joint effort.

Still the odds have to be in favor of the underworld, given the demand for narcotics across the border. Mexico has already admitted that law enforcement has been seriously corrupted by drug traffickers at some levels and the problem is not likely to go away. That won't help when it comes to dealing with any political instability that arises during an election year. Forewarned is forearmed and that's something not only for Mr. Fox to think about but also for his neighbors to the north to keep in mind.

Another U.N. Charade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

The United Nations world summit that has clogged Manhattan traffic arteries for the past three days has a way of clogging minds as well. So let's think carefully about exactly what, other than a commuter's nightmare, this latest exercise in global diplomacy has achieved.

On the plus side, the summit seems to have done no real harm: It has not further extended the authority and reach of the U.N., it has not foisted another "protocol" or "convention" for the Senate to consider, and it has not established another significant seven-letter acronym -- er, agency -- for U.S. taxpayers to pronounce, and especially to fund.

That may be a negative accomplishment, but it is certainly a real one, especially as Secretary General Kofi Annan had envisioned the summit as an opportunity to expand membership in the Security Council, expand his own powers and require rich countries to pony up additional billions in foreign aid, among other brainstorms. It took new U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton seven weeks of dogged negotiation to make sure none of that happened, and for this he deserves credit.

On the other hand, the diplomatic price the U.S. paid for a no-harm-done outcome was a no-reform result. It has not been 10 days since Paul Volcker delivered the devastating conclusions of his 847-page Oil for Food inquiry and his call for the complete overhaul of U.N. management practices. Yet already his report is being treated as a historical artifact of no particular relevance. In the U.N.'s strange universe, it's as if Oil for Food never even happened.

For example, the so-called Outcome Document to which world leaders agreed at the summit specifically "[commended] the Secretary General's previous and ongoing efforts to enhance the effective management of the United Nations." Yet Mr. Volcker's report found, among other things, that Mr. Annan and his staff knew of Saddam Hussein's kickback schemes in Oil for Food but never reported the problem, much less took steps to address it. If this is what the international community thinks is commendable behavior, imagine what sorts of management standards it believes are merely tolerable.

Equally unhelpful have been some of the comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who recently gushed to the New York Times that "I've never had a better relationship with anyone than I've had with Kofi Annan."

Assuming (we hope) that Ms. Rice is being insincere, her calculation seems to be that American diplomatic capital should not be spent seeking Mr. Annan's departure, and that U.S. interests at the U.N. are best served by a politically wounded, and thus presumably beholden, Secretary General. She might want to rethink that assumption in light of some of Mr. Annan's recent comments, such as blaming "spoilers" and "governments that were not willing to make concessions" for the failure of the summit. Chief among the governments not willing to "make concessions" was the United States, an implication lost on nobody.

The biggest loser here is the U.N. itself. We have never accepted the view -- increasingly common in some liberal precincts -- that America should conduct no foreign policy in the absence of U.N. benediction, much less that U.N. agencies and offices ought to take the lead role in maintaining international security and promoting economic development. But as long as the U.N. exists, we'd like to think that it can, in limited circumstances, be a useful instrument of U.S. foreign policy, provided the organization is politically credible and relatively effective. This was the original hope for Oil for Food; instead, it became the emblem of the U.N.'s incompetence and corruptibility.

What the outcome of this summit makes clear is that the U.N. patient will not heal itself. On the management side, the Volcker report vividly describes the organization's implacable resistance to reform, for reasons that are both cultural and institutional. Politically, Mr. Annan's original reform proposals were both overambitious and wrongheaded, and while their demise is nothing to be regretted, the fact that the member states could not agree to anything better casts doubt on the possibility that changes will be achieved through international negotiation.

We have a modest proposal of our own. The Bush Administration should insist that the U.N. bureaucracy be placed under a five-year trusteeship to implement the management reforms suggested by the Volcker report. The trustees should be a handful of real international worthies -- Mr. Volcker and his fellow commissioners Richard Goldstone of South Africa and Mark Pieth of Switzerland would fit the bill -- whose probity and good judgment are beyond dispute. The U.S. cannot dictate such terms to the U.N., but Congress has the power to withhold American funding until such a trusteeship is established. We hope it does so.

This is tough love, we know. But the people who should like this idea the most are those who claim to be fervent believers in the U.N. and its multilateral purposes. They can't possibly be proud of the spectacle on display at Turtle Bay during the past two weeks.

Jihad's Fresh Face (NYT)

By WALEED ZIAD

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

OF the many questions surrounding Egypt's presidential elections last week - Were opposition candidates unfairly removed from the ballot? Did the ruling party of President Hosni Mubarak cheat at the polls? - a more general query has gone largely unmentioned: Did this election, or the other recent democratic experiments in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere, really further American aims in the Muslim world?

The answer is troubling. The post- 9/11 prevailing wisdom has held that military force and exporting democracy are the West's twin weapons against terrorism. Islamic fundamentalism is the product of a "medieval" mindset, we are told, and if we can deliver elections to the Arab world, our enemies will cower before the spirit of the Enlightenment.

Yet the establishment of the first popularly elected governments in Iraqi and Afghan history has been followed by more suicide bombings and unabated violence. And nobody expects real change, in terms of political freedoms or human rights, any time soon in Saudi Arabia or Egypt. What are we missing?

While there is no doubt that elections are a worthy goal, we will not be able to change the Muslim world or dislodge the militancy until we gain a better understanding of the roots of the problem. While these conflicts are often painted as millennium-old, they are essentially modern phenomena, bred of postcolonial politics, social upheavals and territorial struggles.

And as we look at the causes of anti-Western jihadism, we tend to overlook one major contributing factor: the absence not just of democracy but also of grass-roots representative institutions like a free press and independent political, cultural and social-welfare institutions.

Today's jihadists - I call them "neo-fundamentalists," because they are a world apart from earlier fundamentalists - are not throwbacks to the crusades, nor are they, as President Bush unfortunately put it, just "a group of folks." They are a singular and recent byproduct of decades of oppressive rule.

Yes, the Muslim world had an unfortunate introduction to post-Enlightenment ideals, which came in the context of invasion, colonialism and exploitation. But the Arab philosophical and political movement that came out of that experience was not inherently anti-Western. In fact, in traditional Islamic thought the concept of violent resistance against an unjust ruler was virtually unheard of; for classical jurists, tyranny was preferable to the anarchy that accompanies revolt.

The first wave of modern Islamic fundamentalists, which crested primarily in Egypt in the late 19th century and included such figures as the Iranian-born reformer Jamal al-Din al-Afghani and his Egyptian disciple, Muhammad Abduh, opposed colonialism but saw no incompatibility between Islamic and Western philosophy, law or scientific method. These men called for political reform and the revival of free inquiry.

The big change did not occur until the middle of the 20th century. In states like Egypt, Iraq and Syria, colonial governments were replaced by military, Arab-nationalist, royalist or Soviet-sponsored socialist regimes. All deteriorated quickly into dictatorships, emracing the institutions of colonial subjugation.

A host of political parties and civic institutions were founded to challenge the autocrats; many combined Enlightenment concepts like public participation with Islamic ideals of popular consent and justice. Even Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood (founded in 1928) was not a militant revolutionary group; instead it promoted social-welfare programs, democracy and land reform on the Western model. When the mass movements became influential, however, they were answered not by reform but by persecution, ranging from the violent crackdown against the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt in the 1950's to the massacre of more than 10,000 dissidents by the dictator Hafez al-Assad in Hama, Syria, in 1982.

The story of Sayyid Qutb, the father of neo-fundamentalism, exemplifies what happened next. Qutb was an Egyptian teacher trained in the Western system. Contrary to the conventional wisdom, it was not his trip to America in 1948 that radicalized him. While he was shocked by some aspects of American culture, like women dancing in public, he returned to write about the importance of emulating the educational, economic and scientific achievements of the West.

BUT in the 1950's, he was jailed and tortured for speaking out against Gamal Abdel Nasser's autocracy, while scores of dissidents were executed. Only then did he decide that violence could be used against an unjust government. He spoke as a Muslim, but his rhetoric was grounded in Western-nationalist and leftist revolutionary principles. His call had great resonance, and thus was neo-fundamentalism born.

As persecution continued across the Arab world, the neo-fundamentalist rhetoric became more Manichean and xenophobic. With mainstream opponents silenced, ultraradicals became the loudest voices of dissent. In Egypt, for example, those who emerged from prison in the 1970's formed militant organizations, including Al Jihad, led by Ayman al-Zawahiri, who is now chief lieutenant for Osama bin Laden. These men were not thinkers or theologians; rather, many were disillusioned Westernized professionals, former leftists and nationalists.

This new wave of fundamentalism, unlike all the others before it in the Islamic tradition, is inherently anti-intellectual and reactive; it is more reminiscent of the anarchical movements of 19th-century Russia. This "Islamism" is nihilistic, expressing a lack of faith in all political systems, in history, and in all past social developments. The jihadists justify their actions by claiming that they are returning to "pure" Islamic sources to establish a "government of God." Of course, the paradox here is that the Koran does not lay down a mode of governance. What perhaps we in the United States do not understand is that in rejecting the status quo, these groups demonize not just the West, but mainstream Islamic culture and philosophy as well; they pose perhaps the greatest existential threat to 1,400 years of Islamic tradition.

So how does this history help us reverse the trend? It requires that we look at the jihadists not as an ancient foe, but as yet another contemporary terrorist group. Recent history - in northern India, Sri Lanka, Kurdish Turkey - has taught us that grassroots democracy and allowing the aggrieved group a public voice can be effective weapons against terrorism. A good strategy would be to support groups across the Muslim world, both secular and religious, that provide social services where the government falls short; they range from women's rights organizations like the Union for Feminine Action in Morocco to trade groups like the Lebanese Businessmen Association.

We must foster these organizations - along with a free press and educational and cultural institutions. At the same time, our corporations should guide local entrepreneurs to promote a free market, the backbone of democracy. If anything is going to come of the neoconservative hope of making Iraq into a beacon of our values, it will be along these lines.

It is vital, however, that we not be put off from helping organizations tied to Islam - faith-based parties calling for peaceful democratic reforms are emerging across the Muslim world as the main political opposition. They are the necessary counterweights to central governments, and without them, autocratic rule, and the neo-fundamentalism that it breeds, will remain the norm.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Little Progress In FBI Probe Of Anthrax Attacks (WP)

By Allan Lengel, Washington Post Staff Writer
The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

Four years after the deadly 2001 anthrax attacks, one of the most exhaustive investigations in FBI history has yielded no arrests and is showing signs of growing cold as officials have sharply reduced the number of agents on the case.

FBI agents and postal inspectors have pursued leads on four continents, conducted more than 8,000 interviews and carried out dozens of searches of houses, laboratories and other locations. They traveled to Afghanistan twice in the past 16 months to follow up on tips that proved fruitless, said law enforcement sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the issue.

Within law enforcement circles, some say the investigation, which is referred to as the Amerithrax probe, is in urgent need of a big break.

In the past year, the number of FBI agents on the case has dropped from 31 to 21, authorities said. During the same time, the number of postal inspectors has fallen from 13 to nine. The reward remains the same: $2.5 million for information leading to an arrest and conviction.

FBI officials said yesterday that investigators are still working diligently to find whoever was responsible for the anthrax-bacteria-laced mailings, which killed five people, sickened 17 others and led to the temporary shutdown of the House, Senate and Supreme Court buildings and numerous postal facilities. They said they are getting assistance from forensics experts and scientific researchers from law enforcement agencies, the intelligence community, university laboratories and private corporations.

"This globe-spanning investigation remains intensely active and broadly focused," said Debbie Weierman, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Washington field office. "The FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service remain steadfastly committed to the 22 victims of the attacks and to bring to justice those responsible."

The investigation has been so expansive that authorities now are in the process of taking inventory. The FBI and postal inspectors have spent months piecing together a voluminous internal report that will review the scope of the investigation and explore issues including what has been the prevailing theory: The culprit is a U.S. scientist who had access to the high-grade anthrax and the knowledge of how to physically manipulate it and use it as a weapon. That theory emerged early in the investigation and remains viable today, authorities said.

The report will include the names of various people deemed to be "persons of interest" over the years, as well as updates on the scientific tests. Authorities long ago narrowed down the type of anthrax to a strain called Ames but have been unable to identify the lab of origin. Much attention has focused on the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases, housed at Fort Detrick in the Frederick area.

Authorities hope that the report, which is to be completed soon and forwarded to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, will provide a concise road map of the probe and help determine its future direction.

Current and former law enforcement authorities said investigators and prosecutors often prepare such reports in complex, high-profile cases that go unresolved for years.

"It doesn't sound like they're close to cracking the case," said Eric H. Holder Jr., a Washington lawyer who was deputy attorney general during the Clinton administration.

The magnitude of the anthrax investigation has parallels to another marathon FBI probe: the 18-year search for the Unabomber, who killed three people and injured 23 others in mail-bomb attacks. Agents pored over 53,000 hotline tips, bomb parts and massive computer databases, but the breakthrough did not come until the Unabomber issued a public manifesto. The document led to the 1996 arrest of Theodore Kaczynski, whose brother recognized his thinking and tipped off the FBI.

The anthrax attacks took place just after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Spore-laden letters were mailed in pre-stamped envelopes in September and October of 2001 to the offices of then-Senate Democratic leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) as well as media outlets in Florida and New York.

Two District postal workers, a Florida photojournalist, a New York hospital worker and an elderly Connecticut woman died. At least 17 post offices and public office buildings were contaminated. Including cleanup costs, an FBI document put the damage in excess of $1 billion.

Over the years, officials have publicly identified only one "person of interest," and that was in August 2002: Steven J. Hatfill, a physician and bioterrorism expert who worked at Fort Detrick from 1997 to 1999. Hatfill, who has not been charged, has denied any involvement and filed a lawsuit against the Justice Department and then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft.

"He remains innocent today as he was four years ago," said Thomas G. Connolly, Hatfill's attorney. "They were getting enormous pressure, and a way to alleviate the pressure was to offer someone up, and that person happened to be Dr. Hatfill. That caused enormous harm to Dr. Hatfill. It didn't advance their investigation one iota."

Investigators have issued more than 5,000 subpoenas and conducted interviews and research throughout the United States as well as in Europe, Asia and Africa. Two years ago, the FBI spent about $250,000 and three weeks draining a pond in Frederick, acting on a theory that someone might have discarded materials there. The pond yielded nothing useful, authorities said.

In the past year, investigators have tried to follow up on and eliminate as many leads as possible. In case the matter ever goes to trial, they want to be able to counter any defense assertions that they failed to explore alternative scenarios or suspects, sources have said.

Authorities received information, for example, from at least one detainee at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, that there was an anthrax storage facility in the Kabul area, sources said. Because the deadly letters contained the Ames anthrax spores, manufactured in the United States, authorities entertained the possibility that they had been removed from a U.S. lab and transported overseas.

Agents checked the Kabul area in May 2004 but came up empty, sources said. In November, on additional information, agents spent weeks searching an area in the Kandahar mountains, several hundred miles outside of Kabul, but found nothing, sources said.

Meanwhile, in the United States, FBI agents and scientists have been working to match the gene sequence of the mailed anthrax spores to a specific laboratory. They remain particularly interested in such laboratories as Fort Detrick, Louisiana State University and Dugway Proving Ground in Utah.

An article published in May in a journal of the American Society of Microbiology and written by a number of scientists, including Bruce Budowle of the FBI laboratory in Quantico, suggested that scientists had still not pinpointed the lab of origin. "Grand leaps in sequencing technology to increase speed, to reduce costs and to maximize efficiency for forensic analysis are needed," the article said.

Clare Fraser, president of the Institute for Genomic Research in Rockville, one of the authors of the article, said of the science: "It's breaking new ground. There's still a lot of work to be done. But I don't think it's impossible to pinpoint."

Even if the test is successful, some scientists and law enforcement authorities caution, it may be of limited benefit because the nation's labs kept poor records of anthrax stocks and of those who passed through the facilities.

In light of the obstacles facing investigators, some relatives of the victims are wondering if the anthrax case will ever be solved. "It's been out there too long. I don't think they're going to find out" who did it, said Thomas L. Morris III of Suitland, whose father, D.C. postal worker Thomas Morris Jr., died of inhalation anthrax in October 2001.

Staff researcher Bobbye Pratt contributed to this report.

Congressman Says Hijacker Documents Destroyed (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) — A Pentagon employee was ordered to destroy documents that identified Mohamed Atta as a terrorist two years before the 2001 attacks, a congressman said Thursday.

The employee is prepared to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee and was expected to name the person who ordered him to destroy the large volume of documents, said Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa.

Weldon declined to name the employee, citing confidentiality matters. Weldon described the documents as "2.5 terabytes" — as much as one-fourth of all the printed materials in the Library of Congress, he added.

A Senate Judiciary Committee aide said the witnesses for Wednesday hearing had not been finalized and could not confirm Weldon's comments.

A message left Thursday with a Pentagon spokesman, Army Maj. Paul Swiergosz, was not immediately returned.

Weldon has said that Atta, the mastermind of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and three other hijackers were identified in 1999 by a classified military intelligence unit known as "Able Danger," which determined they could be members of an al-Qaeda cell.

On Wednesday, former members of the Sept. 11 commission dismissed the "Able Danger" assertions. One commissioner, ex-Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., said, "Bluntly, it just didn't happen and that's the conclusion of all 10 of us."

Weldon responded angrily to Gorton's assertions.

"It's absolutely unbelievable that a commission would say this program just didn't exist," Weldon said Thursday.

Pentagon officials said this month they had found three more people who recall an intelligence chart identifying Atta as a terrorist prior to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Two military officers, Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer and Navy Capt. Scott Phillpott, have come forward to support Weldon's claims.

Moroccan-born Dane Denies Promoting Terrorism In Court Hearing (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jan M. Olsen, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - COPENHAGEN, Denmark-A Moroccan-born Danish citizen arrested on suspicion of promoting terrorism denied the allegations in court Thursday.

Said Mansour was arrested Sept. 8 in Copenhagen on suspicion of encouraging terrorism by calling for a Jihad, or holy war, against the West in scores of CDs, computer discs and video tapes found in his home.

In his challenge to a court order allowing police to hold him for four weeks, Mansour told the Eastern High Court that he was not a terrorist and that the material was for his personal use. The court is expected to rule Friday.

"I have lived in this country for 23 years and I have always lived in peace," Mansour told the court. "I can assure you, I am no terrorist and I have nothing to do with terrorism."

In three raids on his home since November, police have seized some 3,000 CD-ROMs and roughly 500 computer disks, most containing calls for a jihad. Police also seized 161 CD-ROMs when Mansour was allegedly selling at a Copenhagen flea market in June, and 14 computer disks found in his car during a Danish-German border check in March.

Jihad is Arabic for the Islamic concept of the struggle to do good. However, extremists commonly use it to refer to holy war.

Mansour's lawyer, Claus Bergsoe, said his client had a large archive of material, but did not distribute it. However, Bergsoe also said Mansour acts like a missionary because "he's a man who agitates for Islam."

Prosecutor Lone Damgaard said results of a police wiretap include a tape in which the accused promised to copy a book and a tape. Someone calling themself Mansour in an Internet chat room also claimed to distribute information about Islam, she said.

"That must be some kind of distribution activity," said Damgaard.

Some material stamped with the logo of Mansour's publishing house, Al Nur Islamic Information, was also seized in a mosque in northern Italy and in Hamburg, Germany.

Some of the digital recordings shown earlier this month in court included Chechen Muslims decapitating and shooting Russian soldiers, and the beheadings of American hostage Nicholas Berg in Iraq and Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl in Pakistan.

If charged and convicted, Mansour could face up to six years in prison.

Mansour has been under surveillance by Denmark's intelligence service for years. Police claim he is tied to the al-Qaida terror network's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, and the blind Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, who was convicted in connection with the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in New York.

'Scary' U Of M Student Jailed (MCA)

By Chris Conley

Memphis Commercial Appeal, September 16, 2005

When FBI agents walked into Mahmoud Maawad's spartan apartment at 3557 Mynders # 5 on Sept. 9, they found a desk, chair, computer and a Koran.

They also found an airline pilot's uniform, a chart of Memphis International Airport, and instructional DVDs, including one called "How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act."

A federal magistrate Thursday ordered Maawad, a 29-year-old University of Memphis student from Egypt, jailed until his trial on charges of wire fraud and fraudulent use of a Social Security number.

"The specific facts and circumstances are scary," Asst. U.S. Atty. Steve Parker said, arguing against Maawad's release.

Since Maawad can't get a Social Security number, "he can't get a pilot's license, and can't go to flight school," Parker said. "But he wants to get behind the wheel of an aircraft."

Parker said "we don't know either way" if Maawad is a terrorist or connected to any terror groups.

U.S. Magistrate Judge S. Thomas Anderson ruled that Maawad be held without bond.

Though it's not illegal to buy aviation material, Anderson noted, "it is hard for the court to understand why he has a large concentration of those items, and nothing else to indicate Mr. Maawad plans to stay in the community."

Maawad has been in the country illegally since 1999, and has used a false Social Security number to enroll in schools and open a bank account, Parker said.

He's been working off-the-books for cash at a North Memphis convenience store, and was arrested by Shelby County sheriff's deputies last spring for selling alcohol to a minor.

Agents are downloading information from Maawad's computer and analyzing materials from his apartment in search of a terrorism connection.

"My school is everything," said Maawad, a clean-shaven man built like a weightlifter. "I stay in this country for seven years; I stay for the school."

Maawad said he's studying science and economics at the U of M.

Since Maawad can't work legally, he told authorities a friend would support him.

When court employees tried to reach that friend, the telephone was disconnected.

DOJ_NMG_0006187

Between April and August, the penniless student ordered $3,000 in aviation materials, DVDs titled "Ups and Downs of Takeoffs and Landings," "Airplane Talk," "Mental Math for Pilots" and "Mastering GPS Flying," FBI agent Thad Gulczynski testified.

He also ordered a pilot's coat and hat, and a chart of the Memphis airport terminal area from Spotty's USA in San Diego.

When the company didn't receive payment on $2,500 worth of merchandise it had delivered, officials called the FBI, which launched an investigation, Gulczynski said.

Hunger Strike Spreads At Jail For U.S. Terror Suspects At Guantanamo (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stevenson Jacobs, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico-A hunger strike at the U.S. prison for terror suspects in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to its largest point since detainees began their latest protest more than a month ago, a military official said Thursday.

After 11 detainees joined the protest overnight, there are now 131 taking part in the hunger strike, said Maj. Jeff Weir, a spokesman for the detention center.

Twenty-one of the striking prisoners were hospitalized in stable condition at the prison medical clinic, including 20 who were being tube-fed, Weir said.

The military considers a hunger strike to be a form of suicide and Weir said that one prisoner was restrained after he resisted having a feeding tube inserted.

"No facility in the U.S., and hopefully the world, is going to let someone starve to death," Weir said. "We're charged with keeping them in good health, and that's what we're doing."

Guantanamo officials said this latest hunger strike began Aug. 8 with 76 detainees protesting their confinement. It has since grown to more than a quarter of the approximately 500 detainees.

The military defines someone as being on a hunger strike after they have refused nine consecutive meals. There have been at least two previous hunger strikes, but military officials said they were not able to confirm whether this was the largest.

A U.S. human rights group, the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, has claimed that some 210 detainees are participating in the hunger strike.

The detainees are accused of ties to the al-Qaida terror network or Afghanistan's ousted Taliban regime. Most have been held for more than three years without charge.

PATRIOT ACT:

Heavican Says Patriot Act Not Threat To Average Citizen (KNEB-AM)

KNEB-AM 960, Scottsbluff, NE, September 16, 2005

U.S. Attorney Mike Heavican told Scottsbluff Kiwanians Thursday the average citizen should not fear the expanded power authorities have under the Patriot Act. Heavican, who spoke on the issue in Sidney Wednesday and will be in Chadron Friday, says the only people who should be concerned about the legislation should be those involved in terrorist activity.

Heavican says authorities have always had access to library, bank and medical records for cases involving criminal investigations. Heavican says with the Patriot Act, those powers now expand to cases involving international terrorism. Heavican told the group searches into personal records can only be done if probable cause is established and if the judicial system agrees it is justified.

Heavican says the feds have tried to use their new authority, which includes delayed notice search warrants, sparingly and only under circumstances where somebody's life is in danger, the suspect is a flight risk, or if the investigation would be compromised.

WAR NEWS:

Insurgents Strike Baghdad Again; Two-Day Death Toll Nears 200 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006188

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 15 (AP) - Suicide bombers struck the capital again on Thursday, killing at least 31 people in two attacks about a minute apart and lifting the death toll in two days of carnage to nearly 200.

A dozen bombings during a nine-hour spate of terror on Wednesday killed at least 167 people and wounded nearly 600 in Baghdad's worst day of bloodshed since the United States-led invasion in March 2003.

American officials blamed the onslaught on efforts by the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency to answer a successful joint United States-Iraqi offensive last week in the northern city of Tal Afar and to spark sectarian strife in hopes of undermining the Oct. 15 referendum on Iraq's proposed constitution.

"These spikes of violence are predictable around certain critical events that highlight the progress of democracy," said Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, the chief American military spokesman in Iraq.

General Lynch said the joint operation in Tal Afar killed 145 insurgents and captured 361 in the second operation in a year to rid the area of militants, including foreign fighters crossing from Syria. Now, he said, American and Iraqi forces were fighting to regain control of the Syrian border, near the western insurgent stronghold of Qaim, on the Euphrates River and well to the south of Tal Afar. "We believe that the terrorists and foreign fighters are entering Iraq across the Syrian border, down the Euphrates River Valley into Baghdad," General Lynch said.

The latest violence only deepened the misery in Baghdad, where streets on Thursday were noticeably quieter and, in the southern Dora district, where the latest bombings were concentrated, deserted.

American and Iraqi soldiers using loudspeakers roamed the district, warning residents to stay indoors because five more suicide car bombers were believed to be in the area.

[Gunmen shot dead two laborers and wounded 13 in the New Baghdad district of the Iraqi capital on Friday morning, Reuters reported. The laborers were waiting to be hired for a day's work when the gunmen opened fire, the police said.]

Clashes were reported Thursday in Ramadi, a militant stronghold on the Euphrates west of Baghdad. A police captain, Nasir Alusi, said American and Iraqi troops in Ramadi came under mortar attack as militants roamed the streets. Shops were closed and streets empty. Gunfire echoed through the area, he said.

The American military did not confirm the report, but General Lynch said operations were continuing in Anbar Province, where Ramadi is the capital.

The United Nations planned to print and distribute five million copies of Iraq's draft constitution before the Oct. 15 referendum, a spokesman said Thursday. The spokesman, Farhan Haq, said officials hoped the Iraqi Parliament would sign off on the text by Sunday. "Once the transitional National Assembly designates a final draft constitution, we stand ready to assist in printing it and distributing that draft constitution so that the Iraqi people can make an informed choice in the upcoming referendum," Mr. Haq said.

Baghdad Toll Nears 200 As Insurgent Strikes Continue (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 15 -- Insurgents believed to be allied to Abu Musab Zarqawi's group al Qaeda in Iraq kept up bombings in the capital on Thursday, launching strikes that brought the two-day death toll here to more than 190.

The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the surge in bombings represented the kind of occasional spikes in attacks that the military has been expecting. Lynch told reporters, "Zarqawi is on the ropes."

Three car bombs in a western neighborhood of the capital killed four Iraqi postal workers and 17 police commandos, police and Interior Ministry officials said. Iraqi and U.S. leaders have identified the commandos as Iraq's front line against the insurgency.

Meanwhile, one policeman was killed in a gun battle with insurgents and another officer was found handcuffed and shot in the head, news agencies said. The bodies of seven unidentified men were found in spots around the capital, blindfolded with their hands tied.

Insurgents also managed to land a single mortar round inside the Green Zone, the base for U.S. officials and Iraq's government. There were no casualties and only minimal damage, U.S. officials said.

A day earlier, at least 14 car bombs across Baghdad killed more than 160 people, the majority of them Shiite Muslim civilians -- the war's highest toll for deaths inflicted by insurgent attacks in the capital.

An audiotape released on an al Qaeda-linked Web site after Wednesday's attacks said Zarqawi's group had opened "all-out war" on Iraq's Shiite majority. The voice sounded the same as that heard in previous, authenticated statements from Zarqawi's group.

Alleged al Qaeda attacks on Thursday also hit the city of Ramadi, capital of the western province of Anbar, a stronghold of foreign-led fighters. Witnesses said al Qaeda-allied fighters rocketed and shelled two U.S. military installations at Ramadi and traded fire with U.S. patrols in the city.

The U.S. military reported one Marine killed in the fighting at Ramadi and said a would-be car bomber also was killed. Iraqi emergency medical workers said Marine snipers killed six al Qaeda fighters.

The two-day barrage of attacks attributed to al Qaeda in Iraq, and the increasing control of towns in the west along the Euphrates River being asserted by foreign-led insurgents, intensified the U.S. military's focus on Zarqawi.

American commanders often have publicly denigrated Zarqawi's role in the insurgency to little more than that of a media-fostered figurehead. On Thursday, however, Lynch discussed Zarqawi in some of the sharpest terms yet, calling him the Americans' main target and saying the United States was winning the fight against him.

"We believe we are experiencing great success against the most crucial element of the insurgency, which is the terrorists and the foreign fighters. The face of that is Zarqawi and al Qaeda in Iraq," Lynch said.

"We've got great intelligence which tells us where he's moving to and where he's trying to establish safe havens. As soon as we see him trying to establish a safe haven, we will conduct operations," such as the one still underway against northwestern insurgent strongholds in Tall Afar, Lynch said. "We're using all assets under our control in conjunction with the Iraqi security forces to find him and kill him."

Asked why he believed U.S. forces and their allies were succeeding in the fight against insurgents, Lynch pointed to accomplishments in Tall Afar and two other recent or ongoing operations in the west and northwest: 371 suspected insurgents killed and 1,163 detained.

Killings by insurgents, however, also have mounted fairly steadily since Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari's transitional government was named on April 28. The insurgents' use of increasingly sophisticated roadside bombs and land mines helped make August the third-deadliest month of the war for U.S. troops, with corresponding increases this summer in deaths among Iraqi civilians and security forces.

Defense Minister Sadoun Dulaimi told reporters Thursday that the stepped-up Baghdad bombings were insurgent retaliation for the Iraqi military's leading role in the operation at Tall Afar. "We tell the terrorists, we will never be weak or inattentive. We will chase you wherever you are, in the cities, villages," Dulaimi said. "I think what is happening is the last breath of the terrorists."

[On Friday morning, gunmen killed two day laborers and injured 13 in an attack in the New Baghdad district of the Iraqi capital, police said, according to the Reuters news agency. The laborers were waiting to be hired for a day's work.]

In other violence Thursday, bombs and ambushes killed a total of four policemen in the cities of Baqubah, Samarra and Kirkuk, all north of Baghdad. In southern Iraq, police told news agencies they had found the body of Mahdi Attar, a prominent Shiite cleric. Attar and three associates had been shot or stabbed to death.

Sectarian tensions have multiplied in Iraq in recent months, encouraged in part by insurgents with the avowed intent of provoking civil war. Shiite religious ceremonies have been frequent targets of attacks, and many Shiites fear attacks this weekend, coinciding with their annual pilgrimage to the holy city of Karbala, in southern Iraq.

Also Thursday, a Western official familiar with arrangements for Saddam Hussein's trial by an Iraqi tribunal, scheduled for Oct. 19, said he expected the former president to be tried in connection with a variety of crimes, including the destruction of thousands of Kurdish villages and the disappearance and killing of their inhabitants in the 1980s. Authorities so far have announced charges in only one, smaller event, the killing of 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against Hussein in their town.

U.S. forces also released video Thursday from the Sept. 7 rescue of American contractor Roy Hallums, kidnapped from his office in Baghdad 10 months earlier. The video showed what looked to be a narrow, dark cave covered by steel bars, and a wasted but happy Hallums talking to U.S. soldiers immediately after his release.

The cage was in a hole under a farmhouse, and a rug and freezer were placed on the hatch over the hole to conceal it, said Lynch, the military spokesman. U.S. forces had detained someone they believed had information about Hallums's whereabouts and used the detainee to pinpoint the location, Lynch said.

In Najaf, south of Baghdad, police announced the recovery of 150 relics stolen from Iraq's national museums and the site of ancient Babylon, describing some as monuments that required trucks to move. Police arrested four Iraqi suspects. A fifth suspect, an Iranian, escaped, local border police commander Hussein Awais Ghazal said. Illegal trafficking of relics from Iraq's 5,000-year history erupted with the looting accompanying the U.S. invasion and collapse of Hussein's security forces.

Special correspondents Naseer Nouri in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

More Iraqis Lured To Al Qaeda Group (LAT)

By Greg Miller And Tyler Marshall, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Al Qaeda's top operative in Iraq is drawing growing numbers of Iraqi nationals to his organization, increasing the reach and threat of an insurgent group that has been behind many of the most devastating attacks in the country, U.S. officials and Iraqi government leaders say.

The group, headed by Jordanian-born radical Abu Musab Zarqawi, previously was composed almost exclusively of militants from other Arab nations, and has symbolized the foreign dimension of a stubborn insurgency fighting to oust U.S. forces.

But Zarqawi "is bringing more and more Iraqi fighters into his fold," a U.S. official said, adding that Iraqis accounted for "more than half his organization."

Although Zarqawi is believed to command fewer than 1,000 fighters, the daring and lethal nature of their attacks, coupled with Zarqawi's links to the Al Qaeda terrorist network, has made him the most notorious figure in the Iraq insurgency.

The U.S. has set a $25-million bounty on Zarqawi, whose organization has been behind a series of beheadings, suicide bombings and other gruesome attacks.

Zarqawi's faction has claimed responsibility for a bombing campaign this week that has left at least 169 dead in Baghdad, apparently in reprisal for a U.S.-Iraqi campaign against insurgents in the northern city of Tall Afar. One of the car bombers reportedly lured day laborers to his vehicle by posing as an employer. It was unclear whether he was Iraqi.

Details of a growing Iraqi dimension to Zarqawi's group were provided by three U.S. officials with access to classified intelligence data and who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. Their comments reflect the government's latest attempt to come to grips with a multi-layered insurgency that has often confounded U.S. forces and intelligence agencies.

The U.S. officials indicated that the infusion of Iraqis, including, apparently, former members of the Iraqi intelligence service and military, represented a change in the group's makeup rather than a major expansion.

A significant Iraqi presence in the Zarqawi group carries ominous implications, both for the Bush administration and the fledgling, popularly elected government it supports in Baghdad.

The Iraqis under Zarqawi's wing could provide him with better intelligence, and give legitimacy to a group viewed by many Iraqis as unwanted outsiders. In addition, Iraqi recruits are being exposed to the workings of a highly efficient extremist group.

The influx of Iraqis also would diminish the effect of any tightening of border controls — a key Bush administration objective — on the insurgency's strength.

U.S. intelligence in Iraq has frequently been wrong. However, two factors add credence to the reports of the shifting composition of Zarqawi's group: Several of his senior lieutenants have been captured by U.S. forces in recent months and some reportedly have talked extensively under interrogation.

Senior Iraqi officials reported seeing the same development.

Mowaffak Rubaie, Iraq's national security advisor and a former Shiite activist, said "there's no doubt" that once-nationalistic elements of the insurgency were drifting toward Zarqawi and his extremist Salafi sect, also known as Wahhabism, which seeks to establish a puritanical society modeled on early Islamic times.

"There's a tendency to religion-ize the insurgency," he said. "Religion is a strong motive. You're not going to find someone who's going to die for Baathists. But Salafists have a very strong message.

"If you use the Koran selectively, it could be a weapon of mass destruction."

Few Iraqis appear to share Zarqawi's goal of establishing a radical Islamic state, but small numbers of Iraqi hard-liners apparently are attracted by the effectiveness of Zarqawi's group.

"They're the best game in town, the most organized organization," said a U.S. official, who added that Zarqawi's network was also a "well-funded organization that is willing to pay people for their work" when many Iraqis, particularly police, have little or no income.

The officials noted that police in three cities, including Mosul, are not being paid. They declined to name the others.

Officials said it was not clear how dedicated these Iraqis were to the broader Al Qaeda cause, or whether they would be willing to travel outside the country to carry out terrorist attacks in Arab or Western nations.

Zarqawi escaped capture in February near the city of Ramadi, authorities say. He fled on foot as coalition forces at a checkpoint intercepted a truck containing a laptop and documents. Coalition forces since have killed or captured several of his lieutenants. The latest such incident was announced Sept. 9, when a U.S. military official said a high-level aide had been killed in western Iraq.

But the U.S. officials who are familiar with intelligence on Zarqawi's group said the organization had proved remarkably resilient and was organized to withstand losses of key leaders, including Zarqawi.

One of the officials noted that coalition forces thought they had delivered a major blow in January with the capture of Zarqawi's principal bomb maker in the capital. But since then, the official said, "car bombs are way up in Baghdad."

Overall, the officials said, the insurgency in Iraq is divided into three "clumps": religious extremists such as Zarqawi; former members of the Baath Party of Saddam Hussein; and disparate Iraqi groups acting out of local or national interests.

The officials described a steady flow of Saudis, Yemenis and other Arab nationals into — and, in some cases, out of — the country. But officials said foreign fighters accounted for less than 10% of the insurgents in Iraq.

Zarqawi's reported success in recruiting Iraqis to his cause comes as frustration is mounting among the minority Sunni Arabs, who fear they will be marginalized in the new Iraq and are prepared to fight its emergence.

The CIA and other agencies have resisted pressure to provide an estimate of the number of insurgents in Iraq, partly out of concern that it would foster the impression that there is a finite population that can be stamped out.

Rather, officials said intelligence analysts had noted that there were about 800,000 to 1 million Iraqi Sunni Arab men of military age who represent the pool of potential insurgents. How many might turn to violence depends on several factors, starting with the extent to which Sunnis are satisfied with their stake in any new government.

Some Sunnis have objected to the draft constitution that is to be presented to Iraqis in a national referendum next month. The community's sense of estrangement could be heightened if the document is passed, as is likely, over its objections.

"They're going to be extremely disappointed when they fail, and they're going to believe this is the result of fraud and being cheated out of what they deserve," one of the U.S. officials said. "There's going to be some real ratcheting up of Sunni disaffection with the process."

The trial of Hussein, to begin next month, is also likely to add to a sense of victimization among Sunnis, analysts say.

US Tempers Its View Of Victory In Iraq (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - Since the day in May 2003 when President Bush stood beneath a banner proclaiming "Mission Accomplished," the course of the conflict in Iraq has been one of optimism followed by revision.

From the earliest battle plans, which called for the quick return home of tens of thousands of troops, to the campaign in Fallujah and national elections that followed, the Pentagon had hoped it could largely eliminate lingering unrest before turning security over to Iraqis.

The increasingly bracing tone from the White House and Pentagon, however, points to a new calculus. The persistence of the attacks, as well as their undiminished capacity - witnessed by Wednesday's bombings in Baghdad, which killed more than 150 Iraqis - seems to have confirmed that the insurgency will probably outlast the American occupation.

Indeed, the inability of American forces to defeat the insurgency through strikes such as the current offensive in Tal Afar raises doubts about the possibility of any clear victory for the administration. And it could leave the Iraqis with a years-long task that many planners had not anticipated.

"There has been a clear realization that this war is not winnable in the short term," says Seth Jones, a terrorism expert at RAND Corp. in Arlington, Va.

The change in thinking has come gradually, as pivotal moments in the maturation of the Iraqi state have come and gone - and the insurgency has remained. In the first months after Mr. Bush declared victory, Pentagon officials were loath even to use the word "insurgency" to describe the attacks that killed some two dozen troops in May and June of 2003.

In testimony before Congress that July, Gen. Tommy Franks argued that the attacks did not fit his definition of an insurgency.

A year later, however, the continuing toll of the insurgency was reshaping the Pentagon's expectations. By the spring of 2005, a spike in violence, despite the previous November's successful campaign against the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah and January's relatively peaceful elections, made it clear that political momentum was not enough.

Part of the reason for the failure to plan for uncertainties came from the ideological insistence that almost all Iraqis would see Americans as liberators. Yet it also came from a political calculation that dismissed the lessons of the Clinton years. "There was a sense that there was nothing to learn from Somalia or Haiti or Bosnia," says Dr. Jones.

Some parts of the administration have been slower to reach this point than others. In the midst of the May attacks, Vice President Dick Cheney famously said that the insurgency was in its "last throes." But less than a month later, on June 26, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said: "Insurgencies tend to go on five, six, eight, 10, 12 years. Coalition forces, foreign forces are not going to repress that insurgency. We're going to create an environment that the Iraqi people and the Iraqi security forces can win against that insurgency."

It is this attitude that has moved from post-invasion rhetoric to Pentagon doctrine. In some ways, it is the same measure of victory that the Pentagon laid out two years ago. "At an absolute minimum, we'll be here for [two years], and probably longer, to make sure that [Iraqi forces] are capable of protecting the sovereignty of Iraq," said Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez in an Aug. 7, 2003, Pentagon briefing.

Administration officials have always insisted that events on the ground - and not artificial timelines - would dictate American actions in Iraq. Yet today, the finish line is no more certain than it was two years ago - and the threat that Iraqi forces will be facing when US troops leave is more dire than many military officials imagined.

The result is that Bush's characteristic steel about Iraq still lacks any specifics or certainty. "As a practical matter, no one in the administration is going to admit this," says Anthony Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies here. "Nobody's making military promises that are unrealistic."

There are some positive signs. The offensive to roust insurgents from Tal Afar, which began in May and intensified the past two weeks, has put more responsibility in the hands of the Iraqi military. "It's a very important step in turning over security to the Iraqis," says Rachel Bronson, an analyst for the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

But there is a long way to go, she and others say. Significantly, when Iraqi President Jalal Talabani suggested this week that Iraqi forces would be ready to replace 50,000 US troops by the end of the year, he quickly reversed his statement and later added that US soldiers might be needed for another two years, though he set no deadline.

Amid this military uncertainty, administration officials have turned to political events as the primary marks of progress. "The referendum on the constitution and the elections at the end of December are the most important aspects of what we're doing now," Gen. George Casey told Congress in June.

Yet Wednesday's attacks in Baghdad suggest that the practical matter of adequately preparing the Iraqi military - not the grand clash of political ideas - will ultimately determine the success or failure of American hopes, analysts say. In a recent paper, Dr. Cordesman writes: "If political developments do have a positive effect, it will be ... because a substantially larger number of Iraqi Sunnis ... see the military balance shifting decisively in favor of Iraqi government forces."

Iraq's President Talks Of Saddam And Better Days (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Jalal Talabani, the president of Iraq, is sitting at a long table set in the middle of a hotel ballroom in Manhattan. This is U.N. Week in New York, the annual opening of the General Assembly. It is 8:30 in the morning and he is talking about Saddam Hussein. The trial of Saddam will begin as scheduled Oct. 19, it will be public and "it will last months." There have been reports that the trial would be limited to a single event -- the 1982 massacre in Dujail of 150 Shiites. Mr. Talabani said the trial will extend well beyond the events in Dujail.

"At first Saddam refused to talk," Mr. Talabani said. The former dictator would not discuss the operational military details of alleged Baathist crimes elsewhere. "Then a young Iraqi judge, a very clever man, said to him, 'I'm very sorry to see the ex-president of Iraq is a coward.' Saddam said, 'I am coward? I can answer every question.' After that, he talked."

While Mr. Talabani is speaking to his interviewers -- writers and editors from The Wall Street Journal -- a man in a suit passes behind the Iraqi president and returns to quietly place a plate before him. It holds three peeled, glistening hard-boiled eggs, sauteed mushrooms and bread. The man returns with a small plate of fresh fruit. President Talabani has tucked a linen napkin into his collar. He is ready to eat.

The Iraqi president looks at his un-plated guests, and with the aplomb of a skilled politician smiles and insists that they get up from their chairs, go over to a table nearby and get some food. "I invited you to breakfast," says the president, beaming.

Mr. Talabani, a hearty man at 72, represents a country presented to the world daily on TV and in print as falling into an insurgent abyss of bombs and blood. Amid this, he conveys remarkable calm and confidence.

"Two weeks ago I was in Najaf," he says of the holy city (pop., 560,000) in the Shiite south. "I went into the streets and into the people and it was calm." He claims that 14 of Iraq's 18 provinces are quiet: "All Iraq is not Fallujah and Tal Afar."

It no doubt requires a deep reservoir of equanimity to keep the constitutional process moving forward amid events like Wednesday's mass bombings in Baghdad. Mr. Talabani, arguably the most popular political figure in fractious Iraq, brings to this project a personal history built from political stress.

At 13, he is said to have begun a secret association of Kurdish students. At 14 he joined the Kurdistan Democratic Party. Back then, in the 1940s, his opposition was the Hashemite monarchy, which denied him entry to medical school. Fortuitously, he became a lawyer, journalist and ultimately a leader of the 25-year Kurdish resistance to Saddam's Baathist dictatorship. In April he was appointed to the presidency by the popularly elected National Assembly and is now, in effect, the public face of the new Iraq.

New Iraq's ability to get as far politically as it has turns in no small part on its major players acting responsibly, rare in any nation but noteworthy in a country widely predicted to be heading inevitably to civil war. The Kurdish Mr. Talabani is one such person. Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, leader of the south's Shiites, is another, as Mr. Talabani explained:

"In the 1920s when British forces came to Iraq, Shiites resisted and they lost everything. This time the Shiites did not make that mistake. For example Sistani, he doesn't call the foreign forces 'occupiers'; he calls them 'guests.' Tell 'the guests' to do so and so. The Sunnis have repeated the mistake of the Shiites of the '20s. Now the Sunnis understand they made a big mistake, and they are trying to improve relations with the United States."

Mr. Talabani also singled out another of Iraq's leaders, the oft-criticized Ahmed Chalabi. "Among civilians, Dr. Chalabi especially has been active in preventing war between Sunnis and Shiites," he said.

But while the Sunnis are starting to understand where their best interests lie, they lack a political center just now. The Kurds and Shiites, Mr. Talabani explains, are relatively cohesive as political entities, but the Sunnis are divided into small, often tribal groups: "Saddam didn't permit any kind of Sunni leadership to emerge." Right now, he said, the Sunnis need assurance that the government can protect them, as in the current joint U.S.-Iraqi offensive against the insurgents in Tal Afar.

Up to now, he said, the anti-insurgent offensives in the Sunni Triangle essentially have amounted to a policy of "liberate and leave." This time with Tal Afar, they intend to stay: "We must keep some forces there or arm local people to defend their freedom."

He acknowledged that Iraq's transition poses a challenge in the region: "All Arab states are afraid of a democracy. A democratic Iraq with different nationalities -- Kurds, Arabs Turkomen, Shiites, Sunnis -- will inspire all the Middle East. The Sunnis of Saudi Arabia, the Kurds of Iran, Syria, Turkey -- when they see this, it will inspire all of them. For that reason none in the Middle East is helpful in having a democratic Iraq." When he is asked to discuss Syria and the current terror inside Iraq, he declines to stay on the record.

At the end, with the three eggs gone, one feels impelled to wish Mr. Talabani good luck. The Iraqis, by now, have earned it.

Records Detail Treatment Of Iraqi Captives (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Army officers in Iraq told their superiors last year that soldiers often lacked the training to handle detainees, did not always understand what constituted abuse and sometimes used techniques against prisoners that they "remembered from movies," according to military records made public Thursday.

In two incidents described in the reports, bound detainees were shot and killed by soldiers. Although the circumstances were unclear, officers or Army lawyers said afterward that the killings could have been prevented with better training, facilities and understanding by soldiers of the rules of engagement.

The episodes were described last year to Lt. Gen. Paul T. Mikolashek, the Army inspector general who conducted one of more than a dozen reviews in the aftermath of the abuse scandal at the Abu Ghraib prison near Baghdad. In reporting his findings to top Army commanders in July 2004, Mikolashek concluded there were no systemic failures or widespread patterns of detainee abuse.

But according to documents generated for his report, including 1,800 pages of evidence that were obtained and released Thursday by the American Civil Liberties Union as part of a lawsuit to learn more about prisoner treatment, Mikolashek was told of many incidents in which poor training and inadequate facilities created an atmosphere that fostered abuse.

Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman, said the documents represented "Army reports and Army information, where the Army was looking into allegations and sorting out the situation about detainee mistreatment."

But he said they did not show widespread abuse. "The Army has looked carefully at each allegation and addressed it very thoroughly," he said.

Boyce added that there had been more than 400 investigations into allegations of Iraqi detainee mistreatment — many involving individual incidents — since the earliest revelations of sexual abuse and physical mistreatment at Abu Ghraib in January 2004. Thus far, he said, allegations against more than 200 soldiers have led to court-martial proceedings, nonjudicial punishment and other administrative penalties.

Mikolashek concluded in his report that incidents of abuse did not result from deficiencies within the Army. "The Army's leaders and soldiers are effectively conducting detainee operations and providing for the care and security of detainees in an intense operational environment," he wrote. "Based on this inspection, we were unable to identify system failures that resulted in incidents of abuse."

But Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the documents suggested that Mikolashek had brushed aside evidence that there was abuse and significant training problems.

"Our government has failed, and the blame is on Washington, not Hollywood," Romero said.

Romero was referring to an account of a platoon leader who said interpreters were often taken along on raids to pick up insurgents. But there often were not enough interrogators to go with the interpreters, and that meant other officers were thrust into the job of interviewing detainees — even though they had no training to do so.

The unidentified platoon leader, who was with the 4th Infantry Division from Ft. Hood, Texas, said they had to improvise. "Officers and [noncommissioned officers] at point of capture engaged in interrogations using techniques they literally remembered from movies," he said.

The platoon leader did not elaborate on the nature of the techniques used. But he added: "Soldiers need to be trained in basic tactical interrogation techniques. It's going to be done one way or the other. Why not the right way?"

Another report to Mikolashek described one of the fatal shooting incidents that emerged from the documents. In the report, an unnamed officer said a soldier "killed a detainee he was guarding" at a collection point, prior to the prisoner being sent to a prison.

"The detainee's hands were tied … and the soldier shot and killed the detainee," the officer said. "This incident could have been prevented if he had better training."

The officer said the soldier did not understand the Army's rules of engagement, and noted that the soldier was discharged. No other details were provided in the heavily redacted reports released Thursday.

A second incident was detailed in an account by a member of the judge advocate general's office from the 4th Infantry Division. The officer, a lawyer, described a guard who shot and killed a prisoner he believed was trying to escape. The officer said the detainee's hands were cuffed and he was standing behind a prison wire.

"The investigating officer determined the detainee was not trying to escape," the officer said. "He said the incident could have been prevented with better facilities, and training for the guard force."

It was unclear whether the soldiers involved in the two cases mentioned in the reports had been punished.

In his report last year, Mikolashek mentioned an incident in which a bound prisoner was shot and killed by a U.S. soldier, but it appeared to differ from those described in Thursday's documents in that the soldier in question had bragged about wanting to kill an Iraqi.

In other instances of potential abuse, two officers reported that a detainee was forced to sit on the floor while a bottle of water was poured over his head by a civilian U.S. interrogator who "just seemed to be having a good time, because [the] detainee was not talking and never did talk," an unnamed officer said.

Others also took part in abusing the detainee, the officer said. But the incident was not reported to superiors because it was not considered a violation. A staff sergeant interviewed for Mikolashek's investigation complained of a lack of guidance on what soldiers were allowed to do. In interviews about other incidents, officers said commanders had never explained what constituted abuse.

With soldiers overworked in dealing with a crush of detainees, one first lieutenant said that there was no requirement to report abuse, only a "moral obligation" to do so.

Afghan Candidate Wounded; 2 Backers Abducted (NYT)

By CARLOTTA GALL

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 15 - A candidate was shot in Nuristan Province on Wednesday morning, and two of her supporters were kidnapped, in an attack before the national election on Sunday, local officials said Thursday.

The candidate, Hawa Alam Nuristani, an anchorwoman on the state-run Afghan Television and Radio in Kabul, was traveling by car to a campaign meeting in Nuristan, her native province, in the east when she was wounded.

"They came under attack by unknown people," the provincial police chief, Gen. Abdul Baqi, said by phone. "She received four rounds from a pistol in her leg. Two others with her, supporters filming her campaign, were kidnapped."

Another woman, the representative of the Women's Affairs Ministry in Nuristan, was in the car, but was not injured, Muhammad Tamim Nuristani, the governor of the province, said.

Ms. Nuristani, the candidate, was treated by American troops in the region and then evacuated to Bagram Air Base, near Kabul, where she was in stable condition, said a United States military press officer, Sgt. Marina Evans. A spokeswoman for the election commission, Bronwyn Curran, said Ms. Nuristani had been shot three times in the hip.

Clerics and elders in the region were gathering to try to secure the release of the kidnapped men, General Baqi said. Early reports indicated that the attackers were not Taliban fighters or other antigovernment insurgents but rival candidates, he said.

Six candidates and four election workers have been killed in the period before the parliamentary and local vote. Seven police officers were killed Wednesday in Oruzgan Province in the south. Their bodies were found with their election registration cards, said the governor, Jan Muhammad.

A police checkpoint was also attacked Wednesday night in Oruzgan Province. Three people suspected of being Taliban fighters were killed and one was captured in the firefight, he said. An American soldier was wounded Wednesday in a roadside explosion in Oruzgan Province, the United States military said in a statement.

Voting May Be Life-and-Death Choice For Afghans (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

QALAT, Afghanistan, Sept. 14 - Who's afraid of democracy in Afghanistan?

In the southern city of Kandahar one morning last week, a candidate for Parliament opened her front gate to find one of her campaign posters scribbled with terrifying threats. "Your children salute me every morning," said one. "Soon, I will salute them back."

Here in the capital of neighboring Zabul Province, suspected Taliban fighters offered the driver for another parliamentary candidate a huge sum of money in exchange for delivering the candidate to them. The candidate said she no longer dared to campaign outside the provincial capital.

And in Shajoy, a market town two hours up the road, some men wondered aloud how many townspeople would have the courage to travel a couple of miles through Taliban redoubts to cast their votes in Sunday's election. Never mind the women; the men said they did not expect any polling places to be open for women anyway.

Nearly four years after the Taliban government was routed from Afghanistan by American-led forces, a newly emboldened insurgency has stepped up a campaign of threats and thuggery on the eve of the country's parliamentary and provincial elections, particularly here in the badlands of the country's south. Elsewhere, the presence of former warlords on the ballot has led to charges of voter intimidation.

But what is just as remarkable is the degree to which so many ordinary Afghans seem unfazed by the threats and violence, and, on occasion, are openly defiant.

Whether Afghan men and women will be able to cast their votes freely and fairly in Sunday's election remains to be tested. For now, even candidates who have been threatened have vowed to stay in the race, even as they have had to limit their campaign activities sharply.

"The day I registered as a candidate I knew about these problems," said Rona Tarin, 34, the Kandahar candidate whose campaign poster was defiled and left in front of her home.

With 68 seats reserved for women in the new 249-member Parliament, Ms. Tarin, a preschool supervisor, is one of nine candidates competing for three seats reserved for women from Kandahar Province.

"How long should I sit at home?" she said, fuming. "How long should I close my eyes? How long should I shut my ears? I have to take my people's problems to Parliament."

The price of running for office in this part of the country can be perilous. Since early June, six candidates and five election workers have been killed, most of them in the south. Last week, security forces turned up two dozen cooking pots filled with explosives behind a Kandahar school designated to serve as a polling place.

Taliban leaflets known as "night letters," left at markets and mosques in several southern provinces, have issued warnings against anyone who participates in elections.

In Khost, to the east, a bomb went off inside a mosque being used for voter registration. In the eastern city of Jalalabad, the convoy of a parliamentary candidate, Safia Sadiqi, was fired on, injuring two campaign workers.

In Helmand, to the west, gunmen ranged across villages threatening to kill anyone who dared go to the polls. Officials with the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission said they suspected local officials, rather than insurgents, were responsible.

[On Thursday, officials with the rights group said they had also received reports of candidates and local officials preventing other candidates from campaigning freely.]

In parts of central and northern Afghanistan, the reason for fear is less because of the Taliban than the powerful former mujahedeen commanders, who supposedly have been disarmed and removed from public office, but who continue to wield considerable influence in their territory, especially in the countryside.

"People are afraid that those commanders and those who governed by force of weapons, will again win seats and return to power," said Abdul Azim Azimi, a local election observer in the northern town of Mazar-i-Sharif.

About 200 people with links to militias are running for office, and election observers have accused some of intimidating voters or preventing rival candidates from campaigning. To date, 47 candidates have been disqualified by the elections commission, mostly for links to armed groups.

"How much legitimacy will the new Parliament have?" said Sam Zarifi of Human Rights Watch, which released a report this week documenting election-related intimidation. "Having warlords isn't about their past abuses. It's about their inability to move the country forward."

It is unclear whether international monitors will be able to monitor rural polls, particularly in the south, on election day.

Voter turnout Sunday will signal not only the nerve of Afghan voters, but also their confidence in the still fragile government of President Hamid Karzai and his American backers. Since presidential elections last fall, life in the south increasingly has become precarious and the exercise of politics clouded by growing insecurity, voters and candidates in Zabul and Kandahar Provinces said in interviews this week.

"Slowly, slowly, morale is going down," said Talatbek Masadykov, the chief of the southern region for the United Nations Mission in Afghanistan, based in Kandahar. One reason, he said, is, "the security is not improving," adding, "the central and provincial government cannot deliver assistance to people in very remote areas."

In Shajoy, Muhammad Aziz, a shopkeeper, predicted that only men who live in the town would vote. His relatives two miles away would be unlikely to try to travel into town unless security improved.

Abdul Zahir, a farmer, said that during last year's presidential elections, the men of his village, a couple of miles away, had come to Shajoy to vote, but those farther out of town did not. "This time," he said, "God only knows."

As part of their efforts to reinforce security in the days leading up to elections, an American Army convoy pulled in to Shajoy one morning this week to donate wheat seeds to the local government and hand out radios and clothes to the children.

But to Mr. Zahir, the additional patrols, by American and Afghan soldiers alike, made little difference. "In the daytime, this government is coming to us, and in the nighttime the Taliban are coming to us," he said. "We're stuck in the middle."

Police and election officials, eager to deflect criticism about security, noted that despite intimidation, 1.6 million additional Afghans had registered to vote since the presidential election, bringing the total to 12.6 million. About 5,800 candidates had signed up to run for seats in Parliament and provincial assemblies, and 44 percent of the new registered voters this year are women.

"The people of Afghanistan have brave hearts," said Mullah Gul, a police commander in Kandahar whose men found the body of the last candidate killed in the campaign. "They don't care about death."

Officials with the United Nations-assisted Joint Electoral Management Body Secretariat, which is running Sunday's election, also took pains to note that there was no proof that the six candidates were killed because they were running for office.

Violence may not necessarily subside after the election. For one thing, under Afghan election law, in the event of the winner's death, the runner-up takes office, which some fear could heighten the likelihood of political assassinations.

In these elections, the stakes for women are particularly high. In a society where women customarily cover themselves from head to toe, several women have boldly displayed their faces on campaign placards. But tradition and terror have also sharply curtailed their campaigns.

Torpakai, a public health worker in Qalat running to represent Zabul Province in Parliament, said she feared that there would be no outsiders to monitor the polling places and that the election would be unfair. She said she had not been so hopeless during last year's presidential election or during the earlier constitutional assembly, in which she participated. "Not just me, all the people were optimistic about democracy, optimistic about security," she said.

One of her rivals, Zarmina Pathan, 38, said she did not expect many women in the countryside to vote. She said she approached Sunday's elections with an odd mix of gloom and determination.

"Every time they threaten me, it dashes my hopes," she said. "But I'm running for Parliament. I can't just run away from the elections."

Afghan Parliament Will Have Big Visions, Few Rules Of The Road (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, September 16, 2005

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Nobody ever accused Mullah Mohammad Khaksar, a former Taliban deputy minister, of being an Afghan Thomas Jefferson.

But his goals for Afghanistan sound remarkably like those of a founding father, and like those of the majority of the other 5,700 candidates running on Sunday in the country's parliamentary election. Mr. Khaksar wants a strong central government, improved security, faster reconstruction, and a serious effort to control drug trafficking and government corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0006197

With such broad consensus, Afghanistan should be well on its way toward creating a sound, workable Afghan parliament that serves as a watchdog to the government. But even Khaksar is not so sure it's going to work that way. He fears that many parliamentarians who come to Kabul will be inexperienced, or be just as corrupt as the government they are supposed to be watching over.

"I am very disappointed about the future of this parliament," says Khaksar, a candidate from his native city of Kandahar. "Look, we are building this parliament. But if, instead of using a strong cornerstone, you build with unbaked bricks, will you be able to build a strong building?"

The problem, many candidates and foreign observers say, is the way in which Afghanistan's parliament was created in the country's new constitution. Voters choose candidates as individuals, not as members of a party. This creates an environment where personalities are more important than ideas, coalitions struggle to stick to common agendas, and individual MPs are more easily manipulated by the palace.

"This parliament will not be functional for several years," says Barnett Rubin, an expert on Afghan politics at New York University who helped organize the Bonn Conference in December 2001 that set up the post-Taliban government. Rubin says that President Hamid Karzai's habit of ruling through patronage - rewarding those who support him with better positions or development funds - has now set a precedent for many elected parliamentarians to turn to him as a kind of feudal lord with deep pockets.

"Once elected, what is their main goal? To get reelected," says Mr. Rubin. "The goal is to get benefits to a small number of people, with no notion for the benefit of society." He pauses. "I don't know how they are going to pass legislation."

Yet, already there are signs that some candidates are forming three main coalitions. One, led by Northern Alliance politician Younus Qanooni, will act as a sort of permanent opposition to President Karzai, and will attempt to change the system of government to give parliament more power, including a prime minister. A second faction will be a cross section of independents from around Afghanistan, who side with Karzai on most issues. A third faction of liberal and leftist parties will swing back and forth between the opposition and Karzai, supporting the president on common issues, but voting against him on others.

With many voters expressing frustration at the slow pace of reconstruction, and visible signs of corruption in their government, even Karzai's friends may find it necessary to slap the hand that feeds them from time to time.

Mohammad Iqbal, a young independent candidate from Jalalabad in the eastern province of Nangrahar, says he supports Karzai, and particularly the way he mediates local problems through local tribal elders. But if Karzai fails to clean up corruption in government, fails to rebuild the country, or strays too far from Afghanistan's Islamic traditions, Mr. Iqbal says he will vote against him.

"Friendship is friendship, but if Mr. Karzai is anti-Afghanistan, then even if His Excellency Mr. Bush asks me, I will say no," says Iqbal, with a wry smile. His supporters break out in laughter.

Experts say it will take time for Afghan parliamentarians to figure out the new process, when most of the elected officials have no experience in how to legislate and none will have researchers to help them sort out good bills from bad bills.

"With a limited role for political parties, things will be fluid, with lots of deal- making," says Paul Fishstein, director for the Afghan Research and Evaluation Unit, a think tank in Kabul. Many Afghans are optimistic that things will get sorted out in traditional Afghan ways, but Mr. Fishstein says that parliamentarians are in for a rude awakening when they confront the hard work of legislation.

"A lot of people love to talk about improving security, electricity, water systems, but that's not necessarily what parliament is intended to do," says Fishstein. "They'll be passing budgets, they'll be representing the material interests of their constituencies, and that takes a certain level of skill."

He smiles. "It's going to be an interesting parliament."

Warlords On Ballot Worry Afghan Election Observers (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 16, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — The presence of warlords and ex-Taliban officials on the ballot when Afghans vote Sunday is raising fears that figures from the past will sabotage efforts to build a stable democracy.

“The Afghan people need a government that is functional and accountable,” says Sam Zarifi, deputy director of the Asia division of Human Rights Watch, an activist group. “The warlords offer neither.”

Millions of Afghans will choose candidates to fill 249 seats in the lower house of the National Assembly and local council seats in 34 provinces. It's a historic step toward establishing democracy in a country riven by decades of conflict. About 30,000 coalition troops are providing security for the election. This week, female candidate Hawa Nuristani was shot and injured and seven registered voters were killed, the Associated Press reported.

The Electoral Complaints Commission disqualified 21 candidates, citing ties to illegal militias. Afghan President Hamid Karzai cautioned: “Don't vote for bad people.”

In a report released Thursday, Human Rights Watch said warlords are intimidating candidates and voters. It said Allam Khan Azadi, a candidate and commander near the northern city of Mazar-e-Sharif, for instance, threatened to cut the water supply to those who did not vote for him. “Complaints were heard in almost all regions of the country,” the group said.

Abdul Rabb al-Rasul Sayyaf, a warlord, is seeking a National Assembly seat in the capital. After the Soviet Union was driven from Afghanistan in 1989, Sayyaf's Ittihad militia battled rival factions in Kabul. Human Rights Watch says Sayyaf and his rivals are guilty of war crimes.

A former religious teacher at the University of Kabul, Sayyaf said this week that he took up arms to battle the Soviets. “The needs of the country transferred me from the classroom to the bunker,” he said. “If the mujahedin are not worthy to enter politics, who will be?”

Mawlavi Qalumuddin was deputy administrator in the Taliban's Ministry of Vice and Virtue, which enforced rules that banned girls from attending school, women from working outside the home, men from shaving and anyone from flying a kite. He's running for the National Assembly from Logar province.

“I'm sure the people know me and my background,” he says. Qalumuddin says it would be dangerous to ban warlords from the democratic process; isolated, they might turn to violence.

Afghanistan Votes (WP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

FOUR YEARS AGO this weekend, the Taliban dictatorship of Afghanistan rejected a U.S. demand that it break its bond with Osama bin Laden, despite the attacks on New York and Washington one week earlier and the threat of American military action. This weekend, as many as 12 million Afghans will vote in nationwide elections for parliament and provincial councils in a historic step toward democracy. Among the 6,000 candidates are representatives of almost every faction that has contended for power in Afghanistan over the past several decades. There are tribal leaders and Western-educated liberals; communists and the mujaheddin who once fought them and, later, each other; and several former officials of the Taliban itself. Five hundred eighty-two of the candidates are women, who four years ago were banned from holding jobs, going to school or appearing on the street without covering themselves from head to foot. They will fill at least 68 of the 249 seats in the parliament.

It's easy for Westerners, and even Afghans, to lose sight of how much progress this represents. Sunday's vote is not only a breathtaking leap for a nation whose previous government was an Islamic theocracy that mixed medieval social policies with sponsorship of 21st-century terrorism. It also places Afghanistan ahead of almost all of its Central Asian neighbors, who have never held a vote as free. Much of the reporting of Western observers and human rights groups nevertheless has focused on the perceived failings of the political process. Though insurgent activity has fallen off in recent weeks in the face of aggressive operations by some 20,000 U.S. troops and 10,000 NATO peacekeepers, several southern provinces remain insecure and some voters there may be intimidated. Human rights groups protest that warlords guilty of crimes in Afghanistan's civil war are poised to collect votes. At the insistence of President Hamid Karzai, the election system is centered on individuals rather than parties; critics say this may produce a weak or conservative legislature.

While many of these critiques are legitimate, it's worth noting the tenaciousness with which many liberal Westerners have opposed every step by Afghanistan toward freedom. Four years ago, for example, former European Union commissioner Emma Bonino was one of those who condemned the U.S. intervention against the Taliban, which she said would "all but doom" millions of Afghans "to death." Now, incredibly, she leads the E.U.'s observer mission at the elections; not so surprisingly, she's again pessimistic. "I simply don't think this election is going to produce . . . a healthy political life," she told the Financial Times.

Afghanistan surely has a long way to go. Part of the Taliban is still fighting, and more U.S. soldiers (51) have died in combat this year than in any since 2001. Though Kabul is booming, Afghanistan is still one of the world's five poorest countries, and up to 60 percent of its economy comes from the production of poppies for opium. Once the elections are over, Mr. Karzai will still have the problem of edging the former warlords and communists aside and encouraging the emergence of new leaders committed to democracy and human rights. No, political life isn't entirely "healthy." But as the world will shortly see, it is immeasurably better off than it was four years ago -- and than it would have been had the United States hesitated to act.

Will U.S. Abandon Afghanistan? (WT)

By Joanna Nathan And Mark Schneider

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006199

"I will not vote, these elections are not worth anything, the candidates are the same people who destroyed Afghanistan," thunders the taxi driver as we jolt down Kabul's streets. Campaign posters for the upcoming National Assembly and Provincial Council elections on Sept. 18 blanket every non-moving object.

Suddenly, a thought struck him: "If I do vote, I will vote for a woman! They do not have blood on their hands." Hopefully, such revolutionary ideas will occur to many other voters in Afghanistan. Hopefully, they will feel confident enough in the secrecy of the ballot to exercise true choice and secure enough amidst an ongoing insurgency in the south and east to make it to the polling booth in the first place.ÅA

Election preparations have been at full steam for six months now, with more than 12 million voters enrolled and 5,800 candidates, 582 of them women. Ballot papers are a vision in color, featuring a picture and symbol for each candidate to aid illiterate voters.

Weighing more than 1,000 tons, they are now making their way by helicopter, plane, truck, donkey and camel out to 6,000 polling centers across the country.

But despite such impressive technical preparations for these $159 million polls, there are wider concerns about both the framework of the elections and the viability of the institutions they will ultimately create.

The concern most immediately apparent to Afghans, such as our taxi driver, is the lack of a robust vetting system to bar candidates implicated in years of atrocities and drug trafficking. Indeed, the failure of the Karzai administration and his international backers to tackle head-on the perpetrators of past atrocities has led to a culture of impunity, with many of the same people back in power today and now seeking the mantle of a democratic mandate.

The U.N. Office of Drug Control reported at the end of August that Afghanistan produced 87 percent of the world's opium for the second year in a row. It also urged the removal of corrupt governors and officials involved in the drug trade, barring parliamentary candidates with drug ties, and "zero tolerance" toward warlords' involvement in drug trafficking. The latter recommendation has yet to be acted upon by the administration and Coalition forces who argue they are fighting against a still virulent insurgency. Yet, the drug trade is financing Taliban insurgent operations.

The fact that, in what became a highly politicized vetting process, only 32 candidates were barred for retaining links to armed groups has added to local disillusionment.

An inappropriate voting system, the rarely used single non-transferable voting and a political framework hostile to political parties mean these elections are being fought on ethnicity and individuals rather than ideas. In turn, the democratic bodies to emerge are likely to be fractured and weak with no workable caucuses or groupings on which to build a robust political culture.

However, above all these concerns are fears the international community may see these elections widely touted as the end of the transitional process agreed to in Bonn in December 2001 as a time to downgrade commitments to Afghanistan.

It is absolutely imperative that these elections are viewed as the beginnings of democratization, not the end. Afghanistan is still at a perilously fragile stage. This vote will provide the trappings of a democratic state, but there is still little in the way of institutions or resources to exert true control.

The ongoing insurgency in the south and east has been bloodier this summer than at any time since the fall of the Taliban, including the killing of six candidates and even more election workers. Ordinary Afghans continue to suffer some of the lowest social indicators in the world: life expectancy is 45; a woman dies in childbirth every 30 minutes; and illiteracy is running at 70 percent. The Bonn process was about tight deadlines for political transition. The momentum created in this sphere now needs to be used to push forward in other areas.

Previous lessons about the consequences of abandoning Afghanistan should be fresh in everyone's mind. Now, more than three-and-a-half years after the fall of the Taliban, the growing sense of discontent on the streets of Afghanistan is palpable. If Afghanistan is allowed to slip back into being a failed state because the international community turns away after elections, that sense of discontent will be the country's major export.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Faces A Lot Of Challenges (DEN)

By David Shepardson, The Detroit News

Detroit News, September 16, 2005

DETROIT -- If nothing else, the U.S. attorney is a man who can cry.

DOJ_NMG_0006200

Stephen J. Murphy III, a former assistant U.S. attorney and General Motors lawyer, repeatedly fought through tears after his formal swearing-in as the top law enforcement officer in eastern Michigan.

A Who's Who of Michigan politicians lauded Murphy Thursday and ribbed him about his performance as an assistant U.S. attorney.

Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm and Murphy were among the "young Turks" who served in the U.S. attorney's office in the 1990s, she noted.

In 1992, Granholm recalled seeing Murphy fall asleep at his desk with his finger on the "Z key."

Granholm and a colleague responded by sending Murphy a phony memorandum sternly reprimanding him for falling asleep on the job.

Among those speaking were Chief U.S. District Judge Bernard A. Friedman, state Attorney General Mike Cox, General Motors general counsel Thomas Gottschalk and Michigan Supreme Court Justice Maura Corrigan.

Unmentioned directly but referenced by several speakers was the continuing fallout from the botched 2003 Detroit terrorism case.

A federal judge threw out the convictions of two Arab immigrants arrested shortly after Sept. 11 after a Justice Department review found evidence of prosecutorial misconduct.

The case and a separate criminal investigation into the conduct of the former lead prosecutor are pending.

Bradford A. Berenson, a former White House counsel's office lawyer, noted that Murphy was taking over "at a time when the office has been through some serious difficulties."

Since taking office in March, Murphy has reshuffled the leadership in the office and issued a two-sentence mission statement. Murphy said his office "is dedicated to doing the right thing."

"We've had ups and we've had downs," Murphy said. "We have a lot of challenges ahead."

And he promised not to fall asleep on the job.

"No way," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Marsh Brokers, Executives Are Indicted In Bid-Rigging Case (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK -- Eight former Marsh Inc. insurance brokers and executives were indicted yesterday by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, on criminal-fraud charges including an alleged scheme to defraud and grand larceny, as his yearlong probe of insurance bid-rigging moves into final stages.

Mr. Spitzer alleged that the brokers cheated some corporate clients by rigging bids for insurance contracts in order to steer business to insurers that paid Marsh, a unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos., large commissions.

Mr. Spitzer alleged that the scheme raised clients' costs in at least 35 instances, in a few cases by $1 million or more.

The indicted individuals all formerly worked in a Marsh Inc. group that specialized in excess casualty insurance, which is big-ticket coverage typically sold to large corporations.

Early this year, Marsh & McLennan signed an $850 million settlement with New York authorities and apologized to clients for the "unlawful" and "shameful" behavior of some employees. In recent months, an additional 17 insurance executives and managers, including eight former Marsh employees, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter.

In New York state court yesterday, five former Marsh employees -- William Gilman, Joseph Peiser, Edward McNenney, Greg Doherty and Thomas Green -- were indicted on charges including scheme to defraud in the first degree, and grand larceny in the first, second and third degrees. The first-degree grand-larceny charge carries a maximum 25-year prison sentence.

Three other former Marsh executives -- Kathleen Drake, William McBurnie and Edward Keane -- were indicted on the same charges, but the grand-larceny charges are in the second degree, with a maximum 15-year prison term.

At least one of the individuals is in talks with authorities about a guilty-plea agreement, according to two people close to the matter, but it wasn't clear when or if a deal would be made.

Mr. Gilman was named repeatedly in Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Marsh. His attorney, Robert Cleary, said his client "has not violated any laws." Mr. Peiser's attorney, Jerry Bernstein of Blank Rome LLP, said his client "is innocent of these charges, and I am confident he will be found not guilty at trial."

Mr. Green's attorney, Stephen Scaring, said his client "entered a plea of not guilty and he is prepared to defend himself." An attorney representing Mr. Keane declined to comment.

Mr. Doherty's attorney, Maranda Fritz, said Mr. Spitzer's office "is trying to construct claims of criminal behavior against Marsh employees who were actually and consistently working for the benefit of the client."

Attorneys representing Mr. McNenney and Ms. Drake didn't immediately return phone messages. An attorney for Mr. McBurnie couldn't be reached.

Mr. Spitzer said Marsh "should be applauded" for changing its management and business model to avoid conflicts of interest, but added that he couldn't rule out more prosecutions of former or current Marsh employees, among others in the insurance industry.

"This indictment is about the past," Marsh Chief Executive Michael G. Cherkasky said in a statement. "MMC today is focused on the future and is committed to excellence."

Interpublic Warns Of Illegal Actions (WSJ)

By Brian Steinberg And Suzanne Vranica, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Interpublic Group, in a sign that its accounting problems are more serious than previously understood, says an internal investigation has turned up instances of "misappropriation of assets" and "falsified books and records" that violated laws, mainly occurring at operations outside the U.S.

The ad holding giant, whose agencies work for such big-spending advertisers as Microsoft, Unilever and Coca-Cola, said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it has fired or is in the process of firing "culpable" employees.

Interpublic also said a six-month investigation had confirmed that the company would have to restate its earnings going back to 2000 as a result of several accounting errors. The size of the restatement will be revealed by Sept. 30, the company said, but it noted that the "impact on our results of operations for all periods will be material." Past financial statements shouldn't be relied upon, it added.

Interpublic had reported results ranging from a profit of $397.1 million in 2000 to a loss of $451.7 million in 2003. While investigating its accounting problems, the company hasn't filed an earnings report for 2004 or the first half of 2005.

Yesterday's filing appeared to take Interpublic's long-running accounting problems to a new level. Since late last year several big Interpublic clients, including General Motors and Bank of America, have taken at least some of their business elsewhere. Interpublic had estimated cash and cash equivalents of approximately $1.6 billion as of June 30 compared with debt of about $2.3 billion.

The company's accounting has been the subject of an SEC probe since 2002, when it restated five years of earnings after uncovering $68.5 million in charges in Europe that hadn't been properly expensed. But yesterday's filing was the first time the company had revealed that it may have uncovered possible criminal behavior.

The filing gave few details of the possible unlawful activity, including the amount of money involved, although it said it involved "accounting errors that were qualitatively material." A person close to Interpublic played down the significance of the activity, saying the possible criminal actions represented only a small portion of the company's overall accounting problems.

This person said the number of people involved could be as many as 60 at around 20 locations. Interpublic has around 43,000 employees and between 800 and 900 offices.

An Interpublic spokesman said Interpublic has contacted or will be contacting local authorities in affected areas. "Instances in which we believe there was malfeasance represent a small number of our locations," he said. "The fact we have been able to identify them demonstrates that we are making progress in enhancing our risk-management controls."

The activity Interpublic said was questionable took place primarily at Interpublic operations in Eastern Europe and Latin America, the person said. Those regions account for a relatively small portion of Interpublic's business. More significantly, however, much of the activity occurred at McCann WorldGroup, people familiar with the situation said. McCann is Interpublic's biggest operation and largest moneymaker and was at the center of the accounting problems disclosed in 2002. Interpublic's other agencies include Lowe, Draft and Foote Cone & Belding.

The main cause of Interpublic's accounting errors were "weak controls and our decentralized operational structure," the company said. The bulk of the restatement is owing to inappropriate accounting for lease expenses as well as problems with how Interpublic accounted for revenue and for companies that had been acquired.

In certain cases through 2001, Interpublic consolidated revenue and expenses of businesses in its financial statements before Interpublic had completed their purchase. From the mid-1990s through 2002, Interpublic acquired hundreds of advertising and marketing firms as part of a broader consolidation within the ad industry.

Interpublic said it expected its outside auditor, PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, to issue a "disclaimer of opinion" on the effectiveness of its internal financial controls. But Interpublic said it expected the firm to sign off on its 2004 financial statements. The auditing firm said it doesn't comment on client matters.

Any talk of wrongdoing "is going to perk up the ears of the clients," says Alexia Quadrani, a Bear Stearns ad-industry analyst. Advertisers will be asking themselves whether "they can afford to expose their corporate reputation to this," says Lauren Rich Fine, who follows Interpublic for Merrill Lynch and has a "sell" rating on the company's stock. "If you can't clean up your own house, how can I trust you to come up with my company's strategy?" she asked.

Interpublic Group Retraces Its Accounting Missteps (NYT)

By STUART ELLIOTT

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

THE troubled Interpublic Group of Companies said yesterday that it had found evidence of "possible employee misconduct" in the course of efforts to get to the bottom of persistent accounting problems.

Since an investigation that began in March, Interpublic said in a regulatory filing, the company, its longtime accounting firm and forensic accountants have uncovered potential illegal activities that involved "falsified books and records; violations of laws, regulations and company policies; misappropriation of assets, and inappropriate customer charges and dealings with vendors."

In the regulatory filing, called an 8-K, Interpublic disclosed that the "culpable employees" had been or will be fired, "or are otherwise no longer with the company."

The announcement was the most recent in a series of unexpected disclosures by Interpublic, which has been struggling with financial and operational difficulties for three years, mostly related to weak internal controls. In a news release with the 8-K, Interpublic said it would be able, "barring unforeseen circumstances," to meet a Sept. 30 deadline it had previously set to file delayed financial reports, including results from the last six quarters.

Interpublic said that it would probably be restating earnings for 2000 to 2004 because of systemic accounting problems in revenue, acquisitions and lease expenses.

"I have been clear since assuming my current responsibilities that our top priority is to fix our financial controls and leave accounting issues behind us," Michael I. Roth, co-chairman and chief executive of Interpublic in New York, said in a statement. Mr. Roth's reference was to his assuming the duties of chief executive in January, when he became the third man with that title since Interpublic found the first of its financial problems in August 2002.

In that period, Interpublic has also had four chief financial officers.

The disclosure about the possible misconduct marks the first time in those three years that Interpublic has said that not all the errors leading to its plight were necessarily honest ones. The company's difficulties include two previous restatements of earnings, an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and losses incurred by an ill-advised expansion to auto-racing tracks.

Interpublic said it would provide additional details about the potential misconduct when it reports the delayed financial data, which is to include the 2004 annual report along with results for the full year 2004 and the first two quarters of 2005.

"Instances in which we believe there was malfeasance represent a small number of our locations," said an Interpublic spokesman, Philippe Krakowsky.

"The fact we have been able to identify them demonstrates that we're making progress in enhancing our risk-management controls," Mr. Krakowsky added.

Preliminary findings have uncovered problems involving about 50 employees at a couple of dozen offices outside the United States. Interpublic has about 43,000 employees who work in about 1,000 offices around the world.

Interpublic is the world's No. 3 agency company in revenue, behind the Omnicom Group and the WPP Group, and owns agencies like Campbell-Ewald, Deutsch, Foote Cone & Belding, Draft, Initiative and WeberShandwick. The three years of financial uncertainty, coupled with some losses of large clients and defections of senior managers, have taken a toll on Interpublic, particularly in its stock price.

For instance, an analysis last month by USA Today showed that Interpublic shares were among the worst performers in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index since a bull market began in October 2002. Interpublic stock closed in trading yesterday at $11.31, down 2 cents, or 0.2 percent.

After the release of the Interpublic statements, Fitch Ratings said it was keeping the company's credit facility ratings at B+ and on negative watch, where they have been since March. On Aug. 31, after Interpublic agencies lost the large Bank of America account, Standard & Poor's said it would keep its outlook at negative for the Interpublic long-term credit rating, which is BB-.

Analysts who follow advertising stocks had mixed reactions to Interpublic's news.

"We believe confirmation of reporting financials is a positive step in improving visibility," Credit Suisse First Boston said in a report that maintained its rating of outperform on Interpublic stock.

"If management can execute, the risk-reward on IPG is highly favorable and this is a major turnaround story," the report concluded. The letters "IPG" are the symbol under which Interpublic shares trade on the New York Stock Exchange.

The promise to meet the Sept. 30 deadline "should allay some of the worst concerns of investors," J. P. Morgan Chase said in a report, which called the news of the possible employee misconduct "an incremental negative." The report reiterated a rating of Interpublic stock as neutral.

A report that was more downbeat came from Merrill Lynch, which last week lowered its rating of Interpublic stock to sell - a rare call on Wall Street - from neutral.

"While the bulls may find the news that IPG is going to file by the Sept. 30 deadline encouraging," said the Merrill Lynch report, which maintained the sell rating, "we take the view that there is heightened risk concerning IPG's historical profitability and more importantly, its future earnings power in the wake of recent account losses."

Those losses have included the accounts of advertisers like Bank of America and the Lowe's Companies as well as parts of accounts of longtime Interpublic clients like General Motors, Nestlé and Unilever.

Interpublic also warned in the filing that any previous estimates made about the coming restatement or financial results "should no longer be relied upon" because of the extent of the work required to get to the bottom of the accounting problems. That work by the forensic accountants and the Interpublic accounting firm of the last three decades, PricewaterhouseCoopers, has even included performing certain tasks manually that are typically automated.

Interpublic said that when the delayed data are reported, it expects to receive "an unqualified opinion" on the statements in the 2004 annual report.

The initial financial problems that Interpublic found three years ago stemmed mostly from mistakes in intracompany transactions, primarily at European units of the largest Interpublic division, the McCann Worldgroup. The disclosure in March of additional problems attributed them to the weakness in accounting procedures in areas like tracking the hundreds of agency acquisitions made by Interpublic in the 1990's.

Trying To Put Some Reins On Derivatives (NYT)

By RIVA D. ATLAS

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Seven years ago, Wall Street's top bankers were caught off guard by the near-collapse of the Long-Term Capital Management hedge fund.

Since then, the number and influence of hedge funds have ballooned. The hedge fund explosion has prompted concerns that if a big bet goes wrong, regulators and banks will again be caught up in a collapse. High on the list of worries is the voracious appetite of hedge funds for arcane credit derivatives.

Yesterday, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York met with representatives of 14 banks, as well as regulators from the United States and overseas, to discuss cleaning up the processing of the contracts in the booming market for credit derivatives. There were $8.4 trillion such contracts outstanding at the end of last year, up from $919 billion just three years earlier, according to the International Swaps and Derivatives Association, a trade group.

Credit derivatives and hedge funds were part of the focus of a July report by a team of Wall Street executives, led by E. Gerald Corrigan, the former head of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and now a managing director at Goldman Sachs.

Mr. Corrigan's committee, which bears the unwieldy name of the Counterparty Risk Management Policy Group, was established at the request of the New York Fed after the Long-Term Capital turmoil. He reconvened the group in January to assess current risks in the markets.

"The report intended to air a significant number of issues in what is a pretty tranquil environment," Mr. Corrigan said in an interview last week. He ticked off a list of shocks the markets have absorbed in recent years, from terrorist attacks to the war in Iraq. The recent allegations of fraud at the $300 million Bayou fund have also had little effect.

In May, investors were briefly reminded that some traders might once again be making aggressive bets without fully understanding the risks. That month, the credit rating of General Motors was cut to junk status and the prices of G.M. bonds fell sharply, disrupting trading in certain baskets of credit derivatives that traded in ways that contradicted elaborate models upon which traders had relied.

Mr. Corrigan noted that the fears of losses on the part of hedge funds and banks alike after the downgrade turned out to be overblown.

"Anyone with half a brain knows that models are models," he said, adding that the banks and hedge funds should view the downgrade as a learning experience.

What Mr. Corrigan and bankers at the Federal Reserve are more worried about is what happens in the event of a corporate bond default.

Credit derivatives are bets on whether a company will pay its debts. In the event of a default, the party on the losing side of a trade must compensate the institution that holds the other end of the bet.

The problem is Wall Street has been overwhelmed in keeping track of these trades - and if corporate defaults, which are at an 11-year low, suddenly rise, it could have a mess on its hands.

The Federal Reserve called the meeting yesterday to address both a backlog in processing these trades as well as something called assignments, which refers to who holds the contracts at the time they are due.

Credit derivatives contracts were once arranged between banks and other large institutions like insurance companies. Now, banks are frequently entering into these contracts with hedge funds, which as frequent traders may wind up transferring the contract to another party.

The transfers of these contracts have become so frequent that there is often a lag in updating the paperwork for the contract to reflect the new owner, Mr. Corrigan said.

There is also a backlog of 13.3 business days before such trades are completed, according to a June survey by the association. Still, that was an improvement over 17.8 days last year, the organization said.

"The backlog reflects the explosion of activity, but also poses operational risks," Mr. Corrigan said.

One banker who attended and insisted on anonymity because of the confidential nature of the meeting said: "Regulators wanted to get everyone together to make sure the industry knew they were concerned. It was left to the industry to come back with solutions."

The International Swaps and Derivatives Association also issued standards this week to address these issues.

Mr. Corrigan said, "I could not be happier that the Fed and other regulators are taking the initiative to work with the private sector to come up with approaches to get the backlog issue under control."

Bankers give Mr. Corrigan credit for bringing further attention to the growing pains in the credit derivatives market.

"Jerry has a history of paying close attention to the plumbing of the financial system," said Mark C. Brickell, who was for years a senior member of the derivatives group at J. P. Morgan, the largest bank in the derivatives business. "It may not be glamorous but it's very important."

But executives like Mr. Brickell, who now runs an electronic trading system for derivatives, note that there are limits to what Mr. Corrigan's group, or the Federal Reserve, can accomplish.

Mr. Corrigan's group was largely made up of bankers, with a smattering of executives at hedge funds and other investment firms. The Federal Reserve does not oversee hedge funds. And even with the new requirement that hedge funds register with the Securities and Exchange Commission, their trading will remain hard to monitor. The recommendations of Mr. Corrigan and the Federal Reserve do not carry the teeth of regulations, he said.

But hedge fund executives say that they welcome the suggestions.

How Long To Jail White-Collar Criminals? (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

On Monday morning, L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former chief executive of Tyco International, will learn his fate. Mr. Kozlowski, who was convicted of grand larceny, falsifying business records, securities fraud and other charges, is to be sentenced in New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan and, unless he is granted bail, could be whisked off to Rikers Island to be processed. He faces a prison sentence as long as 30 years.

While recent lengthy sentences for white-collar crimes have been hailed by some as desperately needed deterrents after a deluge of corporate scandals, the sentencing of Mr. Kozlowski, 58, comes at a time when a number of lawyers, including former prosecutors, are questioning whether such sentences are justified.

Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chairman of WorldCom who was convicted of masterminding an $11 billion accounting fraud that bankrupted the company, was sentenced to 25 years in prison.

Because Mr. Ebbers is 63, some have contended that the sentence amounts to a life term. Likewise, John J. Rigas, the 80-year-old founder of Adelphia Communications, was sentenced to 15 years.

"You have to ask yourself whether the proof in these cases warrants such a sentence," said Otto G. Obermaier, a former United States attorney in Manhattan, who had been an aggressive prosecutor of white-collar crimes when he ran the office from

1989 to 1993. "Ebbers's sentence moved the goal posts pretty far back. You can describe it as a pendulum switch, but it is an overreaction."

Unlike Mr. Ebbers or Mr. Rigas - or indeed most other convicted corporate chiefs, who have been sentenced in the federal court system - Mr. Kozlowski, along with Mark H. Swartz, Tyco's former chief financial officer, who was convicted of the same set of crimes, is being sentenced in a state court. As a result, the judge in the Tyco case, Michael J. Obus, may have more latitude in his sentencing than federal judges, who have a strict set of guidelines to follow.

The convictions of Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz also differ markedly from some other recent white-collar cases. While prosecutors are asking that Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz be sentenced to 30 years, Justice Obus has the flexibility to give them as little as one to three years in prison.

Depending on the length of the sentence, both men could be incarcerated in a maximum-security prison like Attica.

No lawyer is suggesting that white-collar criminals not serve time. Rather, lawyers and jurists are asking what the appropriate sentence is for white-collar crimes relative to punishments for other crimes in a post-Enron world.

Jonathan Simon, a professor of law at the University of California, Berkeley, said: "The most obvious comparison for the emerging attitude toward white-collar criminals is the harsh punishment we give to people involved in the drug trade. But both represent increasingly irrational and inhumane levels of punishment."

Noting that he considered Mr. Ebbers's sentence "draconian," he added that "25 years is more than most people would get for rape or a nonaggravated murder."

Of course, the main argument for imposing lengthy sentences is that they serve as a powerful warning to other executives not to break the law. After Mr. Ebbers's conviction in July, Alan G. Hevesi, the New York State comptroller and court-appointed lead plaintiff in the WorldCom securities class action, said it was "important to send a strong message with a severe sentence" because of the billions of dollars and thousands of jobs that were lost as a result of the fraud.

Yet Professor Simon, for one, said he had doubts about whether an especially long sentence worked as a significantly greater deterrent to potential white-collar criminals than shorter terms.

"Deterrence is, in my view, highly contextual," he said. "If you live in a community where young people die all the time from stray bullets - whether they are gang-banging or going to school - it is pretty hard to deter anyone with threats of punishment.

"In contrast, white-collar workers are extraordinarily sensitive to threats since their whole socialization and environment encourage calculation of future benefit and cost."

Mr. Simon suggested that "it would be far more effective to impose a lot of short sentences on a wider group of offenders rather than the example model of harshly punishing a few celebrity cases while most potential offenders know that they are unlikely ever to be caught and punished."

Still, some prosecutors and lawyers suggest that lessons that were supposedly learned during an earlier crackdown on corporate crime in the late 1980's did not stick, in part, because the sentences were too lenient. Michael R. Milken, for instance, was sentenced to three and a half years and served less than two.

Lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz are expected to stress on Monday how different their cases are from those at Enron, WorldCom and Adelphia, companies all forced to file for bankruptcy protection as a result of the crimes. Tyco never filed for Chapter 11 protection, and its underlying business was relatively unaffected by the crimes despite swings in its stock price. The two Tyco figures were convicted of stealing about $150 million by paying themselves unapproved bonuses and conspiring to keep the thefts secret.

In addition to determining a sentence, Justice Obus, is expected to make Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz disgorge the money they stole. Prosecutors may also seek to have them pay hundreds of millions of dollars that they say shareholders lost as a result of the two executives' falsifying business records and hiding other information from investors, as well as millions of dollars in fines.

It is unclear whether the judge will rule on how much money shareholders should be reimbursed because no definitive amount was established during the trial.

He could decide to hold a hearing to determine the amount or he may leave that to the civil courts, which are overseeing lawsuits against the two men.

Lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski and Mr. Swartz declined to comment.

A spokeswoman for the Manhattan district attorney's office did not return a call seeking comment.

Judge Tosses ITT Shareholder Lawsuit (INDYSTAR)

By J.K. Wall

The Indianapolis Star, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006206

A federal judge in Indianapolis dismissed a shareholder lawsuit against ITT Educational Services Inc. Wednesday, saying the shareholders did not adequately demonstrate securities fraud.

U.S. District Court Judge David F. Hamilton gave the shareholders, who had been seeking class-action status, until Oct. 14 to file an amended complaint.

The lawsuit had accused ITT Educational, a Carmel-based for-profit educator, of inflating enrollment figures, falsifying grades, attendance and placement records, and shredding documents just before visits by government investigators.

But Hamilton found that none of the accusations were precise or strong enough under the Securities Exchange Act and the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, which govern shareholder lawsuits.

The dismissal comes less than three months after the U.S. Justice Department said its investigation of ITT Educational had found no evidence of wrongdoing by the company or its executives. The Justice Department shifted its focus to “local issues” at individual ITT campuses.

The shareholder lawsuit was sparked after the Justice Department sent federal agents in February 2004 to raid ITT Educational’s headquarters and 10 of its campuses. The raid sent ITT Educational’s stock plunging, but they have since recovered most of their value.

ITT Educational operates 79 technical institutes in 31 states serving about 40,000 students.

When Charity Stems From A Lawsuit (NYT)

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

CHARITY, according to popular lore, begins at home. These days, however, it sometimes begins in court. Therein lies a question of propriety, as well as one of just whose interests are being represented.

Call it "settlement charity." Lawrence J. Ellison, the chief executive of Oracle, has settled a shareholder derivative suit, without admitting he did anything wrong, for a $100 million donation in Oracle's name to a charity chosen by Mr. Ellison.

The suit in question is one of three that were filed after it came out that Mr. Ellison sold some Oracle stock at an opportune time in early 2001, weeks before the company reported that it would not meet its sales goals, sending the stock down from levels it has not seen since. The suits saw those sales as insider trading.

Mr. Ellison denied he knew how bad things were getting, and a Delaware judge dismissed one suit, concluding there was no evidence to the contrary. A class-action suit filed in federal court in California is still pending, but this settlement deals with the derivative suit filed in California state court, ostensibly on behalf of Oracle. It demanded that Mr. Ellison turn over to the company the money he saved by selling Oracle shares before the fall.

Had that suit prevailed, Oracle would have received a lot of money, so it arguably was in the interests of the shareholders. But the settlement provides for something else entirely.

Oracle will pay $24 million to the plaintiffs' lawyers, with $1.5 million of that to cover their expenses and the rest for a fee. The company owned by the shareholders will have that much less cash. Mr. Ellison will donate $100 million to charity.

How does that benefit the company? The lead plaintiffs' lawyer, Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., a partner in Berman DeValerio Pease Tabacco Burt & Pucillo, told me Oracle would benefit because its chief executive would not be distracted by having to defend the suit, something one might think could have been arranged had the suit not been filed in the first place.

He also points to new rules by Oracle, not yet detailed, that are supposed to increase protections against insider trading by company officers.

BUT the real gain, to hear Mr. Tabacco tell it, is "a positive benefit for Oracle in fulfilling its obligations as a good corporate citizen." Giving that money to charity "will enhance its reputation and improve its shareholder value."

Some might think that Oracle's reputation is harmed by Mr. Ellison's decision to settle, rather than fight, a suit that called his integrity into question. Others might conclude the settlement does not fit the charge. If Mr. Ellison did harm the company by his trading, he should pay the company, not some charity.

John C. Coffee Jr., a professor of securities law at Columbia University, is not persuaded justice was served. He suggested that it "would be fairer if the plaintiffs' attorneys would take their fee in the form of a charitable contribution that Mr. Ellison would make in their name to charities of his choice." Perhaps, he mused, Mr. Ellison would choose a charity that promotes tort reform.

Mr. Tabacco, unsurprisingly, did not like that idea. "We think it is fair compensation for bringing substantial value to the company," he told me, adding that compromises are necessary in any negotiation and that he had worked hard to get his clients the best deal possible.

"Given the amount of work that went into putting the case to the point that it was ready for trial, we should be fairly compensated," he said.

One fascinating thing about the result, assuming a judge signs off on the settlement, is that the as-yet-unnamed charity could never have filed suit to get the money from Mr. Ellison. But it gets the cash, and does not even have to pay the lawyers.

There is no doubt that the lawyers, who were chosen by eight shareholders with small stakes, will do very well. It is not nearly as clear that their clients have reason to rejoice.

CRIMINAL LAW:

CIA Leak Investigator Warns Against Document Release (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The Justice Department and the special counsel investigating the leak of a CIA operative's identity pressed Congress to block legislation that would compel the administration to turn over documents related to the case, the department said in a letter released on Thursday.

The Justice Department, in a letter dated September 14, said special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had advised that producing documents and holding hearings would interfere with his investigation. The letter was sent to the House Intelligence Committee's Republican chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan.

Congressional Democrats have so far failed in their attempts to pass legislation that would force President George W. Bush and the departments of state, justice and defense to provide Congress with documents relating to CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee on Thursday rejected the legislation on a party-line vote. Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee and International Relations Committee rejected similar resolutions on Wednesday.

Republican say Congress should await the outcome of Fitzgerald's investigation.

Democrats countered that Republicans were trying to protect Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove.

"We have an oversight responsibility regardless of what criminal investigations may or may not be under way," said Rep. Rush Holt, a New Jersey Democrat.

Lawyers close to the Plame investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks. The outcome could have major political implications for Bush, whose current approval ratings are the lowest of his presidency.

Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, said the leak was meant to discredit him for criticizing Bush's Iraq policy in 2003 after a CIA-funded trip to investigate whether Niger helped supply nuclear materials to Baghdad.

A reporter for Time magazine has said that the first person to tell him about Plame was Rove. Rove's attorney says Rove did nothing wrong and has been repeatedly assured he is not a target of Fitzgerald's investigation.

Democrats have urged Bush to fire Rove or revoke his access to classified information. It is against the law in some cases to knowingly reveal the identity of an undercover CIA officer.

US Senate Turns Aside Web Gambling Ban For Now (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. Senate on Thursday turned aside an attempt to restrict Internet gambling in a procedural move, but Sen. Jon Kyl vowed he would try again and said he expected the legislation would become law eventually.

The Arizona Republican tried to attach language restricting Internet gambling to an annual spending bill that must be passed this year, but an unnamed Democrat objected to attaching an unrelated matter to the spending measure under consideration.

Kyl said his legislation would require banks and credit card companies to block payments to online Internet gambling sites. He said some firms were already voluntarily blocking money transfers.

"We will proceed with this, it will become law at some point at some time," the Arizona Republican said on the Senate floor. "There should be no reason why we can't move forward on this."

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, a Maryland Democrat, said that a member of her party had objected to attaching Kyl's language to the spending bill but she was not sure who. Kyl urged the lawmaker to come forward so the concerns could be addressed.

The U.S. Justice Department has said the laws that prohibit interstate gambling apply to the Internet. But Americans have turned to offshore gambling Internet sites as an alternative.

The Senate and U.S. House of Representatives have passed similar legislation in the past but have been unable to reach agreement on a single, identical bill, Kyl said.

Shares of online gambling sites in Britain moved higher on Thursday in anticipation of the Senate action. Partygaming Plc moved up 5 percent to 105 pence while Sportingbet.com Plc moved up 11.3 percent to 321 pence on London trading.

Man, 66, Convicted Of Chicago Courthouse Bomb Plot (AP)

AP, September 16, 2005

(AP) CHICAGO A counterfeiter who sat in prison dreaming of revenge against the judge who sent him there was convicted Thursday of planning to blow up Chicago's federal courthouse.

Gale Nettles, 66, was also convicted of making a fresh batch of bogus $20 and $100 bills.

Jurors deliberated for about a day over evidence in the two-week trial, which featured tape recordings of Nettles telling an undercover FBI agent that not enough body bags were coming home from Iraq and too many people escaped death in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Judge John Keenan of U.S. District Court in Manhattan, a visiting judge who came to Chicago to preside over the Nettles trial, set sentencing for Jan. 12.

Keenan was brought in because the judges who regularly hold court in Chicago's Everett M. Dirksen Federal Courthouse were the targets of the bomb plot federal prosecutors outlined.

Nettles could be sentenced to 70 years in prison for his conviction on two counts of attempting to destroy the building and six additional counts of counterfeiting.

Prosecutors said it was unclear what the sentence might be under federal guidelines, which are only advisory. But they said with his previous record Nettles could expect a long sentence.

Nettles claimed that he was a victim of entrapment by federal officials. But prosecutors told jurors that Nettles talked about taking revenge on court officials before he ever had contact with the agents who gathered evidence against him.

Nettles was serving time for counterfeiting in a federal prison in Mississippi when another inmate told officials that he was talking of bombing the courthouse where he was sentenced.

After he was released, Nettles went searching for ammonium nitrate -- the same fertilizer that was used by Timothy McVeigh to blow up the federal building in Oklahoma City.

The FBI saw to it that he got urea, a substance that looks like ammonium nitrate but which would not have exploded if detonated in the way that Nettles planned.

Nettles then went looking for a member of Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terrorist network. What he found was an undercover FBI agent who was posing as a terrorist. Nettles sold a batch of the urea to the undercover agent, who made many of the recordings that were played for the jury.

Prosecutors told jurors that besides planning to blow up the courthouse, Nettles was hoping that his blast would level the Kluczynski Federal Office Building across the street.

Counterfeiter Convicted Of Plot To Blow Up Courthouse (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 16, 2005

A counterfeiter known in prison by the name "Ben Laden" was found guilty Thursday of trying to blow up Chicago's federal courthouse.

A U.S. District Court jury deliberated for about one day before finding Gale Nettles of Chicago guilty of plotting to destroy the courthouse with a bomb that was to be made out of fertilizer and diesel fuel.

Nettles' defense attorney, John Theis, argued that the FBI entrapped Nettles by, among other things, having an undercover officer repeatedly offer to sell him the fertilizer.

But Assistant U.S. Atty. Brandon Fox disputed that in his closing arguments Wednesday.

"This defendant had no reluctance at all," Fox told the jury. "This was something he was going to do from the beginning... He was going to take down this building."

Nettles , 67, was also found guilty of making counterfeit money, some of which he used to obtain the fertilizer. Nettles, who is to be sentenced Jan. 12, was acquitted on one count of providing material support for terrorism. Prosecutors said Nettles hatched the scheme in 2003 while serving a prison term in Yazoo City, Miss., for counterfeiting.

A prison informant tipped authorities to the plan, and after Nettles was released, a sting operation was set in motion, prosecutors said.

After Nettles showed interest in pursuing the plan, undercover agents and informants approached him. They offered him computer equipment to make counterfeit bills and sold him fertilizer, prosecutors said. Although the fertilizer sold could have been dangerous if mixed with fuel, it would not have had Nettles' intended impact, prosecutors said. It was not the type needed for a bomb such as the one used to destroy the federal building in Oklahoma City, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0006209

The FBI provided a fake customer, a cabdriver named "Ali," when Nettles wanted to sell some of the fertilizer at a profit, and agents recorded Nettles' conversations with Ali and others, prosecutors said.

In his closing argument, Theis disparaged the "so-called bombing plot." He said that when Nettles was living in Chicago in 2004, he had no money, no transportation and no means to engage in any such plot.

Theis said Nettles would go weeks or months without contacting the undercover agents, which forced them to call Nettles.

"They are the ones who are putting [the plan] in action," Theis said. "If they just left him alone, we wouldn't be here."

Prosecutors argued, however, that Nettles' statements in prison showed that he was "predisposed" to commit the crime, a factor that can defeat an entrapment defense.

Attorney: 'Joey The Clown' Writes Again (CHIST)

By MIKE ROBINSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 16, 2005

Missing reputed mob figure Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo has written a new letter to his attorney disputing testimony from an FBI agent, the attorney said Thursday.

Lombardo is among 11 alleged organized crime figures accused in a federal indictment last April of conspiring in a series of at least 18 long unsolved mob killings.

When federal agents rounded up those charged in the indictment they were unable to locate Lombardo and he has been missing ever since.

In May, Lombardo attorney Rick Halprin delivered a four page letter from his client to U.S. District Judge James Zagel offering to surrender if he could have a separate trial.

Nothing came of that.

Halprin said in a telephone interview Thursday night that he has received a new letter from the 75-year-old Lombardo, handwritten on both sides of a single page.

Halprin said the letter was postmarked Chicago and dated Aug. 25. He said two Chicago newspaper clippings were in the envelope.

Asked why he is sure that the letter is authentic, Halprin said: "Because I know his printing and I sure know his signature."

Halprin said the letter takes issue with testimony before the Illinois Gaming Board by John Mallul, the head of one of the FBI's Chicago-based organized crime squads.

The testimony came at a July 19 hearing at which the Gaming Board was trying to cancel the dormant license of the Emerald Riverboat Gambling Casino which was to be based in Rosemont.

Mallul testified that in May 1999, Lombardo and other mob figures and mob associates met with Donald Stephens, the mayor of the tiny suburb near O'Hare International Airport.

Stephens has denied that such a meeting ever took place.

Halprin said Lombardo denies it in his letter.

"He says he's willing to take a lie-detector test or take truth serum," Halprin said.

Asked how Lombardo could take a lie-detector test while on the lam, Halprin said: "There is a logistical problem with that sentiment."

Halprin said he had not shown the letter to anyone. He said the letter was addressed to him and not to Zagel or federal prosecutors.

But he said that if prosecutors think "there is forensic value in it they can subpoena it."

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Randall Samborn, declined to comment.

Second Lombardo Letter Surfaces (WMAQ-TV)

WMAQ-TV, September 16, 2005

CHICAGO -- Joseph Lombardo, who is alleged to be one of Chicago top mobsters, sent his attorney another letter, Unit 5's Carol Marin reported exclusively on Thursday.

Lombardo, who carries the nickname "The Clown," has been on the run since April, when he was indicted on racketeering conspiracy charges. While he has not been seen, he is being heard from.

"Dear Rick," said Lombardo to his attorney, Rick Halprin, in his latest letter. "How can a person be in so much trouble without committing a crime?"

Lombardo's letter was dated Aug. 24 and postmarked Aug. 25 -- in Chicago.

"I have no idea where Mr. Lombardo is," Halprin said.

It was the second time Halprin has a received a letter from his client since his indictment. Lombardo is one of 14 reputed mobsters implicated in 18 unsolved murders. But that is not why Lombardo wrote his attorney, Marin reported. Rather, it was two Chicago Sun-Times articles Lombardo clipped and included his letter. One of the stories linked Lombard to Donald Stephens, the mayor of Rosemont.

For years, Stephens has tried to have a casino built in the town he founded 50 years ago. And also for years, Stephens has battled allegations of mob connections, including an FBI agent's testimony in July that Stephens met mobsters, including Lombardo, for dinner in 1999.

"Let me inform you it is positively a lie," Lombardo said in his letter.

Illinois Attorney General Lisa Madigan has moved to deny Rosemont a gambling license, citing Stephens' alleged involvement with the Chicago Outfit. But appearing at a hearing before the Illinois Gaming Commission, Stephens said he actually threw the outfit out of Rosemont decades ago.

When asked about whether there is definitive evidence that proves that Rosemont is mobbed up, Bob Clifford, an attorney representing the Emerald Casino that was to have been built in Rosemont, said, "we are talking about speculative evidence. We're talking about triple quadruple hearsay."

Lombardo has said he's willing to take truth serum or a lie detector test alongside the FBI agent to see who is telling the truth, Marin reported. In his other letter, written to federal Judge James Zagel, Lombardo also proclaimed his innocence. The U.S. attorney's office did not have any comment.

Stephens: I Didn't Meet With Mob (CHIST)

By CAROL MARIN AND SHAMUS TOOMEY, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, September 16, 2005

Rosemont Mayor Donald E. Stephens adamantly denied under oath Thursday that he met with the mob in 1999 to talk about a casino for his town. And, in an ironic twist, a reputed mob boss on the lam is backing him up.

Joey "The Clown" Lombardo fired off a letter to his lawyer last month denying an FBI informant's claim that Lombardo and other alleged hoodlums met with Stephens at Armand's, an Elmwood Park restaurant, according to Rick Halprin, Lombardo's lawyer.

"Let me inform you that it is positively a lie," the hand-printed letter, which included misspellings, read. "I have never, never, ever sat down with Mayor Stephens and the rest of the names in the article. I will take truth serum or lie detector test if the agent and there reliable witness will take one. It has to be done by a private co., not the FBI."

Lombardo, 76, has been missing since a major federal indictment linking the mob to 18 unsolved murders came down in April. Shortly after the indictment, a letter from Lombardo arrived by mail at Halprin's Chicago office. That letter, postmarked in Chicago and directed at U.S. District Court Judge James B. Zagel, proclaimed his innocence and asked for a separate trial from the others indicted.

The latest letter was dated Aug. 24 and postmarked Aug. 25 in Chicago. The letter was on three-ring notebook paper and was accompanied by two Chicago Sun-Times articles, including a July 19 clipping about Lombardo's alleged meeting with Stephens, Halprin said.

"I have no idea where Mr. Lombardo is," Halprin said. "I'm saying the same thing I've said over and over again: It's my obligation to tell Joey, I can only tell him he should surrender himself and prepare for trial."

'Ridiculous nonsense'

FBI agent John Mallul had testified on July 18 that an informant told him of the Armand's meeting. Mallul's testimony came during a state Gaming Board hearing to revoke the license of Emerald Casino, which has been trying to open a casino in Rosemont but has been bogged down by mob allegations.

Lombardo says he also sent a separate letter to Rosemont's village attorney denying the Armand's meeting. "And also if I met with these people on that date, May 29th, 1999 I would have been in violation of my parole and probation," the letter to Halprin read.

Rosemont attorney Bob Stephenson confirmed he recently received two letters, purportedly from Lombardo. One appeared to mirror the Halprin letter, the other was a brief note in which Lombardo told Stephenson he remembered him from an old Teamsters trial, Stephenson said. The letters were signed "Joseph Lombardo I'm an innocent man," wording similar to the letter sent in the spring.

The Rosemont letters were turned over to the feds, Stephenson said.

DOJ_NMG_0006211

Word of the latest round of Lombardo correspondence came as Stephens testified before retired Judge Abner Mikva, who will rule whether Emerald should lose its gaming license. Stephens testified he was "absolutely not" at the Armand's meeting -- and said he had never even been to the restaurant.

Outside of the hearing, Stephens, 77, called the Armand's allegation "such ridiculous nonsense."

'I hate my son-in-law'

"The FBI agent said there was some informant. Well, at the very least, the informant's a liar," Stephens said. "As a matter of fact, I also understand that my [ex-]son-in-law was at this meeting. I've got news for you, I hate my son-in-law. I've never gone around the block with him in my car. Never."

Ex-Mobster Claims An FBI Cover-Up (NYS)

By JERRY CAPECI

New York Sun, September 16, 2005

A turncoat Luchese mobster who helped authorities nail two suspects in the deadly Seton Hall arson five years ago has now turned the tables on law enforcement, claiming that a high-level FBI agent, together with New Jersey investigators, have knowingly kept an innocent man incarcerated for 12 years for a murder he didn't commit.

In a 14-page affidavit, mob defector Thomas Ricciardi, whose cooperation has also led to convictions of mobsters and mob associates, alleged that the officials learned they had wrongly convicted the gangster just four days after he was found guilty in 1993.

Driver For The Mob Gets 20 Years (NYNSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, September 16, 2005

Anthony Urso, the driver for Bonanno boss Joseph Massino who briefly took over command of the crime family in 2003, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for the killing of a mob associate.

"I am sorry for the harm I did to my own family," Urso, 69, said before U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis sentenced him in Brooklyn Thursday

Urso, known by the moniker "Tony Green," told Garaufis he earned the nickname because he once worked at a company known as "T. Green."

Urso, who had been living in East Meadow until his arrest, pleaded guilty earlier in the year to taking part in the murder of Anthony Tomasulo. Tomasulo, a Bonanno family associate, was killed in May 1990 after he allegedly failed to pass along some of his illegal gambling proceeds from joker-poker machines to the crime family administration, officials said.

Informants and trial testimony revealed that Tomasulo was shot to death.

Urso could have faced as much as 30 years in prison, his lawyer, Edward P. Jenks of Mineola, said. Jenks said his client had no legal problems until the current case.

"This guy never had a parking ticket until now," he said. "Effectively it is a life sentence."

Urso had been a driver for Massino over the years. Massino, who was convicted in July 2004, is now a cooperating witness for the government.

Blagojevich Surfaces In Pension Probe (CHIST)

By CHRIS FUSCO, DAVE MCKINNEY AND SCOTT FORNEK, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, September 16, 2005

Gov. Blagojevich and two top fund-raisers schemed to steer lucrative state pension deals to investment firms and consultants who agreed to donate to Blagojevich's campaign, a key figure in a widening corruption probe claims he's been told.

The unproved but explosive allegation surfaced Thursday in a federal plea deal by Chicago lawyer Joseph Cari, a former finance chairman for the Democratic National Committee. Cari, 52, pleaded guilty to attempted extortion for his role in a kickback scheme the feds say was directed by former state teacher pension board member Stuart Levine.

'Fund-raising strategy'

Blagojevich said he had "no knowledge whatsoever" about any pension deals being traded for contributions to his campaign. "Absolutely not," the governor said. "I know nothing about any of that."

Cari's 17-page plea offers no indication he ever spoke directly to Blagojevich or anybody from his political fund-raising operation, but the document laid out a broad "fund-raising strategy" outlined to Cari by Levine. Levine told Cari that he and Blagojevich's two fund-raisers would "not let an Illinois public pension fund . . . invest in a private equity fund" unless that firm hired a consultant they chose, and that consultant agreed to make "certain political or charitable contributions."

DOJ_NMG_0006212

Blagojevich was not specifically named in the Cari plea, which referred to him as "Public Official A." Sources confirmed to the Chicago Sun-Times that the governor is Official A. The administration said it had no idea who Official A is.

Top Blagojevich fund-raisers Antoin "Tony" Rezko and Christopher G. Kelly were referred to in the plea as "two close associates" of the governor who helped him "pick law firms, investment banking firms and consultants that would help Public Official A." The Sun-Times confirmed their identities through the same sources.

Blagojevich, Kelly and Rezko have not been charged with any wrongdoing. Attempts to reach Kelly and Rezko were unsuccessful.

Also Thursday, former teacher pension board outside counsel Steven Loren, 50, pleaded guilty to tax-related charges tied to the alleged scheme. Both Cari and Loren are cooperating with prosecutors.

The scheme outlined in Cari's plea deal is similar to allegations raised earlier this year by Blagojevich's estranged father-in-law, Chicago Ald. Richard Mell (33rd), who accused Kelly of orchestrating appointments to state boards and commissions in exchange for contributions to Blagojevich.

Under threat of lawsuit from Kelly, Mell retracted the claim. But it still triggered a probe into the administration's hiring and contracting practices by Attorney General Lisa Madigan and Cook County State's Attorney Richard Devine. To date, no charges have arisen from that investigation.

'This is speculation'

Levine, who has pleaded not guilty to defrauding the state teacher pension system, would seem an unusual source about the inner workings of Blagojevich's campaign -- he was the top fund-raiser for Blagojevich's 2002 GOP opponent, former Attorney General Jim Ryan. Still, Blagojevich reappointed Levine to two state panels, including the Teachers' Retirement System of Illinois. After Blagojevich took office, Levine contributed $4,267 worth of free air travel to his campaign.

Levine often spoke of his ties to Rezko and openly discussed how Rezko helped reappoint him to the teacher pension board, according to one source familiar with the probe. Records involving Rezko and a consulting firm he ran were sought by a subpoena investigators sent to TRS.

Cari was familiar with the teacher pension board because he was a partner and managing director of HealthPoint LLC, a New York investment firm that secured two TRS investments worth $35 million in 2003. Cari and other principals in HealthPoint contributed $30,500 to Blagojevich's $14.3 million campaign fund, records show.

Despite his ties to top national Democrats, Cari knew Levine and backed Ryan against Blagojevich.

In his plea, Cari admitted he acted as Levine's emissary and tried to get a Virginia real estate investment firm, JER Partners, to pay an $850,000 fee to an unnamed consultant who would do no work on the deal. Cari believed that if JER "hired the consultant identified by Levine, the consultant would be required to make political or charitable contributions as directed by Levine and Public Official A's associates," according to the document.

Talking to a JER lawyer, Cari said the fee "was political and this was how Public Official A handled patronage." At Levine's insistence, he repeatedly told JER officials that if the fee agreement wasn't executed, the $85 million investment JER appeared poised to secure would be dropped from an upcoming board agenda.

A pension official, however, kept JER on the agenda. The consultant was not hired and JER won the investment deal.

Cheryle Jackson, Blagojevich's communications director, downplayed the credibility of Cari's statements. "This is speculation based on testimony from an admitted extortionist who was told this by someone twice accused of extortion himself." Jackson said the feds have not contacted the governor.

Pension Probe's Spotlight Widens (CHIT)

Pleading guilty Thursday to attempted extortion, a prominent Democratic fundraiser said he was told that a "high-ranking Illinois public official" was behind a kickback scheme that steered state pension-fund investments to favored businesses in exchange for campaign contributions.

The plea agreement by attorney Joseph Cari, a former finance chairman for the Democratic National Committee, launched a new and potentially far-reaching phase of the investigation into influence peddling at the state's multibillion-dollar public pension funds.

In Cari's plea agreement and a related one by a former pension board attorney, prosecutors for the first time suggested that their investigation had gone beyond the dealings of political insiders at obscure pension panels to include a prominent government official orchestrating a scheme to siphon campaign cash and reward donors.

Neither plea agreement named the high-ranking person in Illinois government. He was referred to simply as "Public Official A."

Gov. Rod Blagojevich was peppered with questions about the plea agreements at an unrelated news conference but said he had no knowledge of them. Later, asked if the governor's office knew who the high-ranking Illinois official was, Blagojevich spokeswoman Abby Ottenhoff said, "We don't know who Official A is."

"The only people who know that are the feds. You'd have to ask them," Ottenhoff said. "This is speculation based on testimony from an admitted extortionist who got his information from a person who was twice accused of extortion himself."

Asked if federal investigators had questioned the governor, Ottenhoff said, "Not on this matter."

But Ottenhoff disclosed for the first time that federal investigators had questioned Blagojevich earlier this year about allegations that his administration traded appointments to state boards and commissions for campaign contributions. Blagojevich denied any wrongdoing, she said.

In pleading guilty to one count of attempted extortion, Cari said Stuart Levine acted as a conduit between the unnamed public official and the state Teachers' Retirement System to steer pension business to people and firms that would help the public official.

Levine is a prominent campaign donor who was initially named by a Republican governor to be a trustee of the pension fund for public teachers outside Chicago. He was reappointed by Blagojevich. Levine has pleaded not guilty to earlier charges that he extorted kickbacks from investment firms seeking pension fund business.

`A fundraising strategy'

In his plea agreement, Cari acknowledged trying to participate in a kickback scheme with Levine in 2004. He said Levine told him the selection of pension fund investors and others was motivated by politics.

"Levine said that a high-ranking Illinois public official [Public Official A], acting through two close associates, was selecting consultants for the private equity funds that appeared before the state pension funds," Cari's plea agreement said.

"Levine said that this was part of a fundraising strategy. Levine said that Public Official A, and his associates, were going to pick law firms, investment banking firms, and consultants that would help Public Official A," the plea agreement said.

The plea agreement said "Levine told Cari that consultants selected by Levine and those associates would subsequently be required to make certain political or charitable contributions as directed by Levine and those associates."

When a firm balked at hiring a Levine-selected consultant, who would do no work, Cari told the firm, according to the plea agreement, "that it was political and this was how Public Official A handled patronage."

Cari had repeatedly demanded that the firm, Virginia-based JER Inc., pay an $850,000 consulting fee, equal to 1 percent of the $85 million it was seeking from the teacher pension board to invest. Cari, in the plea agreement, said Levine repeatedly threatened to pull the JER investment from the agenda of the pension board unless the consulting fee was paid.

Cari said in his plea agreement that he believed Levine wielded great power over the teacher pension board and that "if Levine did not want something to be approved by the TRS board, it would not be approved."

In a related move, Steven Loren, formerly an outside attorney for the teacher pension board, pleaded guilty to one count of obstructing the Internal Revenue Service for allegedly helping Levine work a kickback scheme involving a Levine-favored consultant paid through a sham contract. The consultant received a finder's fee by an investment firm that got pension-fund business.

In the plea agreement, Loren said it was his understanding that "Levine's associates, who were close to a high-ranking public official, would use those placement fees as an incentive or reward to those who made campaign contributions that would benefit the high-ranking public official."

The plea agreement indicates that Loren began cooperating with the federal government early in its investigation. Loren gave prosecutors what is called a proffer letter on Nov. 23, laying out his knowledge of the activities of Levine and others.

That proffer and a one in July show that Loren was cooperating not only in the pension-fund case, but also in a second investigation involving Levine's role at the state's hospital planning and construction board, where he has previously been charged with extorting bribes, according to the plea agreement.

Levine has pleaded not guilty to those charges as well.

Sentencings postponed

Cari, 52, of Chicago and Loren, 50, of Highland Park, pleaded guilty just minutes apart in U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve's courtroom.

Both are cooperating in the continuing federal probe, according to their plea agreements with the government. Their sentencings were indefinitely postponed until after their cooperation has been completed.

Under their plea deals with prosecutors, Cari faces about 2 years in prison, while Loren faces under 12 months in prison or possibly probation.

Each remains free on bail.

Both defendants and their lawyers, former U.S. Atty. Scott Lassar and Michael Siegel, declined to comment as they left the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse. So too did Levine's attorneys.

Aides to Blagojevich said that neither the governor nor his top administrative officials had been questioned about the pension investigation.

But Ottenhoff, the governor's spokeswoman, said Blagojevich had been interviewed by federal investigators in late February or early March about allegations, raised by the governor's father-in-law, Chicago Ald. Richard Mell (33rd), that appointments were traded for campaign cash.

"He answered the questions they had about Mell's allegations and he's never heard back," Ottenhoff said.

Mell recanted his allegations under the threat of a defamation lawsuit by top Blagojevich adviser and fundraiser Christopher Kelly. But Mell's accusations prompted Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan and Cook County State's Atty. Richard Devine to open a joint investigation that is ongoing.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office declined to comment Thursday on the plea agreements or the administration's acknowledgement that federal investigators were reviewing Mell's allegations.

Landscape Exec Admits Bribing Parks Official (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, September 16, 2005

A former landscaping company executive on Thursday admitted his role in a scheme to pay $137,000 in bribes to a Chicago Park District official to help win $8 million in contracts at Millennium Park and other city properties.

John Kevin Haas, the former chief operations officer at James Michael Inc., pleaded guilty to two counts of fraud in U.S. District Court in Chicago.

In a plea agreement, Haas, 57, of Gurnee, admitted he made arrangements to send former parks official Shirley McMayon to a Wisconsin resort in 2000, bought a computer for her son and helped orchestrate other payoffs.

Haas, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, described bribes to McMayon that included cash, ski vacations and $22,000 to help pay off McMayon's loan on a Dodge Durango.

The plea deal calls for Haas to be sentenced to 2 years, 7 months in prison, forfeit $350,000 in wrongly obtained profits and pay restitution of $49,000.

Without cooperation, Haas would have faced a likely sentence of 37 to 46 months under federal sentencing guidelines.

U.S. District Judge David Coar must approve the deal. No date has been set for sentencing.

Prosecutors allege that Haas made payoffs along with Michael Lowecki, who owned the Mundelein landscaping company, in a scheme that ran from 2000 to 2004.

McMayon, the district's former director of natural resources, pleaded guilty two weeks ago. She agreed to cooperate in a plea deal that calls for her to receive a 34-month sentence.

Fraud and bribery charges are pending against Lowecki. He has pleaded not guilty.

According to Haas' plea agreement, he and Lowecki had concerns about how much they were paying McMayon. The two men agreed in 2001 that the company would not give McMayon more than 2 percent of the revenue the company got from the Park District, the plea deal said.

Legislator Resigns Amid Federal Inquiry (NYT)

By Stacey Stowe

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Sept. 15 - A veteran state senator who is under federal investigation resigned here on Thursday morning in a fiery speech on the steps of City Hall.

The senator, Ernest E. Newton II, a Democrat who represented Bridgeport for 17 years, was the target of a raid on his office in February by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in connection with an inquiry into a job training program here.

DOJ_NMG_0006215

The head of that program, Warren Keith Godbolt, pleaded guilty on Aug. 2 to charges that included offering a $5,000 bribe to an unnamed public official in exchange for securing a $100,000 state grant. He is cooperating with the authorities, according to court papers filed by prosecutors.

Mr. Newton has not been charged. He said on Thursday that he was resigning from his Senate seat for the sake of his family. He said that his wife had multiple sclerosis and that one of his sons needed to go to college and the other "had some problems."

His voice alternately raspy and booming, Mr. Newton said, "You all can't ask me about my trial; that's not what this is about." His lawyer, Salvatore C. DePiano, also declined to comment.

"I've made some mistakes in my life," Mr. Newton, an advocate for minorities and the poor during his tenure, told about 200 supporters who murmured or shouted their support. "Charge it to my head, not my heart."

Last month, Mr. Godbolt, the executive director of Progressive Training Associates, admitted in court papers to making $5,000 in payments to an unnamed public official in exchange for the state grant. On June 4, 2004, according to those papers, that public official announced he had secured a $100,000 state grant for the job center.

Mr. Newton was the official who made the announcement that day.

Mr. Godbolt also pleaded guilty to embezzling more than $70,000 from the center, for purchases that included a $24,000 BMW. He is scheduled to be sentenced on Nov. 14.

Mr. Newton said he was proud of his record and called himself the "Moses of my people." He said he would step down rather than force an expensive legislative inquiry.

He spoke to rain-soaked reporters and camera crews from a cross-embossed lectern under an umbrella, flanked by his sons and his pastor. During his statement he chastised the press. "The media has already convicted me," he said.

For the announcement, Mr. Newton wore a cinnamon-colored chalk-stripe suit and a satin fez. A sartorial standout in the Connecticut General Assembly, he favored double-breasted suits in purple or pale pink and the occasional fedora.

A supporter, Clyde Nicholson, said afterward: "This ain't about $5,000. It's about taking a black man out, one of the most powerful black men in the state."

In a statement, Gov. M. Jodi Rell noted that Mr. Newton had not been charged, but she said, "I am disappointed by the chain of events that led to today's announcement." Many of Mr. Newton's Democratic colleagues, including Mayor John Fabrizi of Bridgeport, expressed sadness.

A special election to fill his seat will be held in November and will coincide with state mayoral contests.

County Seeks FBI Probe Into $6.4 Million Loan (HAMJN)

By Candice Brooks, Butler County Bureau

Hamilton (OH) Journal News, September 16, 2005

HAMILTON — The Butler County Commissioners unanimously agreed Thursday to sever an agreement with a fiber optics firm and request an FBI investigation into why the firm obtained multi-million-dollar loans in the county's name, allegedly without commissioners' approval.

"We are standing as a team to protect the finances and integrity of Butler County," Commission President Charles Furmon said. This was the third time that Furmon had urged his fellow commissioners to end the agreement.

Cincinnati-based Dynus Technologies, formerly CBS Technologies, obtained loans for $2.4 million Sept. 2, 2004 and $4 million Dec. 31, 2004 from National City Bank to lease equipment used in fiber optic networking.

The commissioners and Dynus began negotiating an economic development agreement in September 2004, but the agreement — now terminated — was not approved until July 28 and the county never assumed financial obligation for it, county officials insisted.

Dynus would have used four of the county fibers and, in exchange, the company agreed to attract 100 new jobs within three years and give the county 10 percent of the profit from customers using its high-speed internet, phone, and data services.

The company paid on the bank loan for nine months. However, county officials said they were surprised on Sept. 2 to receive an invoice for a $99,485.78 payment on the remaining $5.3 million in debt. County officials and the county prosecutor's office also said they were surprised documents appeared to show that Dynus President Jim Smith signed the lease agreement and other documents as a county agent.

In addition, County Auditor Kay Rogers signed at least six documents stating that Smith was a county agent even though the county commissioners said they never approved a resolution to give Smith the authority to incur debt for the county.

Rogers said Smith misled her to believe the documents were for tax purposes and she insists she told him the commissioners' approval would be required.

Commissioner Gregory Jolivette on Thursday expressed his disappointment in Rogers and Dynus officials.

"What did she think Dynus would do with these documents — put them in a waste paper basket or in a file?" he said. "It just disturbs me that she would take these actions in so many different documents — six or seven. (I'm) extremely disappointed with Dynus Corporation for not being more up front with us regarding their dealings. As they entered into this agreement in September and all through 2005 until we signed the agreement in July, we've had meetings with them and not once did they disclose that they had a financial agreement with National City Bank with our name on it."

Commissioner Mike Fox said Dynus officials were specifically asked during a meeting in February if they expected Butler County to accept any financial obligation and the response was no.

"It appears that the county was the object of a grand scheme and a con," Fox said. "Representations were made that were obviously inaccurate."

Furmon said he contacted the FBI earlier in the week and Fox said the county prosecutor's office would cooperate with the FBI.

"We have received the complaint from the commissioner," said Michael Brooks, spokesman for the Cincinnati FBI. "We'll make a determination if an investigation should be conducted."

Jolivette also asked that County Administrator Derek Conklin check other banks for unknown loans in the county's name because the commissioners would not have know about the Dynus loan had an invoice not been sent.

"I support the Commissioners' decision to terminate the contract with Dynus," Rogers said, but insisted "I did nothing wrong.

"There is no financial obligation to the county, as I have previously stated. I am concerned that some of the forms in question appear to contain fraudulance, (sic) and do not contain my actual signature. This is also apparently true of one of our Commissioners, and one of the employees of my office.

"As far as the forms that do contain my signature, I was only verifying my knowledge of the documents and the funds available to the county, since my office was overseeing the Fiber Optics Project. I was always clear to representatives from Dynus that the Commissioners, and only the Commissioners, may act as contracting agents for Butler County. If my signature was used improperly by outside agents, it is extremely unfortunate... The Commissioners know that in 10 years I have operated a highly professional office with full integrity."

Tom Rowe, spokesman for Dynus Technologies, said there was a meeting Wednesday between Dynus officials and county administrative officials and National City Bank officials.

"Based on this meeting, we agreed to continue our discussions toward a mutually agreeable solution to this matter," Rowe said. "We are committed to resolving this outside the courtroom.

"We anticipated the commissioners were going to take this action this morning,"

Scott Owens, executive director of the Butler Republican Party, and West Chester Township Trustee George Lang are both executives with Dynus. State Rep. Bill Coley (R-West Chester Township) has served as legal counsel for National City Bank.

County Republican Party Chair Carlos Todd said he has "purposely stayed out" of the matter, but said when he knows the facts he would make a statement.

Butler County Democratic Party Chair Dan Gattermeyer said the Republican Party must ask Rogers to resign.

"Our county deserves better government that the activities of Republican Kay Rogers in relation to the Dynus Technologies debacle," Gattermeyer said in a statement. "One party rule results in leaders who feel insulated and not accountable for their actions. The first step in changing this mindset is for all, Republicans and Democrats alike, to join in calling for Kay Roger's resignation."

Bronson Records Seized In Federal Grand Jury Probe (GAINSUN)

By KAREN VOYLES, Sun staff writer

Gainesville (FL) Sun, September 16, 2005

BRONSON - About two years ago, town councilman Aaron Edmondson started asking questions about why some new lights on the mayor's property looked so much like the new lights the town had just received.

Edmondson's curiosity led to a joint local and state investigation into embezzlement that ended with the mayor, James Blaine "Jamie" Griffin, going to state prison and the town clerk, June Greenlee, being put on probation.

On Thursday an FBI agent served a subpoena on the town for its financial records. The subpoena ordered all the town's financial records from Jan. 1, 2000, through Wednesday be delivered to the federal grand jury in Gainesville by Oct. 25. Subpoenas for town records were also delivered to Bronson banks. Mayor Beatrice Mongo said she expects the federal government will dig even deeper than state officials dug.

"Apparently they (federal investigators) don't think justice was served," Mongo said. "They told me they are not just looking at the people who got caught last time. They are looking at everybody and everything."

Town officials and others close to the case said there are at least two situations that likely caught the attention of the federal government.

A check made out to the Internal Revenue Service during the previous mayor's tenure was allegedly used to pay more than $2,000 in personal back taxes.

The other possible factor was $1 million in the form of two Community Development Block Grants that was not spent according to the contract signed by the town.

State Attorney Bill Cervone, whose office prosecuted Griffin and Greenlee on the state charges, said having the federal government pursue the same case is rare but does happen.

"It's an occasional thing, but when there is anything involving federal money, they are much more likely to be interested," Cervone said.

Lawyer Says Threats From Gotti Made Him Alter Strategy (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

Law.com, September 16, 2005

The former attorney for Frank LoCascio, a co-defendant of John Gotti Sr. in a 1992 murder and racketeering trial, testified Thursday that he tailored his defense strategy to suit Gotti after the now deceased mob boss threatened him.

"He would take care of me -- and I knew what that meant," the attorney, Anthony Cardinale, said Thursday during an evidentiary hearing in Brooklyn federal court.

The alleged threat, he said, came during a break in the trial while Cardinale was cross-examining the prosecution's star witness, Salvatore "Sammy the Bull" Gravano.

Cardinale had considered asking Gravano if he knew that LoCascio was not involved in one of the central charges of the indictment, the murder of Louis DiBono. But after Gotti spoke with him, Cardinale said, he did not ask for fear of making LoCascio look better at the expense of Gotti.

"I was afraid, if that's what you're asking, yes," Cardinale told LoCascio's appellate lawyer, Herald Price Fahringer of Lipsitz, Green, Fahringer, Roll, Salisbury & Cambria.

Cardinale also said he did not meet with LoCascio alone after Gotti told him not to, and changed the tenor of his overall defense and his closing arguments to emphasize Gotti's innocence.

Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Firestone, however, Cardinale would not say that his actions constituted an ethical breach or ineffective assistance of counsel.

"I really don't have a feeling one way or another on that issue," Cardinale said, clearly uncomfortable on the witness stand. "That's for others to decide. I think I did the very best I could have done for Mr. LoCascio under the circumstances."

Cardinale, a Boston attorney, was testifying at a hearing that was ordered in January by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The circuit asked Eastern District Judge I. Leo Glasser to determine if LoCascio received ineffective assistance of counsel and deserved a new trial.

Cardinale did not tell LoCascio or anyone else about the threat. Only after Gotti died three years ago did he mention it to another of LoCascio's appellate attorneys, Thomas Harvey, who revealed the incident.

Cardinale refused to submit an affidavit about the alleged threat out of fear of retaliation. His testimony Thursday was compelled by subpoena.

Judge Glasser, who presided over the 1992 trial, previously rejected LoCascio's request for a new trial, ruling that Gotti's attempt to orchestrate defense attorneys -- including those of his co-defendants -- was well known. He also rejected four previous attempts to appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0006218

But the 2nd Circuit in January ordered a hearing on the matter, describing it as a "close call." The court noted that Cardinale, who took the case after LoCascio's first attorney was disqualified, was not an "in-house" attorney for the Gotti organization.

Firestone tried to further blunt the attack on Cardinale's performance by pointing out that Gotti and LoCascio were tried and defended jointly before any threat was made.

Referring to transcripts from the 1992 trial, he pointed to moments when Cardinale, during his closing arguments, singled out LoCascio, not Gotti, for the jury's attention. He also noted that Cardinale continued to work for Gotti, for no pay, on his appeals in the years following the convictions.

Gotti died in June 2002 while serving a life term in prison. LoCascio, 72, is also serving a life sentence.

Glasser reserved decision to allow the parties to make supplemental arguments.

Fugitive In Armored Car Theft Gives Up After 12 Years (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

LAS VEGAS, Sept. 15 - A woman who became one of the most sought after fugitives in the United States after disappearing with an armored car and $2.5 million ended almost 12 years on the run on Thursday when she walked into a federal courthouse here and surrendered.

The woman, Heather C. Tallchief, was a driver for Loomis Armored, now Loomis Fargo, on Oct. 1, 1993, when while making a stop at the Circus Circus casino hotel she took off with her truck and its contents, leaving behind two other guards.

Over the years, the authorities have said they were baffled about how Ms. Tallchief and her suspected accomplice, Roberto Solis, who had served time in prison for killing an armored car driver in 1969, eluded capture.

The case had been repeatedly broadcast on crime programs, including "America's Most Wanted" on Fox. A spokesman for the F.B.I. said Thursday that she had been a "highly sought after fugitive."

In an interview before her surrender, she said she was in Europe much of the time, out of reach of the money and working as a hotel maid.

In a court appearance in the afternoon, Ms. Tallchief, 33, was ordered held on charges that included bank larceny, fraud, conspiracy and making false statements to obtain a passport. A hearing was set for Sept. 29.

Ms. Tallchief, dressed in a gray blazer, a pink blouse and pale olive slacks, was led away in handcuffs and leg irons.

This week, Ms. Tallchief's lawyer, Robert Axelrod, interviewed his client on videotape in Los Angeles in hopes of selling her story to Hollywood. The two people said they would use the proceeds to reimburse the stolen money.

They allowed The New York Times to observe the interview and ask follow-up questions on condition that the newspaper not publish an article until the surrender.

Contrary to previous reports, Ms. Tallchief said she was not the mastermind behind the crime, but rather a victim of Mr. Solis's brainwashing. The criminal complaint does not say who organized the scheme but describes the two people as planning and carrying it out together.

Ms. Tallchief, a Seneca born in Buffalo, N.Y., said she lived a largely unhappy life, ostracized at school as she followed the punk rock scene and becoming addicted to crack.

She eventually obtained a general equivalency diploma and a nursing assistant certificate and worked in hospitals and clinics in the San Francisco Bay area, but , she said, had trouble keeping jobs. When she had hit bottom, she met Mr. Solis, more than 20 years older, through a friend at a nightclub.

She said he kept an altar in his apartment with a goat's head, crystals and tarot cards, all of which she initially found shocking but came to accept his beliefs, particularly that their meeting and "spiritual journey" were predestined.

In the tape with Mr. Axelrod, she said Mr. Solis constantly showed her tapes in the weeks leading up to the crime that had a hypnotic effect.

"They allegedly opened your mind but made you more receptive" to suggestion, she said. "They had lots of swirling colors like a tie-dye t-shirt."

Ms. Tallchief said his sway was so powerful that she hardly questioned him, even as he steered her toward finding work at Loomis.

"He was reformed," she said in the interview. "He wrote poetry. I knew his mother. He was a very normal person. If you sat down and met him, you would probably actually enjoy him. You would laugh at his jokes. You would think he was a nice person. There was never anything about him that you would think he was a heinous, horrible murdering con."

Ms. Tallchief said she followed Mr. Solis's instructions up to and on the day of the crime "almost like a robot." She said recalled little about the planning.

After driving off her route with the truck, she said, she drove to a warehouse, but did not know what happened to the money after helping Mr. Solis load it into boxes there. "I probably asked him about it but he wouldn't ever answer," Ms. Tallchief said, adding that when the subject came up he would say things like: " 'Don't worry about it. I'm taking care of it. It's O.K. It's safe. I've got it under control.' "

She took flight, she said, at first disguised as an old woman in a wheelchair pushed by Mr. Solis. She later led a low-key life in Amsterdam as a hotel maid, affecting an English accent that she still faintly speaks with now.

She declined to discuss how she slipped out of the United States with Mr. Solis and how she returned. Mr. Axelrod said she re-entered through Los Angeles a few days ago.

Ms. Tallchief said she had seen a psychiatrist in Los Angeles in the last few days.

She added that she had no contact with Mr. Solis after she took their took their infant son and left him. The boy, now 10, is in Amsterdam with friends of Ms. Tallchief.

Mr. Solis, 60, is at large.

Mr. Axelrod said that though the notion of being brainwashed "is a hard concept to follow" he believed a jury or the authorities would find that a "mitigating factor" in her case. He would not let Ms. Tallchief answer whether she would plead guilty, though she does not deny carrying out the crime.

Joe Parris, a supervisory agent for the F.B.I. in Washington, declined to comment on her brainwashing statement. A spokeswoman for the United States attorney here said the office would have no comment.

Ms. Tallchief said she decided to abandon her flight for the sake of her son, who she fears will ultimately suffer consequences of her crime. The boy, she said, does not have a legitimate birth certificate or other documentation and is growing curious about her past and his.

"I didn't give my child a normal life, but I think I am on the way to doing that," Ms. Tallchief said in the taping of the video, which a Hollywood producer, Robert Aaronson, is trying to sell to television networks and studios.

Mark Clark, a spokesman for Loomis, Fargo, said repaying the stolen money "would be a nice gesture" but he declined to address the case in detail, saying the company would "let it take its course."

Living abroad, Ms. Tallchief said, she avoided Americans and did not socialize much, to avoid people asking about her past.

"I've learned how to not have so many close friends, so I don't get asked all the questions," she said. "It's a lonely life, being a fugitive. And I certainly don't go to, you know, book clubs and, you know, cake sales and stuff. I don't have coffee morning with the girls."

Ms. Tallchief's history is the subject of a screenplay that is being worked on. A former chairman of 20th Century Fox, Bill Mechanic, who produces films through his own company, Pandemonium, in Los Angeles, said his company was finishing a script based on the robbery.

For all its dramatic potential, Ms. Tallchief's life on the run ended in anticlimactic fashion. Accompanied by her lawyers, she entered the office of the United States marshal at 9:29 a.m., sat on a couch and tapped her foot as officers conferred and then, after about 20 minutes, led her away.

Fugitive Surrenders For Las Vegas Armored Truck Heist (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-A woman on the FBI Most Wanted list accused in a $3.1 million (â,¬2.5 million) armored truck heist surrendered Thursday after more than 10 years on the run.

Heather Catherine Tallchief is accused of driving an armored truck loaded with cash away from the Circus Circus casino in October 1993. Speaking to reporters before she gave herself up, Tallchief, one of a handful of women ever on the FBI list, acknowledged her role.

"I truly feel this is the right thing to do," Tallchief said. Her lawyer said her boyfriend, also accused in the heist, "brainwashed" her into participating.

Attorney Robert Axelrod, her lawyer, was with Tallchief when she surrendered at U.S. District Court in Las Vegas. He said she was tired of hiding, and wanted her 10-year-old son to have a chance at living a normal life.

A message seeking comment from the FBI office in Las Vegas was not immediately returned.

Axelrod said Tallchief was an impressionable 21-year-old who blindly followed a persuasive older boyfriend in the Oct. 1, 1993, theft. The boyfriend, Roberto Solis, is now 60 and is still a fugitive on the FBI's Most Wanted list.

Tallchief maintained she was only following Solis' instructions and doesn't know where Solis is now, although they have a son together.

DOJ_NMG_0006220

"He brainwashed her, as surely as a Manson kind of character (or) a Jim Jones kind of character," Axelrod said.

Tallchief eluded authorities by living under an assumed name and working as a maid and at other cash jobs in Amsterdam, Netherlands, her lawyer said.

Police said Tallchief was employed for several months as a driver for Loomis Armored Inc. before she disappeared with a truck loaded with $100 and $20 bills while co-workers filled automatic teller machines inside the casino.

Us Weekly Writer Charged Is Sex Case (LHL)

The Lexington Herald-Leader, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK - An Us Weekly gossip writer found himself on the wrong side of the police blotter after being charged with trying to seduce an FBI agent posing on the Internet as a 13-year-old girl.

Us Weekly suspended Timothy McDarrah, editor of the Hot Stuff column, without pay, a magazine spokesman said Thursday.

McDarrah responded in June to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the "freshest, youngest" girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent, who had posted the advertisement to lure pedophiles, that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said.

After McDarrah failed to show up for a meeting, the agent began sending instant messages in his guise as a 13-year-old girl. McDarrah offered to buy the agent clothes, compact discs and an iPod in exchange for a variety of sexual favors, the agent wrote in the complaint.

On Wednesday, the agent wrote, McDarrah e-mailed that he was waiting at a building the agent had described as the 13-year-old girl's address. FBI agents went there and arrested McDarrah, who is charged with one count of using the Internet to entice a minor into sex, which carries a minimum five-year sentence.

McDarrah was arraigned in Manhattan federal court, held on $50,000 bond and barred from using the Internet or having unsupervised contact with children. He did not enter a plea.

Felon In No-show Job Scam Asks For Early Release (AP)

AP, September 16, 2005

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) A former payroll clerk convicted with three others of swindling thousands of dollars from a city-run vocational school has asked a federal judge for early release from a halfway house.

Jamie Dwyer, 54, has served two months of a six-month sentence at a halfway house in Hartford, Conn., for her role in a no-show job scheme that bled about $50,000 from the Massachusetts Career Development Institute.

Dwyer was convicted of fraud, conspiracy and lying to FBI agents. U.S. District Judge Michael A. Ponsor sentenced her to the halfway house, to be followed by six months home confinement.

But she said she doesn't need the mandatory group counseling and drug-testing at the facility, The Republican of Springfield reported Friday.

``The Hartford House's rehabilitative mission causes me to be subjected to restrictions and rules that are unnecessary and demeaning," Dwyer wrote in an affidavit filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court.

``I have been gainfully employed throughout my adult life," Dwyer continued. ``I successfully raised two children. I do not have problems with alcohol or substance abuse, and I have historically respected authority and the rights of others. I do not need counseling regarding those issues."

Gerald Phillips, MCDI's former executive director, was sentenced to 21 months in prison. Luisa Cardaropoli was sentenced to 15 months in prison for pocketing thousands of dollars from a no-show job she got through Giuseppe Polimeni, who was sentenced to one year in prison.

The charges against all four sprang from an ongoing investigation into public corruption in Springfield that began about five years ago and has netted several indictments and convictions.

Dwyer's lawyer, John S. Ferrara, said Dwyer's sentence is ``disproportionately harsh" compared to other local white-collar felons in separate cases. He pointed to former mayoral aide Cornell Lewis and accountant Salvatore Anzalotti, convicted last year for their roles in swindling $600,000 from a city loan fund. Both received home detention.

The Republican reported that Assistant U.S. Attorney William M. Welch II did not return a call for comment. Is it unknown whether he will oppose Dwyer's motion. It's unclear is when Ponsor will rule.

Taiwan envoy

Douglas Paal, the U.S. government representative to Taiwan, is under fire from the State Department for misrepresenting Taiwan's policies to his bosses.

A State inspector general report said Mr. Paal's leadership style caused low morale among employees of the American Institute in Taiwan, the official U.S. office in Taiwan.

The most serious IG charge, however, is that Mr. Paal falsely reported on Taiwanese issues to senior State Department officials, a cardinal sin for envoys.

Officials familiar with the details of the IG report said Mr. Paal refused to allow dissenting views and was guilty of suppressing reports from U.S. officials who disagreed with his pro-China views.

As a result, the IG concluded that the U.S. government had an inaccurate picture of the situation in Taiwan.

Mr. Paal also angered the Pentagon by blocking for several years the appointment of an active duty military officer to help Taiwan with arms purchases. Army Col. Al Willner, the new Pentagon liaison in Taiwan, is the first U.S. military officer posted in Taiwan since 1979, when diplomatic relations were downgraded.

The report bolsters the views of conservative critics of Mr. Paal in Washington, who have said that he has pro-China views and has not dealt fairly with Taiwan.

As we reported in this column in 2001, Mr. Paal was picked for the Taiwan post even though he gave a speech falsely asserting President Bush had "misspoke" in saying the United States would do whatever it takes to help Taiwan defend itself from a mainland attack.

The U.S. officials discussed the unpublished details in the IG report after they were first disclosed in Taiwan's China Times and Taipei Times newspapers.

Mr. Paal, who is in Washington, could not be reached for comment. A spokesman in Taiwan declined to comment on the IG report.

Detective work

The Army has compiled a list of more than 450 criminal cases whose DNA was tested by a laboratory where an examiner has admitted to making a false entry in one case.

The list includes defendants from military installations across the country and around the world, from the Air Force Academy to Incirlik Air Base in Turkey. The blood testing dates back to 1995.

The exams are being reviewed by the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory in Forest Park, Ga.

In a memo, the laboratory is asking staff judge advocates — the military's lawyers — to contact the Army Criminal Investigative Command about any cases involving DNA.

The Aug. 25 memo, a copy of which we obtained, states that the examiner had been suspended in January 2004 after "permitting contamination in his testing process. After retraining, he was returned to casework on 13 September 2004, initially working one case at a time under supervision."

The false entry was found the following April. "The examiner was suspended from his DNA case work on 3 May 2005," the Army memo states. "In an inquiry initiated on 2 June 2005, the examiner admitted the false entry."

Morgue duty

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has signed off on mortuary teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., deploying to the Gulf Coast.

The job was supposed to be handled by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. But FEMA informed the Pentagon it must first find a contractor for the gritty work.

Nine teams arrived in New Orleans on Tuesday. The team can process 20 remains per day, per team. Another nine teams were on the way. The death toll from Hurricane Katrina in Louisiana is nearing the 500 mark.

After peaking at 72,000, the troop strength in the Gulf Coast has dipped below 65,000.

Inhuman enemy

Army Col. H.R. McMaster is a soldier-scholar who once advised Gen. John Abizaid, the top Middle Easter commander, on how to wage war in Iraq.

Col. McMaster now is in the heat of that battle himself. For the past several weeks, he has led the campaign to retake the border town of Tal Afar.

Col. McMaster appeared in the Pentagon this week via a video hookup to describe how his 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, joined by 3rd Iraqi Army Division, routed most of the extremists.

But it was his description of how the enemy occupied their safe haven that got the most attention. Col. McMaster told of beheadings, gunshot killings, a booby-trapped dead child and kidnappings. "This is the worst of the worst in terms of people in the world," he said. "To protect themselves here, what the enemy did is they waged the most brutal and murderous campaign against the people of Tal Afar. ... The enemy here did just the most horrible things you can imagine, in one case murdering a child, placing a booby trap within the child's body and waiting for the parent to come recover the body of their child and exploding it to kill the parents."

Col. McMaster said his men killed scores of the enemy in a series of firefights up and down the tight streets of the crossroads between Syria, where insurgents train, and the critical northern Iraqi city of Mosul.

"These Iraqi soldiers are brave," he said. "They're courageous. They're building capabilities every day."

Col. McMaster said soldiers captured some associates of lead terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi.

"They are some of the worst human beings on the face of the Earth," he said. "There is no really greater pleasure for us than to kill or capture these particular individuals."

Reform movement

In its effort to reform how it detains and interrogates war-on-terror detainees, the Pentagon and Army have drafted four directives:

·The Department of Defense Directive on the Detainee Program

·The Department of Defense Directive on Intelligence Interrogations, Detainee Debriefings and Tactical Questioning

·Army Field Manual on Human Intelligence Collector Operations

·Joint Publications on Detention and Interrogation Operations.

D.C. Waiter's Assailant Gets 22-Year Term (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

All Adrien Alstad's family wanted to talk about yesterday was the brother, partner and friend he had been over his 55 years, before he was gunned down last year in an early-morning robbery near Dupont Circle.

Gathered in D.C. Superior Court to see one of Alstad's youthful killers sentenced, they were flush with grief over a life lost and with memories of a life lived.

"My heart has been crushed," said his sister, Lynnette Bock, clutching her prepared statement in one trembling hand and a tissue in the other. "There is something so empty inside me."

The pleas for punishment seemed almost angry afterthoughts. But the sentencing was, after all, why they were in the courtroom.

Kurt Williams, 20 and mildly retarded, according to presentencing examinations, had been the lookout as Alstad was robbed and fatally shot Aug. 23, 2004. Alstad, a popular waiter, had just gotten off work when Williams and an accomplice accosted him. It was a crime that struck fear in a usually safe neighborhood, and it was neither the first time Williams had robbed nor the last, said the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Colleen Covell.

The killing was not, Judge Judith E. Retchin agreed, a single, "youthful act" but rather part of "a series of crimes," and it demanded the maximum 15 years that the sentencing guidelines recommend for voluntary manslaughter. She added a seven-year term for another robbery, for a total of 22 years.

Santha Sonenberg, Williams's attorney, had urged the judge to consider a host of mitigating factors detailed in a lengthy defense memorandum on Williams, of Northwest Washington.

Williams was born with cognitive impairments, was sexually and physically abused as a child and has an IQ in the mildly retarded range, according to a report submitted as part of the defense memorandum.

The judge acknowledged that Williams "had a terrible childhood" and "suffered all types of abuse." But she said that what Williams did in the days that followed Alstad's death was revealing. Not only did he commit another robbery, she noted, but when he was spotted by police, he ran.

"You knew right from wrong," Retchin said.

It was that second robbery, two nights later, again on R Street NW, that led police to Williams and his 15-year-old accomplice, who has not been publicly identified because he was charged as a juvenile. The 15-year-old pleaded guilty in a closed proceeding soon after the attack, but his sentence was not announced. The maximum penalty he faced was city supervision until he is 21.

Williams, who was 19 when he was arrested, pleaded guilty in May to manslaughter in Alstad's death and to armed robbery for the holdup two nights later.

For Alstad's relatives and friends, yesterday's sentencing took them back to a shattering moment barely a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0006223

Williams and the accomplice had accosted Alstad on R Street as he walked home from his job at Annie's Paramount Steak House. The pair demanded his money. When Alstad protested that he didn't have any cash, the younger assailant fired two or three shots, killing him.

As he did on the day he pleaded guilty, Williams apologized to his victim's family. "I understand your pain, losing a great person," he said.

Outside the courthouse, Alstad's sister said she has been too sad during the past year to be angry.

Now, she hopes Williams will find his way, which is what her brother would have wanted, she said. "He would've wanted to see that he got help," she said.

And if Williams can stay out of trouble, she said, her brother's death will not have been for nothing.

Personal Chef Laid Off During Probe Of AU President's Spending (WP)

By Valerie Strauss And Susan Kinzie, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

The personal chef employed by suspended American University President Benjamin Ladner and paid for by the school has been let go during a probe by the university's Board of Trustees into personal and travel expenses submitted by Ladner, according to sources.

In addition, the social secretary for the president and his wife, Nancy Bullard Ladner, has been transferred, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. Sally Ekfelt is now working in the president's office as an assistant to David E. Taylor, chief of staff to the president of the university, they said.

The actions come as the trustee board is close to completing a months-long probe of Ladner, who became president in 1994 and soon faced criticism for hiring the chef, Rodney Scruggs, and spending some $200,000 for drainage work and landscaping at the university-owned house where he lived.

Ladner was placed on administrative leave Aug. 24, and Provost Cornelius M. Kerwin was named acting president.

Neither Ladner nor Kerwin returned phone calls seeking comment. Several trustees declined to comment, as did Scruggs. Ekfelt did not return phone calls.

One source with knowledge of the investigation said the position of chef was eliminated as "an unnecessary expense," the same reason Ekfelt was transferred to another job. Ekfelt had worked out of the Ladners' on-campus home and was paid by the university to coordinate their social schedule.

It was not clear why the board eliminated Scruggs's position now; he had been employed by the university since 1996. University presidents are expected to entertain a great deal as part of their fundraising and other duties, so many rely on caterers or, less commonly, chefs.

Scruggs was known at the Northwest Washington school for whipping up multi-course meals for the Ladners, as well as for their personal and university guests in Ladner's campus home and in a house he and his wife own on Gibson Island in Maryland.

Sources knowledgeable about the case said Scruggs would sometimes be called late at night to cook dinner for the couple. Two chauffeurs who worked for the Ladners also said they often were required to take Scruggs's dirty white uniforms to a dry cleaner.

Ladner's base salary last year was $633,000, according to Internal Revenue Service records.

Va. Student's Disappearance Now A Criminal Investigation (WP)

By Leef Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

Although there is still no evidence that she has been harmed, the search for missing Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Marie Behl was upgraded yesterday to a criminal investigation, and an Amber Alert was issued in the case late last night.

Richmond police, who have taken the lead in the case from campus police, said they decided to open a criminal investigation based on three factors: The search involves a juvenile; more than a week has passed without a solid lead in the 17-year-old's disappearance; and an increasing number of tips are coming in because of national media coverage.

Law enforcement officials said the involvement of Richmond police will enhance the search for Behl, of Vienna, who was last seen by a roommate in their dorm room Sept. 5.

"They have the resources and the experience to get this investigation much further than the campus police were able to," said Behl's mother, Janet Pelasara, who welcomed the development as a fresh start. "They did their best, but they didn't have the manpower or the experience to handle this type of investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0006224

In the Amber Alert, issued after 11 p.m. by the Virginia State Police, Behl was described as five-feet-six, 135 pounds, with brown eyes, light brown hair, pierced ears and a pierced nose. Police said she may be traveling in her car, a white 1997 Ford Escort with Virginia tag JPC-2848.

Amber Alerts disseminate information about missing and abducted children through the media and on highway signs.

Earlier yesterday, a task force was formed yesterday to pull together local, state and federal partners including VCU police, Virginia State Police, the FBI and the Virginia attorney general's office in the search for the Madison High School graduate.

"Whether Ms. Behl is still in Richmond, in state or out of state, we have the resources needed to locate her and bring her back to safety," said Richmond police spokeswoman Cynthia Price.

Pelasara described her daughter as a someone who obeyed her curfew "99 percent of the time" and was a friend to the Vienna police, whom she got to know while working at her hometown Starbucks.

"She didn't drink; she wasn't a partier," Pelasara said. "She didn't do drugs. She's a simply a bright, beautiful, engaging girl."

Behl was last seen about 10 p.m. Labor Day after a late dinner at a local cafe. She found her roommate in their room with a boyfriend and told her that she would leave for a while to give them privacy, police said.

Police said she was wearing jeans and a hooded black sweat shirt and took only her keys and a credit card, although Pelasara said her daughter did not have her credit card with her.

Police said Behl continues to receive e-mails but has not logged on to read them. Her credit card has not been used, and the last call on her cell phone was made the night she disappeared.

Police said dozens of tips generated in the past week have failed to provide credible information on Behl's whereabouts or the location of her car.

"It's just baffling to us that with this kind of exposure, that nothing has panned out," said VCU police spokeswoman Pam Lepley. "There always was concern, but now it's been raised to a new level."

Pelasara said her daughter had about $40 in cash with her when she disappeared. Because Behl had so little money with her, Pelasara said she believes her daughter "couldn't be involved in this on her own."

Police ask anyone with information about Behl or her car to call the Richmond police tip line at 804-514-8477 or VCU police at 804-828-1196.

Photographer Gets Prison Sentence For Diaz Shots (LAT)

From A Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

A photographer was sentenced Thursday to prison for trying to extort $3 million for nude pictures of superstar Cameron Diaz he had taken early in her career.

John Rutter was sentenced to three years and eight months in prison for perjury and attempted grand theft under a sentence imposed by Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Michael E. Pastor.

The charges against Rutter, 42, stemmed from a daylong photo shoot in 1992 in an abandoned Los Angeles-area warehouse. Diaz, then a 19-year-old unknown, posed topless, wearing fishnet stockings and leather.

In the years after the shoot, her career took off. Such films as "The Mask" and "There's Something About Mary" earned her a place on Hollywood's A-list and paychecks of up to $20 million a film. Rutter approached Diaz with the racy photos in 2003, a week before the premiere of "Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle," in which she co-starred, saying he had interested buyers.

Rutter's attorney, Mark Werksman, called the July trial a battle between a "rich and famous celebrity" and a "hardworking photographer."

Deputy District Attorney David Walgren downplayed the celebrity aspect of the case in statements to reporters, saying that, had the victim been someone other than Diaz, the case still would have been prosecuted "in the same courts" and "in the same manner."

Walgren had asked for the sentence the judge imposed.

Diaz testified that she felt no shame or embarrassment about the photo session.

"I kind of bought into thinking I would like to do images that are great images -- rather than just a model who sells clothes," Diaz testified in July. "I didn't think of them as pornographic. I didn't think of them as perverted."

Bush Endorses Plan To Close 22 Bases (WP/AP)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

President Bush yesterday endorsed a plan for closing 22 major military bases and reconfiguring 33 others, leaving their fate to Congress.

Bush had until next Friday to either accept the entire report from an independent commission and send it to Congress or return it to the commission for further work.

The report will become final in 45 days unless Congress acts to reject it in full. Communities probably have little hope of a reprieve for their bases, as lawmakers have never rejected such reports.

Bush had said that for the process to be "nonpolitical" the commission's decision would have to stand. He got the report last Friday from the nine-member Defense Base Closure and Realignment Commission.

Bush's submission of the report comes as his administration and Congress are preoccupied with aiding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast and other priorities. A GOP-led effort in the Senate to derail the base-closing process, which Republican leaders feared could embarrass them, has fizzled.

The commission said its recommendations would mean annual savings of $4.2 billion, compared with $5.4 billion under the plan it received in May from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld had recommended closing 33 major bases and reducing personnel at 29 others.

The commission largely endorsed Rumsfeld's vision to restructure the domestic network of military bases to save billions of dollars over the next two decades and streamline the Army, Navy and Air Force.

But commissioners did recommend keeping open several major bases against the Pentagon's wishes, including a shipyard in Kittery, Maine; a submarine base in Groton, Conn.; and Air Force bases in South Dakota and New Mexico.

The commission denied politics played a role in any decisions, even as it voted to keep open bases in the home states of Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) and other senators leading the opposition. That all but eliminated the possibility of congressional intervention.

In the House, a majority of members overwhelmingly support this round of closures and consolidations, the first in a decade.

Gonzales Says Justice Department Will Fight To Keep Pledge In Public Schools (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, The Associated Press

AP, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday that the Justice Department will fight to overturn a federal court ruling that the Pledge of Allegiance can't be recited in public schools because it contains a reference to God.

Gonzales said the pledge is one of several expressions of national identity and patriotism that mention of God but don't violate the Constitution's ban on state-sponsored religion.

The high court "has affirmed time and again that such official acknowledgments of our nation's religious heritage, foundation and character are constitutional," Gonzales said in a statement a day after the ruling by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton in Sacramento.

Karlton's decision could put the issue on track for another round of Supreme Court arguments. The court sidestepped the issue last year, ruling atheist Michael Newdow had no standing to bring the case on behalf of his daughter because he did not have custody of her.

The Bush administration had opposed Newdow on the same basis that Gonzales set forth Thursday. Newdow also is involved in the latest case, acting as attorney for three parents challenging the pledge because it includes the words "under God."

Gonzales is widely viewed as a leading contender for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Supreme Court because he is close to President Bush. Gonzales' statement of support to keep "under God" in the pledge could appeal to religious conservatives, who have expressed concerns about him as a potential justice because he has not stated opposition to the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0006226

The Becket Fund, a religious rights group that is a party to the pledge case, said it would appeal to the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which held the `under God' provision of the pledge unconstitutional in 2002.

The decisions by Karlton and the appeals court conflict with an August opinion by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, similar to the requirement in California.

Mother Of Pledge-battle Girl Vows To Fight For `under God' (KRT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - Sandra Banning, the Sacramento, Calif.-area mother of the girl who helped trigger the legal battle over the Pledge of Allegiance that flared anew this week, came to the nation's capital Thursday with a pledge of her own:

To do everything she can to keep the pledge in schools and the phrase "under God" in the pledge.

The day after a Sacramento federal judge revived the controversy by ruling that reciting the pledge in public schools is an unconstitutional violation of the separation of church and state, Banning's efforts became intertwined with the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings for Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr.

Banning publicly urged his confirmation in hopes that he would rule against the case brought by her 11-year-old daughter's father, Michael Newdow, the atheist and amateur lawyer who has argued before the Supreme Court that the pledge should be kept out of public schools. And to help rally support for the Pledge of Allegiance as the case works its way again toward the high court, she's forming a grass-roots advocacy group, the "One Nation Under God Foundation," affiliated with the conservative Traditional Values Coalition.

Banning and other Roberts supporters said they hoped the pledge issue would give an additional boost to his nomination. Roberts, a conservative who has vowed not to be a "judicial activist" who broadly interprets the Constitution, finished four days of questioning Thursday with a strong likelihood of being confirmed by the Republican-controlled Senate.

"A judge's job is to interpret the Constitution and laws, not to be a social engineer who tries to remake our culture by ridding it of traditional values that we, the citizens, hold dear," Banning, 45, said at a previously scheduled news conference with other Roberts supporters. "It is critical that judges such as Judge Roberts be on the Supreme Court bench when the case is heard."

Banning learned of the new pledge ruling when she arrived Wednesday at the airport in Washington. She said the court decision gave her new impetus to push for Roberts' confirmation.

"I've watched some of the hearings. I've watched the interviews. I have confidence in President Bush," said Banning, who later attended the confirmation hearings. During a presidential debate last fall, Bush said, "I wouldn't pick a judge who said that the Pledge of Allegiance couldn't be said in a school because it had the words `under God' in it."

Thursday, the Senate condemned the ruling, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the Justice Department would again "defend the ability of American school children to pledge allegiance to the flag."

Wednesday, two Republican senators mentioned the ruling shortly after the news broke, but Roberts was not asked about his position on the case during this week's confirmation hearings because he has declined to answer questions about issues on which he may have to rule.

Several Republican senators have criticized Wednesday's ruling, saying it showed why Roberts was needed on the Supreme Court.

"I think it highlights one of those moments where the courts overstepped," Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., said in an interview, "and at a time when we're trying to get consideration of this potential justice who's been so clear in his views of not imposing his will, but expressing the law."

Typical of their contentious relationship, which has involved a nasty, long-running custody battle over their 11-year old daughter, Newdow and Banning disagreed on how Roberts would rule.

"He sounds like a very intelligent, thoughtful man, and if he applies the principles underlying the Constitution ... then I have absolutely no doubt he would rule in my favor," Newdow said in a telephone interview.

The case started in 2000 when Newdow, a former Sacramento resident now living in Texas, objected to his daughter's reciting the pledge with her kindergarten class in the Elk Grove Unified School District. He argued that the government was telling her he was wrong to be an atheist because the pledge declares this is "one nation, under God."

Banning, a Christian, opposed his suit. After the San Francisco-based 9th Circuit Court of Appeals stunned the nation in 2002 by agreeing with Newdow that the pledge was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case.

Newdow, a doctor with a law degree, became a legal celebrity, a novice lawyer who received special permission to argue his case before the high court in March 2004. The justices dismissed the case three months later on a technicality, ruling

Newdow did not have custody of his daughter when he filed the lawsuit and therefore did not have standing to bring it to the courts.

He re-filed the case on behalf of three unnamed parents from the same school district. After Wednesday's ruling, the case again could be headed to the Supreme Court.

"We won on a technicality. A win is a win. We'll take it," said Banning, who is self-employed provider of administrative support services for various companies. "It's given us at least another year and a half, maybe two, to educate the American public ... kind of stir the pot, if you will, on why these cases are important."

Banning, who never married Newdow, said she has tried to shield their daughter, now in the sixth grade, from the case. The girl, whose name has been kept out of the media, knew her father was in the media Wednesday and asked Banning about it.

"I've reassured her many, many, many times ... reminding her that he has the right as a citizen of this great nation to file these cases," Banning said. "But equally so, mom has the right and, I believe, really the necessity to stand up for cases of this nature."

Justice Dept. Settles Voting Rights Suit (AP-Y2)

AP2, September 16, 2005

The Justice Department said Thursday it has dropped its voting rights lawsuit against Boston after city officials agreed to provide voting materials in Chinese and Vietnamese, and to allow federal observers to monitor polling places.

The agreement comes six weeks after the federal government filed a lawsuit — part of what it said is a national initiative — alleging that Boston's election practices discriminate against Hispanic and Asian American voters who do not speak English.

"The city of Boston is to be congratulated for agreeing to resolve this matter in a constructive and forward-looking manner," Bradley J. Schlozman, acting assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said in a news release announcing the agreement.

When the suit was filed, Schlozman alleged that Boston's violations were "deeply disturbing."

A city lawyer at the time called the claims "unsubstantiated." City officials said they already provide ballots in English and Spanish.

Seth Gitell, a spokesman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said Thursday the agreement does not say the city did anything wrong. "What the city objected to originally was to signing a consent decree and acknowledging wrongdoing," he said.

The announcement Thursday said Boston agreed to provide ballots, registration notices and other forms in Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese. Boston also agreed to provide more training to poll workers regarding the Voting Rights Act.

Also, Boston agreed to a court order appointing federal observers to monitor polling places through 2008, the announcement said.

Hispanic residents comprise 14 percent of Boston's 590,000 residents, while Chinese and Vietnamese residents make up just over 5 percent, according to 2000 Census figures.

Next, Massachusetts (WP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

FOR THE SECOND time in as many weeks, a state legislature has bucked the ugly trend of writing discrimination against gays into state law. Last week, the California Assembly voted to allow same-sex marriage. This week, lawmakers in Massachusetts decisively rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to overturn the state's Supreme Judicial Court decision acknowledging gay marriage rights. The lopsided vote, 157 to 39, provides a kind of backhanded legislative validation of the court's ruling, which had been much derided for usurping the legislative function. Lawmakers have not voted to create same-sex-marriage rights, but they have decided not to take them away. The vote shows that as people grow used to gay marriages, which have been taking place in Massachusetts for more than a year, their discomfort -- and the political impetus for banning them -- diminishes.

The vote certainly overstates support for same-sex marriage in Massachusetts, for the fiercest opponents of gay marriage also opposed the specific amendment under consideration. The amendment would replace full marriage equality with civil unions, and some opponents have thrown their support instead behind a proposal not to recognize same-sex relationships at all. Still, the tide is clearly turning, and minds are changing. Only last year, after all, the Massachusetts legislature passed this amendment. This year, even excluding those who voted against it because they favor something harsher, a clear majority opposed it on the grounds that they affirmatively support marriage equality.

Work remains to be done. Under the Massachusetts constitution, lawmakers are likely to confront the more draconian version of the constitutional amendment, and, even with relatively scant legislative support, it could go before the voters in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0006228

But public opinion is moving in the right direction, and the reason is not hard to discern: Since the high court's ruling went into effect, a lot of couples have tied the knot in Massachusetts, and, somehow, the sun has continued to rise in the east. Many people are realizing that it costs heterosexual marriage nothing for same-sex marriage also to exist. The longer people have to absorb that lesson, the more support for banning marriages between committed couples is likely to erode.

Microsoft, AOL Discuss Online Partnership (AP)

By ALLISON LINN, AP Business Writer

AP, September 16, 2005

SEATTLE — Microsoft Corp. and Time Warner Inc. have been discussing potential online partnerships that would help the two companies better compete against rivals Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc., two people familiar with the talks said Thursday.

They two said the discussions have been going on for months and that any possible deal is not imminent.

Microsoft and AOL — who just two years ago settled a bitter antitrust lawsuit over Microsoft's tactics in the Internet browser market — are discussing possible collaboration in search technology, online advertising and instant messaging, said the two sources, one of whom is an executive with Time Warner's America Online unit.

The other source, who works closely with Microsoft and has been involved in company discussions on the possible partnership, said the talks have heated up in the last couple weeks but are not advanced.

Both sources spoke on condition of anonymity.

Time Warner spokeswoman Susan Duffy and Microsoft spokesman Jim Desler declined to comment on the talks, which were first reported in Thursday's editions of the New York Post.

The AOL executive said one aspect of the talks originally centered on using Microsoft's new MSN search engine on AOL, replacing AOL's current relationship with Google.

More recently, the executive said, the two companies have been talking about the possibility of deeper relationships, such as collaborating in the lucrative market of selling advertising online.

Such a collaboration could allow the two companies to benefit from growing interest in search-based advertising, helping them better compete against search leaders Google and Yahoo.

But, the executive said, "the discussions are not advanced."

The person familiar with Microsoft's thinking said the company's MSN unit has always been interested in striking a deal that would allow it to benefit from AOL's market-leading instant messenger program.

AOL's instant-messaging product, AIM, had more than 53 million unique users in August compared to about 29 million for the competing MSN Messenger, according to Nielsen/NetRatings.

Time Warner shares rose 58 cents, or 3.2 percent, to close at $18.50 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange. Microsoft shares were down 4 cents to close at $26.27 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Shares of Time Warner have traded between $15.82 and $19.90 in the past 52 weeks. Shares of Microsoft have traded between $23.82 and $30.20 during the same period.

Redmond-based Microsoft and Time Warner's AOL unit have clashed in the past.

In the spring of 2003, Microsoft agreed to pay Time Warner $750 million to settle an antitrust suit over charges it used strong-arm tactics to make Internet Explorer the dominant Web browser, displacing AOL's Netscape.

Microsoft In Talks On AOL Link: Source (REU)

By Kenneth Li

Reuters, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - Time Warner Inc. (NYSE:TWX - News) and Microsoft Corp. (NasdaqNM:MSFT - News) are discussing ways they could combine their Internet assets, including the possibility of an investment by the software giant, sources familiar with the matter said on Thursday.

"There have been talks on ways Microsoft and AOL assets can be better leveraged and they've taken place over the normal course of business ...," one source said, calling reports of a joint venture "way overblown."

Time Warner declined comment. Microsoft was not immediately reachable.

Shares of the world's largest media company rose 3 percent after the New York Post reported on Thursday the two were talking about a joint venture.

DOJ_NMG_0006229

Talks of a Microsoft stake in the AOL division was one of several scenarios under review, a separate source familiar with the matter said. "There has been discussions about Microsoft investing in Time Warner," one source said, who also said nothing was imminent.

A combination would create the single largest Internet audience pool by unique visitors and forge a formidable online competitor in a field currently led by Yahoo Inc. (NasdaqNM:YHOO - News) and Google Inc. (NasdaqNM:GOOG - News)

AOL and MSN would have a combined unique audience of about 167.8 million, although there would likely be duplicates. This compares to Yahoo's 101.3 million unique visitors and Google's 80.4 million in August, according to Nielsen/NetRatings.

Discussions on search and combining advertising forces began early this year, but have evolved over the past several weeks into finding ways to combine the businesses.

While they could advance further, working out issues such as how much AOL is valued and other structural concerns have been "difficult" and nothing was imminent, a source added.

Broad discussions on how the two companies could work together began two years ago after the companies settled a long-running antitrust suit that America Online, a unit of Time Warner, filed against the software giant, the source said.

One analyst said Microsoft, which debuted its search engine late last year, was likely looking to replace Google as the underpinnings of AOL's search services. About 11 percent of Google's revenue came from AOL in the first half of 2005. "MSN may want to sell search to AOL," said Matt Rosoff, an analyst at Directions on Microsoft, an independent research firm based in Kirkland, Washington.

Meanwhile, Time Warner has been under pressure to boost its stock price, which has fallen 70 percent over the past five years. Corporate raider Carl Icahn this week said he planned to seek one or more shareholder-nominated board seats at the company to force changes.

Icahn has demanded that the company raise its stock buyback program to $20 billion from Time Warner's existing commitments of up to $5 billion and completely spin off its cable division.

One investor was cheered by the discussions and said anything that could add some $4 per share to the stock price from improvements at AOL was a good sign.

"Management is not asleep at the switch," said Larry Haverty, a portfolio manager at Gabelli Asset Management, which has a stake of about $286 million in Time Warner.

"Anything you can do to move the needle in that direction is terrific for shareholders."

Low ball estimates for AOL are about $10 billion with improvements possibly doubling that valuation, Richard Greenfield, an analyst at Fulcrum Global Partners said.

Time Warner shares closed up 58 cents at $18.50 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Trading activity in Time Warner options also spiked up on Thursday. Some 88,014 calls and 43,581 puts traded in Time Warner in the U.S. options market, above its normal volume of 23,824 contracts, according to Track Data.

Microsoft Is In Talks To Buy A Stake In AOL As Google Looms (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin And Robert A. Guth, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Demonstrating its growing concern about Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. has entered talks with Time Warner Inc. about taking a substantial stake in the media giant's America Online unit, said people familiar with the matter.

The conversations have centered on whether AOL would switch to using Microsoft's search engine instead of Google's, these people said, as well as other areas of potential cooperation. AOL and Google shared about $380 million in revenue last year derived from displaying ads on AOL's search results.

The talks, which are described as preliminary, have also included discussions of combining the advertising sales forces of AOL and Microsoft's MSN online service, these people said.

Time Warner and Microsoft spokesmen declined to comment. The talks were reported yesterday by the New York Post.

AOL and Microsoft once were fierce rivals, and the rapprochement indicated by the talks shows how much the Internet landscape has changed. Just a few years ago, AOL and Microsoft battled over dial-up Internet customers and Web browsers. Now the dial-up business is in decline and the big prize in the industry is advertising revenue, an area in which both AOL and Microsoft lag behind Google and Yahoo Inc.

Internet advertising now is the fastest-growing segment of the media industry, with revenue rising 21.4% to $7.4 billion last year, according to TNS Media Intelligence. Adding AOL visitors to those who use Microsoft's search service would give Microsoft a much larger potential base of people who would see the ads the service displays.

Last year, Yahoo raked in revenue of about $3.6 billion, primarily from advertising. Google was close behind with revenue of about $3.2 billion, also primarily from ads. Meanwhile, AOL garnered ad revenue of only about $1 billion and MSN eked out $1.4 billion in ad revenue in the fiscal year ended June 30.

The talks also signal a strategic shift for Time Warner, which had long resisted pleas from some investors to get rid of all or part of its ailing Internet arm, which came to the company when the old AOL bought Time Warner in 2001 in what became a disastrous merger. Time Warner Chairman Richard Parsons declared last year that the company wouldn't sell or spin off AOL "any time soon," citing the promise of capturing a greater share of the Internet ad market. "Our challenge is to articulate to Wall Street that there is a Yahoo inside of AOL ... so that some of that Internet fairy dust gets sprinkled on AOL," Mr. Parsons said then. The unit also generates a lot of cash, despite an ongoing decline in subscribers.

Since then, AOL has revamped its AOL.com Web site, offering free access to many of the features once available only to AOL's paying subscribers -- in the hopes of winning more advertising revenue. But a person close to the situation says Mr. Parsons would likely be willing to sell a stake in AOL if Time Warner could keep a "sizable" stake for itself, in order to benefit from a turnaround at AOL. A person familiar with the talks says AOL has not discussed selling a stake to other companies such as Google or Yahoo.

People close to the discussions say that the size of Microsoft's possible stake in AOL hasn't been determined and that investment bankers haven't been engaged. And the price of the stake is likely to be a sticking point. In the past, Mr. Parsons has balked at offers for AOL that fell below the price he has put at about $20 billion.

The discussions show how Microsoft now sees Google as a major adversary. Microsoft's MSN unit has built a viable search engine modeled after Google's but isn't making the advances in market share and other measures that executives had hoped for, say people familiar with MSN. These people say that the internal goal for the MSN search team by year's end is to beat Google on the "relevance" of search results. But Microsoft may not hit that goal as it struggles to learn techniques to increase the quality of results, many of which Google likely already uses, and as Google continues to expand its reach.

Google is also encroaching on Microsoft's personal-computer turf. The company last year rolled out free software that makes it quicker and easier to search and find information stored on a PC, including emails contained in Microsoft Outlook and documents in Microsoft Word. Microsoft swiftly moved to protect its flank, rolling out a similar "desktop search" feature that will have the capability to be built into versions of Windows and Office software coming next year.

At Microsoft's annual meeting with financial analysts in July, Chief Executive Steve Ballmer likened his company's pursuit of Google to Microsoft's well-chronicled battle with International Business Machines Corp. in business software more than a decade ago. Microsoft ultimately prevailed in many of those markets. Mr. Ballmer said then that the company will "do what it takes to keep coming and coming and coming and coming on this front."

Relations between Microsoft and AOL began to thaw in 2003, when Microsoft agreed to pay $750 million to settle an antitrust lawsuit brought by AOL's Netscape division. At that time, the two companies also agreed to cooperate on the development of copyright-protection technology.

Since then, the companies have worked together to fight spam and cooperate on other technology issues. In January, Microsoft briefed AOL executives about its new search engine, said a person close to the situation. At that meeting, Microsoft said it would try to make it financially beneficial for AOL to switch to its technology, this person said, adding that the discussions have been "on and off" since January and that many different proposals have been floated.

Although AOL's Internet-access business is in decline, AOL still generates a lot of traffic -- making it a rich prize for search engines that thrive on huge volumes of users. Sites that are 100% owned by AOL collectively drew 112.4 million unique visitors in July, according to comScore Media Metrix.

Since 2002, AOL has been using Google's search engine under an agreement that calls for AOL to keep about 80% of the ad revenue generated by searches by AOL users, according to a person familiar with the deal. In 2004, AOL received about $300 million in revenue from the arrangement.

The contract hasn't expired but people close to AOL say the company has the option to walk away; Google wouldn't comment. "Google and AOL have a healthy global partnership and AOL remains a valued partner," a Google spokesman said.

Time Warner, Microsoft Talk Of Joint AOL-MSN Search Project (USAT)

By Byron Acohido And Laura Petrecca, Usa Today

USA Today, September 16, 2005

SEATTLE — Time Warner and Microsoft are discussing the possibility of combining some aspects of America Online and MSN to become a larger force in Internet search and search-based advertising.

No deal is imminent, said two executives with direct knowledge of the talks, who declined to speak for attribution because discussions are still fluid. It could evolve into a strategic alliance or joint venture, with Microsoft taking a stake in AOL.

The companies declined comment. But industry analysts said, if consummated, the deal could shake up the world of Internet search. Stakes are high in paid search, the practice of aligning topical ads with objective search results. Paid search has become a $6 billion to $10 billion a year business, with 90% of that revenue split roughly equally between Google and Yahoo, says Chris Sherman, editor of trade newsletter SearchDay. Neither company discloses paid search revenue.

If AOL and MSN join forces, AOL would likely dump Google as its behind-the-scenes supplier of search services, says Chris Winfield, president of search marketing firm 10e20. AOL and MSN would shift their combined search audiences — and the advertisers who cater to them — to MSN's fledgling search services, Winfield says.

Microsoft launched MSN Search in February. That allows MSN to stop contracting basic search from Yahoo. MSN continues to contract paid search from Yahoo.

But MSN has begun piloting a cutting-edge paid search service, called MSN AdCenter, in France and Singapore. A worldwide launch is expected by early next year, says Matt Rosoff, analyst at research firm Directions on Microsoft.

Once MSN AdCenter is launched, an AOL-MSN search partnership could be "hugely significant. It's the best way for Microsoft to suck some air out of paid search, the fastest-growing part of the Internet advertising market," says Rosoff.

Much hinges on how well Microsoft builds a following for MSN Search, a key to persuading advertisers to patronize MSN AdCenter. Nielson/NetRatings' July ranking of search services gave Google a 46% share to Yahoo's 23%, MSN's 13% and AOL's 5.4%.

"Taking a close look at all technical options is the right thing for them (AOL and MSN) to be doing," says Charlene Li, search analyst at Forrester Research.

At present, Google and Yahoo allow advertisers to associate their pitches with search results without any way to target specific users. But MSN AdCenter can direct ads to search engine users categorized by age and gender.

"AdCenter has been designed from the ground up to allow marketers to target ads more effectively," says Kevin Lee, chairman of search marketing firm Did-it.com.

AOL and MSN could tap into archived demographic data they already keep on subscribers. "That could be a key driver behind a strategic alliance," Lee says.

Microsoft Said To Be In Talks On Forming Link To AOL (NYT)

By SAUL HANSELL

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Microsoft and Time Warner have explored a variety of possible combinations of the MSN Internet portal with the America Online operation of Time Warner, including a merger of the two into a new company that would be jointly owned, according to several people involved in the talks.

The discussions were initiated by Microsoft, which has Google, its new archrival, clearly in its sights. Microsoft is trying to focus its Internet operations on its developing Web search product rather than its Web portal and Internet access business, which it no longer sees as strategically important.

Microsoft offered to sell its MSN Internet portal and dial-up subscriber business both to America Online and to Yahoo, according to several people with knowledge of the talks. While Yahoo considered and quickly rejected the proposal, Time Warner, the parent of America Online, expressed interest.

Top executives at the companies discussed a variety of potential transactions as recently as three weeks ago. Those talks, however, are in suspension as Microsoft considers its strategic position, people involved in the discussions said.

Representatives of Time Warner, Microsoft and Yahoo declined to comment.

The most elaborate proposal being discussed would involve combining America Online with the MSN Internet portal and dial-up Internet business, creating the world's largest Internet company. The venture's Web search would be provided by Microsoft. That combination would be a significant blow to Google, which provides the Web search on AOL's services. This year, 11 percent of Google revenue came from advertising it placed on AOL sites.

A combination of AOL and MSN would have 18 percent of the search market in the United States, according to Nielsen NetRatings, making it third after Google, with 46 percent, and Yahoo, with 23 percent.

Indeed, much of Microsoft's motivation to do such a deal is to head off a threat it sees from Google. Microsoft's worry is not so much Google's Web search business.

Microsoft sees in Google the potential to offer a variety of Internet services, using Google's vast network of servers, making it less necessary for people to buy Microsoft software or even computers with the Microsoft Windows operating system. Moreover, Google could offer free desktop software as well, supported by its network of advertisers.

"Ultimately Microsoft knows that the software landscape will shift from the desktop to the hybrid of the Internet and the desktop," said Gene Munster, an analyst with Piper Jaffray. "Google has thrown out warning shots that they will be players in many of the significant areas of software."

Time Warner, meanwhile, has been trying to figure out if AOL fits into its amalgamation of companies, especially because AOL's core dial-up Internet access business, while profitable, is shrinking as customers shift to high-speed service provided by telephone and cable companies.

AOL has been trying to build a free, advertiser-supported portal business. Combining that effort with Microsoft's large MSN portal, along with Microsoft's popular Hotmail e-mail service, could accelerate AOL's progress toward its goals.

The merged company would leap past Yahoo as the biggest Internet portal and have a more credible case to make to advertisers. Another advantage of a deal is that MSN is strong in many countries while AOL has focused mainly on the United States and a few European countries.

Being able to describe AOL as a leader and bring in the backing of Microsoft, Time Warner executives hope, may reverse investors' negative perception of AOL, which they believe has been dragging down Time Warner stock.

If such a deal were successful, the venture might eventually issue shares to the public. AOL's management has long wanted the flexibility of making acquisitions with a separate stock as well as independence from Time Warner, where many executives still resent the terms of the 2000 merger of the two companies.

Michael Nathanson, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein, said such a deal would probably help Time Warner's stock. "The deal will be trumpeted so much that the stock will go up," he said.

The discussions of potential deals are said to have begun early this year, when Microsoft approached AOL in hopes of persuading it to drop Google and use MSN's new Web search service. (Microsoft has been having similar talks with nearly every major company that offers Internet search.) Talks progressed and explored many options, from a combination of ad sales staff to a full merger of AOL and MSN.

The possibility of a deal by Microsoft and AOL was first reported by The New York Post.

A deal with AOL could provide widespread distribution for Microsoft's search system and a platform for developing Microsoft's own Internet-based services. An AOL merger would also provide a graceful exit from MSN's stagnant dial-up Internet service business, which still has several million subscribers.

But Microsoft would also have to give up some control over the future of technology that could be strategically important to its future. Bill Gates, Microsoft's chairman, is not known for giving up control of anything. Indeed, MSNBC, Microsoft's 50-50 joint news venture with NBC, has been a source of friction, because Microsoft executives believe it has limited their ability to make decisions on their own. Indeed, disentangling Microsoft's contract with NBC may well be one of the most difficult parts of pursuing a deal with Time Warner, which owns the rival CNN network.

Some important issues in the talks remain undecided. For example, both AOL and Microsoft want to control a combined instant messaging system, which each company sees as strategically important technology. Another question is how much traffic Microsoft would direct to the combined venture.

Until recently Microsoft was able to use its browser and other software to direct people to MSN by default. But a combination of legal settlements and contract changes have allowed computer makers to set their own default home pages for browsers. The next version of Windows is designed to be even more neutral about Internet services, thus providing less of a boost for MSN. Indeed, that is one reason Microsoft is now interested in getting out of the Internet portal business.

The financial terms of a transaction have not been fully explored because they depend on which assets would be combined. Because AOL is bigger and more profitable than MSN, Time Warner would own a majority of a combined operation, unless Microsoft put up cash to increase its stake. Analysts value AOL at $10 billion and $20 billion.

Mr. Nathanson said he hoped the companies do not create a venture in which the owners have equal control because such arrangements typically become bogged down in wrangling. "There has to be the lead dog," he said, "and someone has to give up control to make it work."

AOL, Microsoft Discussing Possible Internet Joint Venture (WP)

By David A. Vise, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

Microsoft Corp. is considering acquiring a stake in Time Warner Inc.'s America Online Inc. unit, one of a number of possible Internet joint ventures the two companies are discussing, people familiar with the talks said.

While no transaction is imminent, a broad range of options is under review, said sources who spoke on condition of anonymity because the talks are confidential. Those options include combining Microsoft's MSN online service with Dulles-based

AOL, establishing a combined advertising sales force and enabling users of their separate instant messaging services to communicate with each other.

The talks, reported yesterday by the New York Post, are part of a broader set of discussions between Microsoft and Time Warner that began following an antitrust settlement between the companies two years ago. As part of that, the corporate giants have been working together closely on the development of digital rights technology that would enable computer users to download motion pictures for a fee.

The prospect of Microsoft acquiring a stake in AOL grew out of a Microsoft proposal earlier this year to make its MSN search engine the main search provider on AOL, replacing Google Inc. "Microsoft is looking to put more eyeballs in front of its search engine," said David Card, an analyst with Jupiter Research.

But AOL turned the offer down. Such a move would have given Microsoft the kind of clout it has been seeking in its fierce battle with fast-growing search engine leader Google, which earned more money from its partnership with AOL last year than from any other relationship.

After AOL rejected the MSN search proposal, the parties began examining other ways to combine forces online that would lead investors to assign greater value to their Internet operations.

"It is no big secret that Microsoft and Time Warner have gotten closer over the last couple of years," said Scott Kessler, an analyst with Standard & Poor's Corp. "The fact that there are these talks is not a surprise. The question ultimately would be how this would be structured, what the price would be and those types of things. A lot of folks observing this are taking a wait-and-see attitude."

Google, which Wednesday raised more than $4 billion by selling fresh stock to the public, also reaffirmed its close ties to America Online. Google provides search and ads for AOL in the United States and Europe.

"Google and AOL have a healthy global partnership, and AOL remains a valued partner," Google spokesman Michael Mayzel said yesterday.

Officials from Microsoft and Time Warner declined to comment publicly on the prospects for a deal.

In its discussions with Microsoft, Time Warner has made it clear that it wants to continue to own a substantial chunk of AOL, sources said. America Online gives the New York-based media giant an Internet presence. AOL has roughly 20 million subscribers -- and generates a mountain of cash annually. Through the main AOL Internet service and other properties including Moviefone and MapQuest, the entire AOL network has a monthly audience of about 112 million computer users, according to ComScore Media Metrix.

One possible outcome would be for Time Warner and Microsoft to each own stakes in a combined AOL-MSN operation. In that event, sources said, Microsoft probably would also pay Time Warner cash, since AOL has a more robust business than MSN. Both sides are continuing to analyze exactly what businesses they might be willing to put into a combined operation and what each would seek from the other party.

The high-level discussions about a possible transaction have involved senior officials from Time Warner and Microsoft, as well as top executives of their respective AOL and MSN units. They are occurring against the backdrop of shareholder activist Carl C. Icahn pressing Time Warner to spin off its cable television division and take other steps to boost its flat stock price. But sources said the discussions predate Icahn's recent arrival on the scene and are part of Time Warner's continuing efforts to translate its far-flung media holdings, including Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc., People magazine and Home Box Office Inc., into a higher stock price.

Another possibility that has been discussed is putting AOL and MSN into a newly created entity that would sell stock to the public, with Time Warner and Microsoft continuing to be its major shareholders. This move would be aimed in part at ramping up the size of AOL and MSN to compete better with their larger rival, Yahoo Inc., and its 119 million unique users.

One source familiar with the talks said he considered a transaction combining AOL and MSN as complicated and a long shot. But he said that if the parties can figure out how to create more value by joining forces, a deal of some kind remains possible.

The main driver behind the discussions appears to be that AOL and MSN want to participate more fully in the growth in online advertising. "Google and Yahoo are growing faster in ad revenue than the other two," Jupiter's Card added.

ABN Stands Ready To Buy Antonveneta (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn In Rome And Edward Taylor In Frankfurt, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

ABN Amro Holding NV's tentative agreement to buy a 30% stake in Banca Antonveneta SpA from Banca Popolare Italiana Scarl after a bitter battle clears the path for the first-ever takeover of a large Italian bank by a foreign lender and could pave the way for more, a prospect that seemed remote just several weeks ago.

The sale, which values Antonveneta at €8.2 billion ($10 billion) and was agreed to late Wednesday, still faces legal and regulatory hurdles. It would give control of Antonveneta to ABN just two months after ABN's cash offer for the bank failed.

But a criminal probe involving BPI's bid dashed its takeover plans and raised serious questions about the role played by Italy's chief banking regulator, Bank of Italy governor Antonio Fazio. Evidence amassed by Italian prosecutors indicates that Mr. Fazio had a close relationship with BPI Chief Executive Gianpiero Fiorani and that the central banker acted to ensure that BPI's bid won regulatory approval.

If the Dutch bank wins control of Antonveneta, it would mark the first crack in a regulatory wall that has prevented foreign banks from taking over large Italian ones. ABN Amro has held stakes in Antonveneta and in another large Italian bank, Capitalia SpA, for years, but had been frustrated by its inability to gain control of either. Antonveneta, based in the wealthy northern city of Padua, would give ABN a broad new terrain for its retail operations.

ABN Amro's chief executive, Rijkman Groenink, will be under pressure to convince shareholders that acquiring Antonveneta is part of a cohesive growth strategy. In the past, some have criticized him for making scattershot acquisitions with no overall goal. ABN employs 98,000 people and operates in more than 60 countries, including a large presence in retail banking in the U.S. Midwest.

The Dutch bank is expected to offer €26.50 a share -- the same price it made in its failed public offer this summer, according to people familiar with the negotiations. The bank already has raised €2.5 billion to fund the Antonveneta transaction by issuing 135 million new shares. ABN Amro already held a roughly 30% stake in Antonveneta, and should the BPI sale go through, ABN would control more than half of Antonveneta's shares. Under Italian law, ABN Amro will have to launch another all-cash offer for the remaining shares once it receives regulatory approval.

"BPI has expressed its intention to sell their shares to us. We have the intention to buy that stake, although an agreement has yet to be signed," an ABN Amro spokesman said. BPI said in a statement that it wanted to complete the deal by Wednesday.

ABN Amro would be the first foreign bank to own more than 15% of the voting shares in a large Italian bank, a precedent that could see more foreigners seeking a greater presence in Italy, one of Europe's most fragmented banking markets, analysts say. European banks have long eyed the Italian banking sector, which is potentially lucrative because of the high fees banks charge their customers. In the 1990s, Deutsche Bank AG acquired a small local lender called Banca Popolare di Lecco.

"We will see more foreigners coming back to Italy," said Marcello Zanardo, an analyst with Keefe Bruyette & Woods.

There are many foreign banks with stakes that, in time, could be expanded to controlling positions. Spain's Banco Santander Central Hispano SA has an 8.5% stake in Turin-based Sanpaolo IMI. France's Crédit Agricole SA has a 17.8% stake in Banca Intesa SpA, and Germany's Commerzbank AG has a 2.8% stake in Intesa, as well. ABN Amro's success could also hasten consolidation among banks in Italy, said Mr. Zanardo.

Hurdles remain. Many Italian banks have shareholder pacts that lock up ownership and make hostile bids problematic. ABN Amro's bid, though among the most aggressive ever by Italian standards, was endorsed by Antonveneta's board.

This year, Spain's Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA launched a bid for Rome-based Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA, but was beaten back at the last minute by a counteroffer from midsize Italian insurer Unipol Assicurazioni SpA. BBVA complained that the Bank of Italy had thrown up obstacles to its bid, and prosecutors have been looking into that deal as well.

The climate for foreign banks remains highly uncertain, said Stefano Caselli, professor of banking and finance at Milan's Bocconi University. ABN's apparent victory came only as a result of an unusual investigation, not because of a change in the regulatory environment. "The whole regulatory framework is up in the air right now," Mr. Caselli said.

Mr. Fazio's alleged role in aiding BPI has prompted calls for his resignation, but he has clung to his post. Still, if another foreign bank were to try to buy an Italian lender, Mr. Fazio's actions would be watched closely.

The widening criminal probe left BPI with little choice but to sell out. Last month, a judge impounded BPI's stake after prosecutors alleged it acquired the shares improperly. Though BPI and allies held a majority of Antonveneta, the judge's ruling effectively froze BPI's plans.

Before the sale can be completed, a judge must formally unfreeze the BPI shares. In addition, both the Bank of Italy and Italian stock-market regulator Consob must void BPI's public offer for the bank. Before its board voted to back the stake sale, BPI held informal talks with both Consob and the Bank of Italy to ensure that the sale would be allowed to proceed.

Could Airlines Merge? Little Route Overlap For Delta, Northwest (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams, Usa Today

USA Today, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006235

Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines entered bankruptcy court together this week, and few will be surprised if they emerge together — as a single combined carrier.

The twin Chapter 11 bankruptcy filings Wednesday night, almost simultaneous and in the same New York courthouse, are leading many industry experts to believe the carriers may be exploring a merger within bankruptcy protection.

"I wouldn't be at all surprised," Benchmark analyst Helane Becker said Thursday. "In the past, these two airlines have talked and they have very little route overlap."

JPMorgan Chase analyst Jamie Baker said his firm "already has coined the term 'Delta Orient,' " a play on Northwest's former brand name, Northwest Orient.

Atlanta-based Delta is concentrated in the East and launches more daily flights across the Atlantic than any other carrier. Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest is concentrated in the Midwest and has a strong route structure in Asia.

The minimal route overlap is considered an advantage with federal regulators.

Airlines proposing a major merger would have to convince government regulators that the combination would not significantly reduce competition, or that one or both of the airlines would fail without the merger.

Northwest declined comment when asked about a merger with Delta. In a conference call Wednesday, Northwest CEO Doug Steenland said the timing and location of the filings was coincidental. He added he has long believed consolidation among airlines is likely.

Delta spokeswoman Chris Kelly said Delta "expects there will be more consolidation in the industry. Right now, Delta is focused on its own restructuring efforts."

The twin filings, outrageously high fuel prices and declining hope for financial relief from the government could spark a round of merger talks as the remaining big troubled airlines scramble for partners.

A judge today is expected to approve a merger between US Airways and America West Airlines. Five big potential partners remain: United Airlines, Delta and Northwest, all of which are now in bankruptcy protection, as well as American Airlines and Continental Airlines.

A merger of No. 3 Delta and No. 4 Northwest would propel the combined airline to the front of the industry pack. It would pass American and United and become the biggest airline in terms of revenue passenger miles, according to an analysis by Back Aviation Solutions.

Draft Legislation Aims To Aid Competition In Broadband Services (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

A key House committee released draft legislation yesterday requiring broadband providers to allow their subscribers to view any legal online content, a policy aimed at keeping big Internet companies from restricting access to competitors' Web offerings.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee draft is a victory for advocates of "net neutrality" -- the idea that Internet providers have to stand aside and allow customers to access any Web pages as long as the content is legal. The principle is considered crucial to preserving the open nature of the Internet and preventing big broadband providers from squeezing out smaller competitors that offer voice, video or other services.

Another provision in the proposed law also makes it easier for telephone companies to offer television over high-speed lines. It seeks to free cable and telephone companies from having to negotiate video franchises with numerous local authorities around the country, instead giving the Federal Communications Commission more authority over the process.

That would largely benefit the major telephone companies like Verizon Communications Inc., SBC Communications Corp. and BellSouth Corp., which hope to offer television over fiber-optic lines. Yesterday, officials at those companies reacted favorably to the legislation.

Other aspects of the draft legislation are aimed at making sure cable and telephone companies get equivalent regulatory treatment as they offer broadband Internet access.

The draft is a first salvo from the committee, which is led by Texas Republican Joe Barton, in what is likely to be a lengthy battle in Congress over any rewrite of the 1996 Telecommunications Act.

Kroes: EU Inquiry May Lead To Changes (AP)

By AOIFE WHITE, The Associated Press

AP, September 15, 2005

Sep. 15, 2005 - A European Union antitrust inquiry into retail banking may lead to changes in the way European banks are regulated, EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0006236

She said an ongoing investigation may be widened to see how regulation affects customer choice.

"Do public rules that may have a legitimate objective end up making markets more rigid and limit competition and consumer choice?" she asked European regulators at a twice-yearly meeting in London. "We want government to protect the consumer, but we also need to protect the consumer from the government."

The EU launched its investigation earlier this year, saying it wanted to look at areas where it thought competition was not functioning as well as it might.

Kroes said it was hard for consumers to get clear comparative information about products to allow them to make informed choices.

The head of the Irish Competition Authority, John Fingleton, said a national investigation into problems in Ireland's banking sector showed that banks often had customers for life.

"No company ever wants to give their customers information that could help them switch," he said.

There was nothing illegal in banks or insurance companies dragging their heels when customers asked for information, he said. But such "perfectly rational competitive behavior" led to a static banking market with few new providers.

The Irish government has made changes to help customers change banks, although Fingleton said people were still slow to switch over.

Sir Callum McCarthy of Britain's Financial Services Authority warned that consumers' ability to make financial decisions is "too often inadequate" because of basic literacy and math problems.

"We live in a society where individuals are being asked to make more and more financial decisions, many of which were previously taken for us," he said.

Poor math skills pose a problem for regulators because they assume that consumers are able to make an informed choice, have access to information they can understand and are dealing with financial providers who behave responsibly.

"In the retail market for financial services, all three of these conditions pose problems, particularly for investment products," he said.

Financial companies sometimes feed the problem. McCarthy cited one example of jargon-filled mail to customers which told them about "negative retrospective augmentation."

DaimlerChrysler Wins Reduction In EU Antitrust Fine (Update3) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 16, 2005

Sept. 15 (Bloomberg) -- A European Union court today annulled most of a 72 million-euro ($88 million) antitrust fine against DaimlerChrysler AG, ruling that the regulator was wrong to say the automaker broke EU law in Germany and Spain.

DaimlerChrysler, the world's fifth-largest carmaker, was fined in 2001 for breaking EU free-trade laws by instructing dealers in Spain, Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium not to sell to bargain hunters from other EU nations between 1985 and 1996.

The European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg cut the fine to 9.8 million euros, saying in a statement today that DaimlerChrysler acted ``unilaterally'' in Germany and therefore didn't break EU rules. In Spain, the automaker acted in line with national legislation, the court said. The tribunal upheld the EU's decision about the company's Belgian operations.

The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, has sought to bring down car prices by dissolving the exclusive ties between carmakers and dealerships. Starting in October 2002, the EU rules broke carmakers' lock on sales networks, permitting dealers to expand and sell different brands in the same showroom.

A spokeswoman for the Stuttgart, Germany-based automaker said today's decision showed that it had acted lawfully. The company may appeal the part of the ruling about Belgium, said the spokeswoman, who declined to be identified.

Appeal Considered

Either side of the case can appeal the judgment to the European Court of Justice, Europe's highest court. Such an appeal can only be made on points of law and not on the facts of the case.

``We will see over the course of the next two months whether there are points of law where we want to go to the Court of Justice,'' commission spokesman Jonathan Todd told reporters at a daily briefing in Brussels. The commission welcomed the Belgian part of the ruling and will ``very carefully'' study the parts of its decision that were overturned, he said.

Former Competition Commissioner Mario Monti said that during the five-year investigation, DaimlerChrysler refuted initial suspicions that it had a ``general strategy'' to interfere with trade across EU borders.

The commission said the decision was based on documents seized when the company's headquarters were raided in 1996, as well as subsidiaries in Spain, Belgium and the Netherlands.

The commission highlighted three sets of violations by DaimlerChrysler. The company told dealers to require non-Germans to put a 15 percent deposit on Mercedes-Benz cars bought in Germany. Germans were exempt from this practice.

DOJ_NMG_0006237

DaimlerChrysler also restricted competition between its own leasing companies and independent leasing companies by refusing to sell cars to the independents until they had found customers.

The automaker also sold fewer cars to dealers in Belgium who wouldn't comply with an order to restrict rebates to no more than 3 percent of the purchase price, according to the commission.

The case is T-325/01 DaimlerChrysler AG v Commission.

EU Court Reduces Antitrust Fine Against DaimlerChrysler On Competition Rules (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - BRUSSELS, Belgium-The European Union's Court of Justice reduced an antitrust fine against automaker DaimlerChrysler AG on Thursday to â,¬9.8 million (US$12 million) from â,¬71.8 million (US$88.2 million), annulling a decision by EU regulators that it violated competition rules in Germany and Spain.

The EU judges, however, upheld a decision on DaimlerChrysler's conduct in Belgium, where they said the company participated "in an anti-price-slashing agreement with the Belgian dealers."

The European Commission found DaimlerChrysler guilty in 2001 of infringing EU rules by preventing cross-border sales of the Mercedes-Benz brand, restricting price competition between dealers.

The EU court said, however, that under EU competition rules DaimlerChrysler could not be found guilty in Germany because it acted alone there.

The Commission had considered German dealers independent. Under EU rules, two companies have to coordinate "anticompetitive conduct" for a cartel violation to occur, the court ruled.

The Court in this case scrapped the Commission's initial fine of â,¬47.025 million (US$57.9 million).

In Spain, the EU court said DaimlerChrysler followed local law by forcing leasers to link each car with a contracted customer. The Commission had argued that this prevented local dealers from stocking up on Mercedes vehicles and created an artificial shortage. But the court said the Spanish law was "not contrary" to any EU law and overturned the â,¬15 million (US$18.47 million) fine.

Thursday's ruling follows earlier EU court decisions to reduce fines against car companies. Volkswagen AG had its antitrust fine reduced in 2003, from more than â,¬100 million (US$123.14 million) to â,¬90 million (US$110.83 million).

The Commission overhauled its auto-market competition rules in 2002. Manufacturers no longer are allowed to force dealers to sell only one brand, and for the first time, they are able to sell cars outside their home country.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Spitzer's New Target: Tree-Eating Beetles (LAW/AP)

By Michael Gormley, The Associated Press

Law.com, September 16, 2005

Four states sued the Bush administration Thursday over an invasive, tree-eating beetle that has entered the U.S. as a stowaway on cargo ships.

The Asian long-horned beetle, along with the emerald ash borer and the pine shoot beetle, are the culprits named in the lawsuit by attorneys general from New York, California, Connecticut and Illinois.

The states are seeking a court order to require the Agriculture Department to examine more effective and less environmentally harmful ways to prevent the insects from entering the country, said New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

State officials say the insects would cause extensive economic and environmental damage if they move from cities like New York and Chicago to working forests.

The pests enter the country in wooden pallets and wood-based packaging. The state officials contend that federal officials use a "marginally effective" pesticide, which is being phased out under an international treaty as unsafe to humans.

Also, they said the USDA is following a new rule that requires wooden shipping pallets and other wood packaging material carrying imports to be treated with heat or sprayed with methyl bromide, a chemical the state officials say depletes the ozone and could be a cancer risk.

"It simply doesn't follow that USDA officials are proposing to ramp up its use, and endanger air quality and public health, especially when there are proven non-chemical alternatives," said California Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

DOJ_NMG_0006238

One option would be to replace raw wood pallets with pallets made from plywood, processed wood or recycled plastic, a potentially expensive remedy.

The USDA is abiding by international treaties and is reviewing the lawsuit, said department spokeswoman Kristin Scuderi.

The Nuclear Waste Site In Utah (NYT)

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

While few people outside Utah were paying close attention last week, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission authorized the licensing of a private storage plant for spent nuclear fuel rods on an Indian reservation some 50 miles southwest of Salt Lake City. Utah's outraged political leaders pledged to use every legal and political trick available to block the project even though, as representatives of a very conservative state, they supposedly abhor bureaucratic or judicial interference with private corporate decisions. Their contention - that the storage site, backed by a consortium of eight utilities, would pose a safety hazard - seems overblown. If the project should clear all of the remaining regulatory, legal and commercial hurdles, it could provide a useful interim storage site while the nation seeks a more permanent burial site deep underground.

The government's long-term goal is to bury the waste in stable geologic formations that will be resistant to leaks for eons to come. Unfortunately, progress has been slow. The only site approved for evaluation - at Yucca Mountain in Nevada - has been hobbled by technical problems and legal challenges. Meanwhile, spent fuel rods have been piling up in cooling pools and in dry-storage casks at nuclear reactor sites around the country.

So far as is known, the used fuel rods can be left there safely for decades. But it becomes awkward and costly to guard and maintain the storage casks after the reactors themselves have been retired from service. Several reactors have already been shut down, and more are apt to follow. In some cases, the spent fuel rods sit on land that might have more valuable uses. Unless these used fuel rods can be sent to Yucca, a destination that has not yet been approved to receive them, it seems desirable to have a backup site.

The question of whether Utah is the best place for such a site has never been addressed. Private Fuel Storage, a company set up by the utilities, simply negotiated a deal with a small, poor Indian tribe, the Skull Valley Goshutes, for an undisclosed but presumably substantial amount of money. The site seems safe enough. The Atomic Safety and Licensing Board and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission - both charged with protecting the public from nuclear hazards - approved the project after an exhaustive eight-year process.

There are still hurdles to clear before the site can be developed. The state plans to appeal the decision in federal courts. It will also try to persuade the Bureau of Indian Affairs to withhold approval of the lease and will ask the Bureau of Land Management to deny a right of way needed for a rail spur to haul spent fuel to the site. So there is plenty of room for political interference should the Bush administration wish to do Utah a favor.

Meanwhile, Private Fuel Storage will need to sign up enough customers to make the project financially viable. Some utilities in the consortium are reported to be in no great rush to ship fuel rods to the site only to then ship them a second time, to Yucca.

We remain hopeful that Yucca can qualify as a permanent disposal site. But if Yucca fails to pass muster with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the nation will need a centralized surface site to fill the gap until a safe burial location can be found. The Indian reservation in Utah can fill that purpose.

Hearing on Indian Trust Judge Delayed (WP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

A federal appeals court panel has decided it will not hear arguments today about whether U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth has lost the appearance of impartiality in overseeing a lawsuit involving billions of dollars the government may owe Native Americans.

The appeals court panel was scheduled to consider another dispute in the case along with the government's unusual July request to remove Lamberth as the presiding judge. Lamberth has repeatedly ruled that the Interior Department has refused to properly account for property, rent and gas and oil royalties owed to Indians, a duty the government took on when it seized management of Indian lands more than a century ago.

But the three-judge panel issued an order late yesterday saying they will instead refer the issue of Lamberth's perceived fairness to a later panel of judges considering another appeal dispute in the case, Cobell v. Norton . That means that the Justice Department is not likely to hold a hearing on its complaints about the judge until spring, based on the appellate court's already full schedule this year.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Top Attorney To Admit Guilt In Pot Conspiracy (MH)

By JAY WEAVER

The Miami Herald, September 16, 2005

In February, federal agents rustled a prominent lawyer out of bed to bust him at his Miami Beach waterfront home.

Today, Samuel I. Burstyn is scheduled to plead guilty to scheming with his former clients to obstruct a federal grand jury's investigation into their drug-trafficking operation and himself.

Burstyn -- once a defense attorney in demand who counted bad Miami cops, tennis star Boris Becker's ex-wife and former Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega's right-hand man among his clients -- faces five years in prison.

He must forfeit about $200,000 and is expected to lose his law license.

U.S. District Judge William J. Zloch has insisted on a "full confession" from Burstyn at the Fort Lauderdale plea hearing, according to a court document filed Tuesday. Normally, federal judges leave it up to the defendant to decide whether to say anything at such hearings.

Burstyn's lawyer, Fred Haddad, and Assistant U.S. Attorney Brian McCormick declined to comment on Thursday.

Burstyn, 52, has been held without bond in the Miami Federal Detention Center since the morning of Feb. 23, when agents from the FBI, Internal Revenue and local law enforcement arrested him at his $4.5 million Miami Beach home on Sunset Island.

He pleaded not guilty to 12 counts of conspiracy, money laundering, obstruction of justice and making a false declaration to a federal grand jury. In his deal with prosecutors, he is expected to plead guilty to one count of conspiring to obstruct justice.

The other 11 counts would be dismissed.

McCormick and fellow prosecutor Michael Dittoe have said Burstyn acted as "house counsel" for marijuana smugglers Jeffrey Tobin, David Tobin and others.

Burstyn allegedly loaned money to a Tobin business associate, advised the Tobins to invest their drug proceeds into diamonds, instructed them to lie to the grand jury and, in one case, urged Jeffrey Tobin to flee from justice.

Prosecutors made their case against Burstyn by first targeting the Tobins, who eventually provided incriminating information about the lawyer in exchange for more lenient sentences.

In 2003, Burstyn allegedly contacted a business associate to help Jeffrey Tobin hide more than $600,000 in drug proceeds through the purchase of diamonds, according to the indictment. Tobin wired the money for the diamond purchase that October.

The following year, a Fort Lauderdale federal grand jury indicted the Tobin-led ring. David Tobin and others were arrested that January, but Jeffrey Tobin became a fugitive. FBI agents caught up with him in March 2004 in New York City, where Burstyn represented him at a bond hearing.

In less than a year, Burstyn was charged, along with the Tobin organization, with trying to obstruct justice. Prosecutors dubbed them the ``Enterprise."

Among the allegations: ``Burstyn would organize meetings with potential witnesses in order to convince them to provide false and misleading information to a federal grand jury and law enforcement officials."

Coast Guard Seizes Cocaine In Pacific (AP)

AP, September 16, 2005

BOGOTA, Colombia - The U.S. Coast Guard, acting on Colombian intelligence, intercepted a ship towing an unmanned submarine-like vessel that held more than 2 tons of cocaine, Colombia's anti-narcotics police chief said Thursday.

The boat was raided Wednesday off the coast of the Ecuadorean-owned Galapagos Islands, Gen. Alberto Gomez told reporters. The underwater capsule, which was attached by a metal cable, was designed so smugglers could tow it below their boat and escape detection if drug agents searched the ship.

Although similar capsules have been seized in the past, Gomez said that increased vigilance in the Pacific has forced drug smugglers to come up with increasingly creative ways to hide their illegal shipments.

Separately, 2.5 tons of cocaine were discovered Wednesday hidden in the oil tanks of a ship docked in the Colombian Pacific port of Buenaventura, Adm. Jairo Pena, commander of Colombia's Pacific fleet, said in a statement. Eight suspects were arrested.

He said the cocaine was likely going to be taken to Central America from where it would be shipped on to the United States.

Colombia is the world's biggest produce of cocaine and a major supplier of heroin to the United States. The Colombian navy has this year seized a record 46 tons of cocaine.

Also Thursday, authorities seized $4.5 million worth of counterfeit American currency during a raid on a clandestine printing workshop in south Bogota, police said in a statement. The network had been sending the money to Ecuador and Venezuela, where the U.S. dollar is widely accepted as legal tender.

Police have so far this year seized $20 million in counterfeit bills, compared with a total of $7.4 million in 2004.

Plea Deal Goes Awry (PROJO)

By W. Zachary Malinowski And Mike Stanton, Journal Staff Writers

The Providence Journal, September 16, 2005

PROVIDENCE -- Mob associate Alan Blamires was set to plead guilty yesterday to charges that he guarded a large shipment of cocaine that was passing through Rhode Island last winter.

At least that's what the judge, prosecutor and Blamires' defense lawyer thought.

But in an unusual and unexpected development, the plea agreement fell apart. Blamires told Chief U.S. District Court Judge Ernest C. Torres that he was "fuzzy and blurry" from medication to control his violent tendencies and did not understand the charges against him.

Suddenly, Blamires blurted out, "I have pertinent information about Joseph Bevilacqua that I'm trying to get to the prosecutors."

Torres told him that he should talk to the prosecutors.

"They won't let me," said Blamires.

Torres canceled the hearing and put Blamires' case on the trial calendar for October.

Afterward, in the hallway outside the courtroom, First U.S. Attorney Kenneth P. Madden said that he would be willing to talk to Blamires, but he would have to plead guilty, first.

"I have no idea what he wants to say," Madden said.

Last Friday, Bevilacqua, a prominent defense lawyer from a politically influential family, was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison for lying about his role in providing a surveillance videotape to TV newsman Jim Taricani.

Taricani was ordered to serve a sentence of six months of home confinement for refusing to disclose Bevilacqua as his source.

Bevilacqua also has been the target of a Drug Enforcement Administration investigation. DEA agents have spoken to Courtney Calenda, an East Greenwich teenager, who has accused Bevilacqua of sexually assaulting her and supplying her with cocaine.

Last week, Calenda and her parents sued Bevilacqua in Kent County Superior Court.

In January, Blamires, 49, was arrested with mobster Matthew L. Guglielmetti and Anthony P. Moscarelli in an FBI sting operation. Guglielmetti reached an agreement with an undercover FBI agent that he would protect 67 kilograms of cocaine that was passing through Rhode Island.

Guglielmetti, who recently was sentenced to more than 11 years in federal prison for his role in the scheme, recruited Blamires and Moscarelli to guard the cocaine in a hotel.

Moscarelli also has pleaded guilty to criminal charges and is awaiting sentencing.

Yesterday, Madden detailed for the court Blamires' role in guarding the drug shipment, which was kept in a local hotel. The prosecutor said that the government was willing to request a shorter prison term -- still a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison -- based on Blamires' willingness to plead guilty and his "minor role" in the affair.

But when Torres quizzed Blamires about whether he was able to comprehend what he was admitting to, the defendant, who appeared disoriented, said that he couldn't, because of three different medications he was taking for "posttraumatic stress," a condition for which he has been treated at the Johnston Mental Health Center.

"It makes you fuzzy and blurry," he told Torres. "It doesn't make you sharp. They give [the medication] to me in the morning, so I don't get violent and worked up."

Blamires' lawyer, Richard K. Corley, then asked his client a series of questions in an effort to clear up the confusion.

That prompted an agitated Blamires, a large, burly man, to tell Corley: "You told me that all I was admitting to was that I went to a hotel room to guard something. That's the truth."

Madden told Torres, "I don't think the drugs are affecting him, but I think his view of how criminally culpable he is, is different from the government's."

Still, under the circumstances, Torres said that he had no choice but to refuse to allow Blamires to plead guilty.

After the hearing, marshals shackled Blamires with a chain around his waist, in addition to the usual handcuffs and leg irons. He quietly shuffled from the courtroom.

Local Men Plead Guilty (STANDEM)

Standard Democrat, September 16, 2005

CAPE GIRARDEAU - Two Southeast Missouri men entered guilty pleas on drug charges in federal court.

Adrian L. Lewis, 25, of Charleston pled guilty to one felony count of distribution of cocaine base and one felony count of distribution of five grams or more of cocaine base. He appeared before United States District Judge Charles A. Shaw.

With the plea, Lewis admitted that on July 10, 2002, and Dec. 16, 2002, he sold a total of 9.2 grams of "crack" cocaine to a Southeast Missouri Drug Task Force officer.

Lewis now faces a maximum punishment on count one of 20 years imprisonment and a $1,00,000 fine. He faces a maximum punishment on count two of 40 years in prison and a $2,000,000 fine. Sentencing is set for Nov. 21.

Joe Lenzie Turner, a Scott County resident, entered a plea of guilty to one felony count of distribution of cocaine base. He appeared before U.S. district Judge Charles A. Shaw on Tuesday.

Turner now faces a maximum of 40 years imprisonment and a $2,000,000 fine, followed by a period of supervised release of at least four years. Sentencing is set for Nov. 22, in Cape Girardeau.

With his plea, Turner admitted that on May 20, 2005, he distributed a substance containing base (also referred to as "crack") to a confidential informant. Specifically, Turner gave the informant 5.4 grams of cocaine base in exchange for $300. The sale occurred at a location on County Road 427 in Scott County.

United States Attorney, Catherine L. Hanaway commended the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Sikeston Department of Public Safety for their combined efforts to prosecute the case.

Meth Dealer Gets Prison Time (LYNNA)

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, September 16, 2005

Despite several tearful pleas from friends and family, a Lynchburg federal judge blasted a Rustburg man Thursday for his role in the selling of methamphetamines.

"You don't know how many lives were destroyed … Generations of others will be coming through this courtroom because of his actions. You're old and in pain. That's not an excuse," U.S. District Judge Norman K. Moon said.

Moon didn't believe Clayton "Sonny" Keyes' story that he only started using meth in 2001 because his back pain had become so painful, and that he began selling the drug only to support his addiction.

Keyes, 55, pleaded guilty in April 2004 to conspiracy to distribute more than 15 kilograms of methamphetamine and possession of a firearm. He has already served two years in jail since his arrest.

On Thursday, Moon gave Keyes nearly 10 additional years in prison, despite calling the prosecutor-recommended sentence "overly generous."

Moon agreed with prosecutors, describing Keyes' role in the drug ring as a leader, saying it was "absurd" to say Keyes was selling only enough to support his own needs.

"Very few drug dealers are making a profit while supporting their habit," he said.

Keyes is one of dozens of Central Virginians convicted after a three-year investigation by the FBI and Central Virginia Drug Task Force, which includes federal, state and local law enforcement officials.

The investigation has resulted in more than 30 arrests, nearly $4 million in court-imposed judgments and the seizure of large amounts of cash, drugs and firearms.

More than 20 friends and family members crowded into the courtroom Thursday morning. The room echoed with muffled cries and sniffles and people shook violently as they wept, including Keyes himself.

Witnesses repeatedly smiled at Keyes as they walked by, reaching for his hand and whispering, "I love you."

"He's a wonderful husband. He always took care of me," wife Rose Keyes testified.

Keyes' daughter called her father an inspiration who worked hard to make a life for his family.

Several people said Clayton Keyes was in constant pain after falling off a dock at work several years earlier and that, even with painkillers, the pain only worsened.

Keyes, his eyes puffy and red-rimmed from crying, sobbed as he read a prepared statement on the stand.

"In 2001, my brother gave me meth. He told me it would make me forget I had a back. He was right. For the first time in years, I didn't feel any pain," Keyes said.

"I had the energy to play with my grandkids. I liked to work on cars and I could do so for hours. It really was a miracle drug for me."

Keyes said he didn't realize what he had done until his arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0006242

"Jail broke me down. I'm a broken man," he said. "If you give me 10 years (in prison), you give me a death sentence. I've seen what meth did to me and my family. I will do 100 years of probation. I will do a million years of community service. I will talk to others about this evil drug."

Defense attorney Carter Garrett called his client "a pawn" in the conspiracy and told the judge Keyes got swept up in the drug use and was as much a victim as the people he sold to.

"He just lost his mind in his addiction. He's not a criminal at heart," Garrett said.

Garrett started to ask the judge how many drug dealers come into court at his client's age with no prior record and a 30-year marriage and having worked a steady job, but the judge cut him off.

"By far, more and more people. He's not the oldest to (come before me)," Moon said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim Heaphy said Keyes was fortunate to have such a supportive family, but that they only knew one side of Keyes.

He pointed out that in addition to methamphetamines, investigators found cocaine, 29 firearms, $60,000 in cash and a closed-circuit surveillance setup installed at Keyes' house.

"He was a significant methamphetamine trafficker in this area. He was a supervisor, a manager, who enriched himself by exploiting the weaknesses of others," Heaphy said, adding that Keyes received numerous meth packages from California suppliers at his house.

After court, Heaphy said the case was another example of the dangers that come with using meth.

"People who are upstanding and productive, it takes over their lives," he said. "People like Keyes, they take it a step further. They see the potential of making money and that's when we get involved."

Borderline Crime (MISSIND)

By Jessie McQuillan

Missoula Independent, September 16, 2005

Loretta Nall, founder of the U.S. Marijuana Party and Alabama gubernatorial candidate, collects donations at Missoula's Hempfest Sept. 10 in Caras Park. Nall, who spoke to the crowd about Marc Emery, a Canadian fighting extradition to the United States on marijuana charges, says the money will help fund Emery's legal defense. BC's Prince of Pot faces extradition

While 4,000 people gathered in Caras Park Sept. 10 to support industrial hemp at Missoula's Hempfest, worldwide Smoke Out America protests calling for an end to the U.S. drug war drew thousands more. One protest, at the U.S. Consulate in Vancouver, British Columbia, had special urgency and a special guest. Marc Emery, aka "the Prince of Pot" who founded the British Columbia Marijuana Party [BCMP] as well as Cannabis Culture magazine and Internet-based Pot TV, showed up to rally for his own cause.

At the request of the U.S. government, Emery and two of his employees—Greg Williams and Michelle Rainey-Fenkarek—were arrested July 29 by Canadian police on U.S. charges of conspiring to distribute marijuana and marijuana seeds and money laundering. The charges stem from Emery's marijuana seed-selling business, Mark Emery Direct Seeds, reputedly the world's largest marijuana seed business, which had been in business for nearly a decade. According to the Drug Enforcement Agency, an 18-month investigation traced Emery's seeds to busted growing operations in nine states, including Montana, and the charges seek to hold the defendants responsible for those plants. The process of extraditing the "B.C. Three" is underway and each of the three charges could carry penalties of 10 years to life in prison. While Emery and his lawyer, John Conroy, are hopeful they can fight extradition successfully, they're also nervous because Canada and the United States have a long history of granting one another's requests.

Still, many factors besides Emery's alleged crimes feed into the issue—Canadian sovereignty and political persecution, to name two. Although selling seeds is technically illegal in Canada, the government there has deliberately ignored Emery's business—and dozens of similar ones—for several years, Emery says. Since 1999 he's paid $578,000 in income taxes openly generated by the seed business, Emery claims, and the Canadian health department even referred medical marijuana patients seeking seeds to his website.

"I've been selling seeds untouched for seven years, every day of my life," says Emery, who's out on bail. "Seeds have become so acceptable here, and the last time anyone was fined it was like a $500 fine in 2000."

He says he was surprised to find that the charges came from the States. Emery hasn't left his home country in eight years because he knows the DEA might arrest him overseas, but he figured he was safe in Canada.

Conroy says the fact that Canadian citizens may be harshly punished for something their own government chooses to ignore irks Canadians. A poll by the Canadian newspaper Globe and Mail backs that claim, showing that a majority of Canadians oppose extraditing Emery, and their interviews reveal concerns about Canadian sovereignty as well as the disparity between how Canadians and Americans enforce and sentence marijuana crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0006243

Conroy says the main argument in Emery's favor is that the U.S. prosecution is politically motivated. Though DEA agents paint Emery as a greedy drug trafficker, Emery says he's dedicated the last 15 years to the cause of marijuana legalization and has donated all business proceeds—$4 million—to the movement and its activists, both in Canada and the United States.

A statement issued by DEA Administrator Karen Tandy the day of Emery's arrest goes a long way toward showing the true aims of U.S. prosecutors, Emery and Conroy say.

"Today's DEA arrest of Marc Scott Emery, publisher of Cannabis Culture Magazine, and the founder of a marijuana legalization group, is a significant blow not only to the marijuana trafficking trade in the U.S. and Canada, but also to the marijuana legalization movement… Hundreds of thousands of dollars of Emery's illicit profits are known to have been channeled to marijuana legalization groups active in the United States and Canada. Drug legalization lobbyists now have one less pot of money to rely on," the statement reads.

"That's revealing," says Emery. "It mentions the movement in four places. The whole thing is about politics…There are dozens and dozens of seed distributors in Canada but I'm the only one who's a political activist."

Though the timing of Missoula's Hempfest in relation to Smoke Out America was a coincidence, according to organizer John Masterson, the Caras Park appearance of U.S. Marijuana Party founder Loretta Nall was not. Nall, who's worked with Emery, Cannabis Culture and Pot TV since 2002, spoke to the crowd about Emery's case and collected more than $200 in donations for his legal defense.

Kirk Tousaw, the BCMP general counsel who's coordinating Emery's legal team, says the extradition process will likely take at least two years, and both the British Columbia Supreme Court and Justice Minister Irwin Cotler would have to approve the surrender of the B.C. Three.

Cotler could deny approval if he believes the crime's potential punishments would "shock the conscience" or that the prosecution is politically motivated. In addition to the political persecution argument, Conroy will argue before the BC Supreme Court that the disparity between the countries' sentences is shocking: "In the States it's 10 to life without parole—up here it's a fine…The maximum for production up here is seven years for any amount," he says. "We got rid of a mandatory seven-year minimum for import/export because it was cruel and unusual."

Tousaw says both Canadians and Americans should call upon Cotler to deny extradition. Emery's first extradition hearing is Sept. 16.

"It is a unique situation in this sense: We're talking about nonviolent, nonharmful people who have not set foot in the U.S., whose alleged activities were conducted in the open for political reasons, and who were not impeded in any way by the Canadian government," Tousaw says.

US Takes The War On Drugs To Canada's Prince Of Pot (GUARD)

Guardian (UK), September 16, 2005

One of the world's leading cannabis legalisation campaigners, a magazine publisher known as the "Prince of Pot", faces an extradition hearing today in Vancouver as American drugs agencies seek to put him on trial in the US. His supporters claim the move is a first step by US authorities to prosecute foreigners who challenge the US laws on cannabis.

Marc Emery, publisher of Cannabis Culture, faces charges of trafficking in marijuana seeds and money laundering. His supporters have been demonstrating outside Canadian embassies in more than 30 countries during the past week to urge Canada's authorities not to yield to pressure from the US and hand him over, arguing he could face a lifetime in prison if they did so.

Article continues

A former bookseller, Mr Emery became a cannabis campaigner 15 years ago, angered by a ban on selling publications that promoted cannabis use. He has since become one of the best-known figures in the cannabis debate worldwide and operates the small television station Pot-TV. His magazine, Cannabis Culture, founded in 1994, promotes the sale of marijuana seeds.

Mr Emery has paid C$578,000 (£267,000) in personal taxes between 1999 to 2005 on income that was explicitly from the sale of such seeds. He describes himself on his tax returns as a marijuana seed vendor and sends a free copy of his magazine to every Canadian MP.

The main charges he would face in the US are for selling the seeds - considered international drug trafficking. Money laundering charges might be levelled because the profits he makes from the sales are used to promote the legalisation of cannabis.

"I have always been very, very transparent in the way I have conducted a career," Mr Emery said in a message posted about his arrest on his website. "I have often described [what I do] as 'revolutionary retail' or 'capitalist activism'." He suspected the US authorities wanted to make an example of him.

"If I were to be extradited and prosecuted in the US, [I would face] probably life imprisonment," he said. "Under 'Drug Kingpin' legislation, selling over 60,000 seeds qualifies for the death penalty. I would be the first person under this recent law who could qualify to be executed for the activity I have clearly done with the tacit approval of everyone in Canada."

When the US drug enforcement administration undercover agent "tried to get me to sell her 10lbs of pot over the phone, I refused and told her that I always assumed my cell phone was monitored, so how could she be so foolish and naive. When she asked again at a later time, I lectured her at length. Not only did I not sell pot, but she was foolish to even think about importing pot to the USA."

The US authorities say that the action is a joint venture with the Canadians.

United States Decertifies Venezuela As Ally In War On Drugs (TD/KRT)

By Steven Dudley And Pablo Bachelet

Tallahassee Democrat, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - President Bush has taken Venezuela off his list of allies in the war on drugs, saying that the government of President Hugo Chavez spurned anti-drug cooperation with U.S. officials and fired its effective law enforcement officers.

But the White House waived the cuts in U.S. foreign aid usually attached to the "decertification" so that it can continue to support Venezuelan pro-democracy groups that oppose the leftist Chavez.

Bush's decision is expected to sharply exacerbate already bitter U.S.-Venezuelan relations roiled by Washington's charges that Chavez is promoting subversion around the hemisphere and the Venezuelan president's allegations that Bush is out to kill him.

The U.S. State Department's No. 3 official, Nicholas Burns, announced the Bush administration decision Thursday in New York City around the time Chavez was arriving there for a U.N. summit gathering. The only other nation decertified this year was Myanmar, formerly known as Burma.

Accompanying Burns, U.S. drug czar John Walters said that in the past Venezuelan cooperation on drugs was "quite successful and extensive" but that now it seemed that Chavez "no longer wants a productive relationship."

Venezuelan Vice President Jose Vicente Rangel said of the annual certification process required by U.S. law, "We reject it. ... it's infantile."

The White House said Venezuela had "failed demonstrably" to stem the flow through its territory of some 150 tons of cocaine and growing amounts of heroin, mostly coming from neighboring Colombia and bound for U.S. and European streets.

Venezuela's national counternarcotics director, chief narcotics prosecutor and head of the financial intelligence unit "were fired and replaced with Chavez loyalists who lack the necessary training," the statement added.

Caracas had failed to eradicate coca and poppy fields near its border with Colombia, it continued, and did little to stop corruption in law enforcement and the military.

Only last month, Chavez ordered his government officials to stop cooperating with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), accusing it of espionage and drug trafficking. U.S. officials denied the charges, and the Venezuelan investigators continued to work with the DEA.

DEA's activities in Caracas turned particularly sensitive last year amid complaints that high-ranking officers of the Venezuelan National Guard are involved in a drug-trafficking "Sun Cartel" named after the sun insignia that Venezuelan generals use on their epaulets instead of stars.

Guard officers earlier this year withdrew from an anti-drug task force that included the DEA, and took thousands of dollars of U.S. donated surveillance equipment. The equipment was returned later at the behest of the government's principal anti-drug office, known as CONACUID. But then the head of CONACUID was fired.

The U.S. government later revoked the visas of three National Guard officers for suspected involvement in drug trafficking, including Gen. Frank Morgado, former head of the Guard's anti-drug unit.

Venezuelan Interior and Justice Minister Jesse Chacon earlier this week proposed formally renewing the partnership with the DEA, and presented a written proposal to the U.S. Embassy in Caracas. But he added that the new proposal, among other provisions, prohibits DEA agents from participating in police operations there.

The Bush administration has repeatedly expressed concern about the alleged deterioration of democratic institutions in Venezuela, citing Chavez's control of the judicial and electoral systems and threats to the independent news media. Chavez insists that he's carrying out a radical but peaceful revolution on behalf of the nation's poor.

The waiver of the decertification sanctions - officially for national security interests - will allow the U.S. government to support democratic institutions there and "strengthen Venezuela's political party system," the White House said. The two nations remain dependent on each other since Venezuela provides 12 to 15 percent of U.S. oil imports.

DOJ_NMG_0006245

A State Department official said Venezuela's refusal to sign a bilateral data-sharing agreement has made it impossible for Washington to show Caracas evidence that an increasing number of aircraft suspected of carrying drugs were flying in and out of Venezuela.

Venezuela also has long banned U.S. anti-drug surveillance overflights of its territory and more recently curtailed military-to-military cooperation on drugs, the White House announcement stated.

In anticipation of the decertification decision, Chacon announced earlier this week that Venezuelan authorities had seized a record 18.7 tons of cocaine in the first eight months of 2005, compared with 19.6 tons throughout 2004. Failure to recognize the government's anti-drug efforts showed Washington was acting for political motives, he said.

But U.S. officials told The Herald in Caracas that Chacon's numbers were vastly exaggerated because they included at least four tons seized aboard Venezuelan ships - by French and Dutch authorities in the Caribbean.

Bush Assails Venezuelan Anti-drug Efforts (TSSC)

By George Gedda

The State (SC), September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - President Bush said Thursday that Venezuela "failed demonstrably" to make a concerted effort to block shipments of illicit narcotics to the United States and Europe last year.

The designation is certain to strain further U.S. relations with Venezuela's populist president, Hugo Chavez.

Venezuela could have been subjected to a cutoff of U.S. assistance, but Bush decided to waive the provision because of national security interests.

The United States has programs to support Venezuela's democratic institutions, establish community development projects and strengthen the country's political party system.

The administration decided not to cut these programs because they promote democracy in Venezuela, a key U.S. goal in a country where, officials say, the commitment to democratic norms has been eroding under Chavez.

Myanmar was the only other country listed as having failed to meet its obligations under international counternarcotics requirements. But it has received that same designation in previous years.

Chavez had no direct comment Thursday on Bush's action but used the occasion of his presence at the United Nations summit of world leaders to take a verbal swipe at Bush.

"Mr. Bush represents the most crude and savage imperialism that threatens the world," Chavez said.

A White House "statement of explanation" about Venezuela said 165 tons of cocaine moved through the country last year along with increasing quantities of heroin.

"Despite an increase in drug seizures during the past four years, it is our assessment that the government of Venezuela has not addressed the increasing use of Venezuelan territory to transport drugs to the United States," the statement said.

In early August, Chavez accused the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration of using its agents in Venezuela for espionage, and said Venezuela was suspending cooperation with the agency. The Bush administration denied the espionage charge.

Venezuelan Vice President Jose Vicente Rangel said Thursday that Venezuela "doesn't recognize" Washington's authority regarding drug classification, but remains willing to cooperate with the United States in fighting drug trafficking.

He said DEA agents would be welcome back in Venezuela under certain conditions.

Chavez claims that Venezuelan authorities have been very successful in detecting shipments of illegal drugs. He has said the United States, as the world's top consumer of drugs, does little to decrease consumption.

Bush's designation on Thursday adds to the growing list of issues between the United States and Venezuela. The administration is concerned about the close ties Venezuela maintains with Cuba and Chavez's perceived efforts to expand Venezuelan influence in other Latin American countries.

The administration also has strong doubts about whether Chavez will uphold Venezuela's tradition of free and fair elections.

Venezuela was included on a White House list, issued annually, of major drug transit or drug-producing countries. The others are Afghanistan, the Bahamas, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Jamaica, Laos, Mexico, Myanmar, Nigeria, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay and Peru.

U.S. law requires that the administration issue an annual list of countries with drug production or trafficking problems. Almost all the countries named this year are repeaters.

The designation is not necessarily an adverse reflection of a country's commitment to combat drugs.

Colombia has been the world's principal source of cocaine over the years, but the United States has consistently given high marks to President Alvaro Uribe for his counternarcotics efforts.

Program To Battle Colombian Drug Trafficking Gets Fresh Scrutiny (KRT)

By Shannon Mccaffrey

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

BOGOTA, Colombia - (KRT) - The six puppies looked fine at first. But when Colombian police gave them a closer look they found fresh scars on their bellies that told a different story.

The tiny Labradors and Rottweilers had been surgically converted into drug couriers: cut open with several plastic packets of heroin stitched into their abdomens.

Even the hardened Colombian police, who discovered the puppies at an abandoned house in a rural area outside of Medellin, had never seen anything like it. Traffickers were apparently going to ship the dogs to the United States saying they were pets. It's almost certain they would have been discarded as soon as their valuable cargo was removed.

"The better we get at catching them the more creative they get," said Mark Styron, supervisor of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Heroin Group in Bogota. "That's always the problem."

Much of the cocaine and heroin that ends up for sale on the street corners of the United States begins in the rich soil of this conflict-ridden South American country. And staying ahead of the smugglers is expensive. Since 2000, the United States has sent $4.5 billion to Colombia to help battle drug trafficking.

That six-year program, known as Plan Colombia, is set to expire at the end of this year.

Although the Bush administration and Congress have signaled a willingness to continue funding at current levels for at least another year, some are questioning whether the money has been effective in stemming the tide of drugs to the United States.

The Colombians point with pride to the hundreds of thousands of acres of coca and poppy fields they've destroyed and the tons of drugs seized at their airports and borders. Kidnappings and murders are down.

But a report from the United Nations showed that while coca cultivation in Colombia is down, it has risen in neighboring Peru and Bolivia.

And the efforts in Colombia seem to have had little measurable effect on the drug supply in the United States. The Justice Department's National Drug Threat Assessment for 2005 found that heroin and cocaine were still readily available throughout the United States. Data from the Drug Enforcement Administration shows that the purity of wholesale cocaine being smuggled in from South America has actually increased slightly.

But, at least with heroin, there is some evidence that a crackdown begun in 2002 is showing results. DEA tests show that purity has dipped 14.5 percent since 2000.

It is generally believed that if a drug is in short supply purity decreases, and prices increase.

Colombia remains the world's largest producer of cocaine and the nation's image remains closely linked to the drug.

Yet in America concern is running high about heroin. Although the opiate is not used with the frequency of cocaine or marijuana, it's highly addictive and leads to a disproportionately high number of overdoses and deaths, according to emergency room data.

Colombia produces only 2 percent of the world's heroin but it's generally believed to be among the best, often so pure that users can snort it, rather than injecting it. And almost all Colombian heroin flows into the United States. Ninety percent of the heroin on the East Coast is Colombian, according to the DEA.

The Justice Department reports that heroin use was up among American college students in 2003, the most recent year for which data was available, after several years of steady decline.

Evidence of the problem's reach came recently when a delegation of 10 American police officers arrived in Bogota to study the heroin problem at its source. The narcotics cops from Pennsylvania and Maryland are battling a rising heroin trade on the street corners at home.

They soon learned that, in Colombia, the war on drugs is not just a figure of speech. Hustling through Bogota in armored SUVs, they were surrounded by their Colombian counterparts, who cradled M-15s and dressed more like commandos than cops.

At a hospital in Bogota - set up by the government just for the nation's police - they met Carlos Mira. The 30-year-old had his leg shattered in an ambush by guerrillas armed with rifles and hand grenades. His doctors say he may never walk normally again. He's the lucky one. His partner was killed.

"Tell the Americans that this is what the drugs do," he said simply, no malice in his voice.

Fifteen Colombian police officers on patrol in a remote area near the border with Venezuela were killed by a bomb just days before the Americans arrived, bringing the total police deaths so far this year to 120. In the early 1990s some 600 police officers were killed each year by heavily armed guerrilla and paramilitary groups.

DOJ_NMG_0006247

Plan Colombia was launched under the Clinton administration as a way to fight drugs. After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress said the funding could be used for counterterrorism as well.

In Colombia, the two are inseparable, officials say.

"The drugs are the terrorists' juice," said William Wood, U.S. ambassador to Colombia.

The drug pipeline to the United States often begins in the camps of the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia. Known the by its Spanish acronym, the FARC controls swaths of rural coca and poppy growing territory. Colombian police and intelligence officials say the FARC supports itself and its insurgency against the government with millions of dollars from the drug trade.

One FARC defector, "Jose," said in an interview with Knight Ridder that he abandoned the group because of its brutality. Leaders in his front ordered his brother to kill his girlfriend after she violated the rules and killed a civilian. Jose, who declined to use his real name out of fear of retaliation, said he grew up in the FARC, and that drugs were a constant presence.

"To end the drug war you have to end the guerrillas. As long as there are guerrillas there are drugs. They exist together," he said.

The FARC is believed to have recently executed 14 peasants who were growing coca and selling it to their right-wing paramilitary foes. The ongoing fighting in remote regions means that Colombia has the third highest number of displaced people in the world, trailing only the African nations of the Sudan and the Congo.

The Mineros Block of the United Self Defense Force - or AUC - a right-wing paramilitary group, is disbanding as part of an ongoing peace process with the government. That has helped drive down violence in Colombia.

But in Washington, some lawmakers are hesitant about funding demobilization efforts because of concerns that those who have committed human rights will escape punishment.

Everywhere in Colombia there is evidence of American money and influence: Blackhawk and Huey helicopters, twin-engine Otter police planes, fixed wing fumigation planes. At a rural training site southwest of Bogota, American Special Forces help the Colombians train for dangerous raids to destroy drug labs.

"It would be much worse without the U.S.," said Gen. Jorge Daniel Castro, chief of the Colombian National Police. "This is a long and difficult battle and the United States has been our strongest ally."

But over the last 10 years Colombia has lost 40 U.S.-supplied aircraft battling the FARC and AUC. The additional aid is needed to keep the fleet operating, the Colombians say.

Colombian and American officials agree that drug seizures reached record levels last year and the eradication of coca and poppy plants through herbicide spraying is at an all-time high.

Col. Jamil Moreno, who heads up tactical anti-drug operations for the Colombian National Police, said poppy plants, in particular, are difficult to spray because they are able to grow at high elevations, nestled into the sides of mountains. Moreno said police pilots have sustained bullet holes to the canopies on top of their planes.

"The guerrillas are above us on the mountains. It is very dangerous," he said.

Moreno's experience fighting poppy crops in Colombia has put him in demand. Negotiations are underway to have the Colombian travel to Afghanistan to help develop a strategy for battling poppy crops there.

U.S. Ambassador Wood said that more people die every year in the United States from Colombian drugs than in the Sept. 11 attacks. U.S. aid will eventually decline as the situation stabilizes, he said. But the drug problem will never go away entirely and the United States - as the primary consumer of American drugs - will likely always have a role in Colombia.

"It's like asking when is crime over. It's never going to be over," Wood said.

Still the continuing costs of the war in Iraq and the huge budget deficit have caused the aid to Colombia to come under more than the usual scrutiny this year. And the foreign policy landscape has changed since the Sept. 11 attacks so that the Middle East has consumed most of America's attention.

A telling symbol of that comes in real estate. The fortresslike U.S. Embassy in Bogota is the largest in the world. But it will eventually be surpassed by an even more massive new facility planned for Iraq.

The 'Good Death' Dilemma (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

BABY BOOMERS FACING THEIR OWN mortality have pushed issues of aging and dying into the public eye. As with so many boomer issues, there's a certain self-centeredness to attempts at control of the most uncontrollable human event, but at least issues of infirmity and the end of life are no longer whispered, as "the C-word" — cancer — used to be. Among the demands being raised is better control of pain, which has caught doctors between a desire to alleviate suffering and the U.S. war on drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0006248

A corollary and less-visible policy struggle goes on very close to death, when the opiates that relieve suffering are also likely to hasten dying. A doctor in Redlands who used a very high dose of morphine on a dying patient and may now lose his medical license is merely the latest example.

Most such cases fall in a gray area, involving doctors who may have crossed a legal or ethical line, whether out of compassion or greed. The larger problem is the message that all doctors receive from aggressive efforts to curb opiate abuse, and their resulting reluctance to sufficiently treat severe pain and other suffering.

In Redlands, Dr. Harold Luke's terminally ill 76-year-old patient died soon after getting a very high dose of morphine in 2002. The state medical board last month voted to strip Luke of his license, and his final appeal is likely to be decided today. The patient's family still stands strongly by the doctor, as does a patient advocacy group that is supporting his appeal.

Luke's case hinges on whether he deliberately shortened the patient's life in an act of euthanasia. If he did, which he strongly denies, he would not be the only doctor to have done so. A 1998 mail survey of U.S. doctors in specialties in which patients would be most likely to request euthanasia found 11% willing to provide it. A 1997 survey found similar numbers among critical-care nurses. A report on a similar survey in Australia aptly described the more usual situation: "Doctors sometimes give large doses of potentially lethal drugs to terminally ill patients to treat symptoms, foreseeing but not necessarily intending a medically hastened death."

Federal criminal prosecutions have usually involved a different issue — charging pain management specialists, who often handle very tough cases, with overprescription or outright sale of controlled drugs, including the widely abused OxyContin. Again, most such cases are far from clear-cut, except perhaps in the eyes of federal prosecutors.

The debate over what constitutes a "good death" is ever more public. What hasn't kept pace is government drug policy and honesty about the blurred line between compassionate treatment and medical euthanasia.

Carpenter Smiles His Way To Federal Detention For Pipe Bomb Possession (RRDH)

Roanoke Rapids (NC) Daily Herald, September 16, 2005

JACKSON - Hamming it up for the camera, Michael Thomas Carpenter was taken into federal custody Tuesday for possessing pipe bombs and a cache of guns in his house outside Garysburg.

Led to a blue Ford Expedition by an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the 34-year-old, upon seeing a photographer, exclaimed, "What a wonderful justice system we have in America."

He asked the agent escorting him if he would slow down so he could pose for the camera and at one point gave a cheesy grin.

Asked if he was surprised to be federally charged for having three pipe bombs, Carpenter said, "No, sir. The feds have to do their jobs so we're going to go with them as calmly and peacefully as we can. God bless America."

Since his arrest on local charges in July, Carpenter was being held in the Northampton County Jail for possession with intent to sell and deliver marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia and possession of a weapon of mass destruction.

Capt. George Reed of the Northampton County Sheriff's Office said Carpenter was trying to run the jail while he was there, first being held on $525,000 bond for the local charges and then under no bond on a federal detainer.

ATF agents Tuesday took Carpenter to Greenville, where he would appear before a federal magistrate.

ATF charged Carpenter with possession of a destructive device and possession of firearms by a convicted felon. The federal agents said anyone in possession of explosive weapons must have them registered. The three pipe bombs State Bureau of Investigation agents detonated behind Carpenter's house off Taylor Road in July were not registered.

Officers also found some 25 rifles and shotguns and five handguns in the residence, one of the loaded weapons was found in a baby crib.

The pipe bombs were discovered while local officers were looking for marijuana plants at Carpenter's residence.

Federal agents Tuesday said they had uncovered no other reason why Carpenter had the pipe bombs than the reason he gave in July. Carpenter told the Daily Herald when he was arrested July 12 that he had used pipe bombs in Edenton to blow up beaver dams.

Reed said local charges against Carpenter were dropped in lieu of the federal charges.

Soldiers, ATF Find 'explosives' In Deserted New Orleans Home (AP)

By MARY FOSTER, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - National guardsmen and ATF agents patrolling the dark, deserted streets of New Orleans early Thursday found what appeared to be a bomb inside one of the homes vacated when Hurricane Katrina ripped through the city.

DOJ_NMG_0006249

The guardsmen found what looked like six sticks of dynamite and a detonator along with a bag of ammunition and marijuana. They notified the New Orleans Police Department which, in turn, asked the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to respond because their own bomb squad equipment was flooded in the wake of the storm.

"It had all the characteristics of a real device," ATF explosives specialist Johnnie Green said of the suspect device.

His agents placed an "interrupter" device on the one in question to try to detonate it and found out it was a hoax. "It was a good one," Green said, "especially in these conditions," referring to the blacked-out street.

The guardsmen were in the neighborhood as part of a routine security sweep and noticed a house with an open door. When they went inside to check it out, they found what looked like a bomb.

Todd Morrell of the New Orleans Police Department said the questionable device was found on a shelf in a bedroom. "It looked real to everybody," he said. "It was real enough for us to not want to mess with it."

Charlie Smith, an ATF special response supervisor, said finding the device should serve as a "wake-up call for every guy going through these houses."

Earlier in the week, he said they found a house with nine devices, 50 guns and a photo of the owner wearing a German uniform and Hitler-type mustache. "He evidently was a collector. He had a ton of stuff," Smith said.

Van Carrying Federal Inmates Struck On I-95 In Miami-Dade (AP)

AP, September 16, 2005

MIAMI — Nine federal inmates and two U.S. Marshals were taken to area hospitals Thursday after their van was forced off Interstate 95 and rolled at least twice — an incident allegedly caused by a hit-and-run driver.

Marshals were taking the inmates southbound on I-95, from the federal courthouse in Fort Lauderdale to a federal detention center in Miami when a vehicle hit a Geo Tracker, said U.S. Marshals Service spokesman Barry Golden.

The Geo spun out of control, hitting the Marshals' van and forcing it off the road. No one inside the van was critically injured, although one inmate was hurt more seriously than the others, Golden said.

Golden said security was never an issue.

"All the prisoners were leg-shackled with waist chains, and handcuffed," he said.

There were no escapes, Golden said no description of the vehicle that struck the Geo was available.

IMMIGRATION:

ICE Pick's Ability To Do Job Doubted (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Senators yesterday told the president's choice to lead immigration law enforcement that they still are weighing a plan to reorganize her agency -- and one Republican expressed doubt that she was qualified for the job.

Julie Myers was nominated by President Bush to head Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the agency that is charged with hunting down money launderers, sanctions busters and human traffickers and that is the sole enforcer of U.S. immigration laws.

Yesterday, she faced a confirmation hearing before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs.

"I'm really concerned about your management experience," Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, told her, pointing out that ICE, with 20,000 employees, is the second-largest investigative agency in the federal government.

"I think that we ought to have a meeting with [Homeland Security Secretary] Mike Chertoff ... to ask him ... why he thinks you're qualified for the job," Mr. Voinovich said. "Because based on your resume, I don't think you are."

Miss Myers has worked as an assistant U.S. attorney in Brooklyn on money laundering and export control issues at the Departments of Treasury and Commerce, and was chief of staff for Mr. Chertoff when he ran the Criminal Division at the Department of Justice.

Miss Myers said her experience "will serve me well." She said she had worked with agents who once were part of the Customs Service and the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Parts of those agencies were melded into ICE with the formation of the Department of Homeland Security in March 2003.

Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican, raised the issue of merging ICE with another agency founded from the breakup of the Customs Service and INS -- Customs and Border Protection (CPB), which polices the nation's ports of entry.

Mrs. Collins said a report by the department's inspector general, which the committee commissioned last year and which would be "released shortly," would "recommend the merger."

DOJ_NMG_0006250

"What I have found," she said at the hearing, "and the [inspector general's] report confirms, is that many field employees of the two agencies are very frustrated at what they see as the unnatural separation between the two organizations."

Tax Inquiry Is Moving Past KPMG (NYT)

By LYNNLEY BROWNING

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Ever since the accounting firm KPMG reached a $456 million settlement of a federal investigation into abusive tax shelters nearly three weeks ago, the question has been who may be next.

Federal prosecutors have said that their criminal investigation is widening, and attention is increasingly turning to the role played by banks, financial advisers and law firms that worked with KPMG and other accounting firms to create and sell such shelters.

Among those companies, Deutsche Bank in particular has been a target of lawsuits from wealthy investors who sought to shield millions of dollars from taxes and bought shelters that did not pass muster with the Internal Revenue Service.

Senate investigators have previously criticized the role of Deutsche Bank and other banks in making the loans and handling the currency trades and other transactions that made up the abusive shelters, saying that senior executives and managers at the banks knew the shelters were improper.

Now, a barely noticed lawsuit indicates that Deutsche Bank had a much deeper involvement in creating and helping to sell a questionable tax shelter known as Cobra, for "currency options bring reward alternatives."

The lawsuit, filed by 12 wealthy investors in a Texas state court in Fort Worth, contends that in late 1999 at least one Deutsche Bank employee contacted the law firm of Jenkens & Gilchrist about creating a highly aggressive tax shelter using options on foreign currencies.

The shelter, which later acquired the Cobra name, was never considered valid for deductions by the I.R.S., which issued several warnings to investors in 1999 as it became aware of its use. The agency formally banned it in fall 2000.

Many accounting firms sold similar questionable shelters in the late 1990's and early 2000. The Cobra at the heart of the Texas state lawsuit was sold by the accounting firm Ernst & Young, which had already been developing a similar shelter through an internal unit called Viper, for "value ideas produce extraordinary results." Viper was responsible for marketing aggressive tax shelters, including Cobra, to wealthy individuals who were clients of Ernst & Young, the complaint says.

Ernst & Young declined to comment on the lawsuit but said that Viper was not dissolved until early 2003. Last year, the firm said that federal prosecutors were investigating tax shelters it had promoted and that it was cooperating with the inquiry. In 2003, Ernst & Young reached a $15 million settlement with the Internal Revenue Service over its shelters. It says that it has stopped selling the shelters that the I.R.S. considers abusive.

Around 1,200 investors who bought Cobra and other similar shelters have come forward under a settlement offer with the I.R.S. and paid more than $3.7 billion in back taxes, interest and penalties.

The lead plaintiff in the Texas lawsuit, which names Deutsche Bank as a defendant, is Henry N. Camferdam Jr., an Indiana businessman who has been a vocal critic of the accounting, law and financial firms that he contends created and knowingly sold him a bogus shelter in 1999.

The amended complaint, filed by Mr. Camferdam and 11 other wealthy investors on July 1, contends that fraud and breach of fiduciary duty occurred, and it seeks a jury trial.

There is no public indication that Deutsche Bank is a subject of the federal investigation. But prosecutors have told defense lawyers for eight former KPMG partners and a lawyer who have all been indicted that they have gathered about 300 boxes of documents from different firms, including Deutsche Bank, in the course of their investigation.

In connection with two other KPMG tax shelters, Opis and Blips, Deutsche Bank has said it did nothing improper and only carried out ordinary and routine, if complex and arcane, financial transactions for investors in those shelters. Blips and Opis are similar to the Cobra shelter at the heart of the Texas lawsuit.

But David Deary, a lawyer in Dallas who filed the complaint on behalf of Mr. Camferdam, said that those and other roles played by the bank, including setting up trading accounts, meant that "Deutsche Bank was extremely involved in every aspect of designing and implementing this tax shelter."

The allegations in the Texas lawsuit, if proved in court, suggest that Deutsche Bank could be shown to be a promoter of abusive tax shelters, which could subject it to fines and discipline from federal regulators.

DOJ_NMG_0006251

Scott Schumacher, an assistant professor of tax law at the University of Washington school of law and a former trial lawyer in the criminal tax division of the Justice Department, said that in carrying out financial transactions for tax shelters, "if Deutsche Bank knew that it was bogus and what they were doing was aiding and abetting tax evasion, then they're potentially part of the conspiracy."

A spokeswoman for Deutsche Bank declined to comment yesterday on the allegations in the Texas lawsuit or on the wider federal investigation.

According to the Texas lawsuit, Mr. Camferdam bought a Cobra from Ernst & Young, his longtime accountants, in 1999, after he was told that the shelter would legitimately shelter about $70 million in income from taxes. The shelter, which cost him around $7 million in fees, did not pass muster with the I.R.S., which later sought millions of dollars in back taxes plus penalties and interest from Mr. Camferdam.

The lawsuit contends that a Deutsche Bank foreign-exchange salesman based in New York, Dan Brooks, approached a lawyer at Jenkens & Gilchrist in Chicago in the fall of 1999. Mr. Brooks flew to Chicago to explain to the senior Jenkens tax lawyer, Paul Daugerdas, complex options strategies that Deutsche Bank had developed.

According to the complaint, Mr. Brooks told Mr. Daugerdas that Deutsche Bank "had significant experience designing and implementing" such strategies, which lie at the heart of Cobra, and that "Deutsche Bank had a strong desire to design and implement a tax shelter with Jenkens using foreign currency digital options."

Mr. Daugerdas already had a close link to Deutsche Bank. David Parse, a broker-dealer with Deutsche Bank based in Chicago, was his personal stockbroker, according to the complaint, and personally requested that Mr. Brooks make the trip.

The complaint also contends that in November 1999 Mr. Parse asked Mr. Daugerdas to e-mail to an unidentified client of Deutsche Bank a legal opinion blessing Cobra and a contract for the tax shelter - moves that might appear to put the bank in the role of a promoter of questionable tax shelters.

Within Deutsche Bank there were even "turf battles" over which brokers would carry out trades for the shelters, with the brokers competing for bonuses stemming from the trades, according to the complaint.

Mr. Brooks, who left Deutsche Bank in spring 2001 to form his own trading firm and who has no training in tax or accounting matters, declined to comment.

A spokesman for Jenkens declined to comment yesterday on behalf of the firm and Mr. Daugerdas.

Ernst & Young and Jenkens & Gilchrist are not defendants in the lawsuit because the investors are in arbitration with the two firms. Another law firm, the former Brown & Wood, which is accused of issuing boilerplate opinion letters that blessed the validity of Cobra, is a defendant, as is a former lawyer there, Raymond J. Ruble, who is among nine individuals indicted in the KPMG case.

A third law firm, Scheef & Stone of Dallas, is a defendant, with the complaint stating that it introduced Ernst & Young to Jenkens & Gilchrist when the accounting firm wanted legal opinions for Cobra, earning fees for its referrals that were not disclosed to investors.

John Scheef, a lawyer at Scheef & Stone, said yesterday that there was nothing improper about its referrals. Calls to the former Brown & Wood, now Sidley Austin Brown & Wood, were not returned. A lawyer for Mr. Ruble declined to comment.

Mr. Camferdam has also sued Deutsche Bank and Ernst & Young in other courts, and has simultaneously challenged the I.R.S.'s determination that his Cobra shelter was invalid.

While that move has led some tax lawyers to suggest that Mr. Camferdam knew what he was doing when he bought Cobra, Mr. Camferdam said that he thought Cobra was valid. "I wouldn't have bought it otherwise," he said.

His most recent lawsuit cites transcripts of conversations and internal e-mail among Ernst & Young executives. The lawsuit says that several Ernst & Young tax experts raised doubts about the validity of Cobra in fall 1999, at the time that the firm greatly relaxed the standards it had been using to approve of tax shelters before offering them for sale.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Pledges To Be Chief Justice Who Respects The Law, Not An Ideologue (NSDY/AP)

The Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Chief Justice nominee John Roberts wound up two days of sometimes-contentious Senate testimony Thursday by telling wary Democrats that ideologues don't belong on the Supreme Court. He said his record shows he will rely on the law, not personal views.

Persistent grilling by Democrats on the Judiciary Committee made no apparent inroads in Roberts' support among the Senate's majority Republicans, who plan to vote the week after next to make him the nation's 17th chief justice.

Roberts tried to reassure Democrats that he would use the "rule of law," not his personal beliefs, to judge cases that come before the high court.

"I think if you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath, that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," Roberts said after an impassioned plea by Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California and Charles Schumer of New York for him to explain what kind of chief justice he would be. As for ideologues, he said, "you and I agree that that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

Roberts pointed to his two-year record as a federal appeals court judge in Washington and said, "Look at my briefs and you'll conclude that's a person who respects the law."

Roberts cleared one of his last hurdles when committee chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and top Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont announced that an FBI background check had found nothing that would disqualify. The American Bar Association also confirmed its "well-qualifed" rating.

Republicans were confident that Roberts would win the committee's majority approval next week and then Senate confirmation, with the backing of some moderate Democrats, before the Supreme Court term begins Oct. 3.

Committee Democrats have yet to commit to vote for Roberts, but they know they cannot stop him and President Bush will soon follow with yet another nomination to the court.

"It's going to take some time of real careful thinking about what to do" on the vote, Schumer said after the hearing.

Bush selected Roberts to succeed the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist as chief justice. The conservative judge could, at age 50, shape the high court for at least a generation.

The vote to confirm him "isn't just rolling the dice it's betting the whole house," Schumer said.

"I don't know what I'm going to do," said Feinstein, who said his testimony showed "this very cautious, very precise man, young, obviously with staying power. ... I'm convinced you will be there, God willing, for 40 years. And that even concerns me more because it means that my vote means more."

Feinstein voted to confirm Roberts for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; Schumer voted against him.

Frustrated Democrats tried to elicit a sense of John Roberts the man rather than the judge who was a political appointee in the Reagan and first Bush administrations and a multimillion-dollar lawyer in private practice

Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., wondered whether Roberts would treat society's less fortunate the same way he would deal with the wealthy who often have better lawyers, better legal briefs and an advantage in the court system.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, then the little guy's going to win in the court before me," Roberts said. "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well then the big guy's going to win because my obligation is to the Constitution."

Schumer questioned whether Roberts would be "a truly modest, temperate, careful judge," one "who will impede congressional prerogatives but does not use the bench to remake society," or, as some Democrats fear, one who "will use your enormous talents to use the court to turn back a near century of progress."

Democrats have complained that Roberts avoided many of their questions by saying he couldn't comment on issues that could come before the Supreme Court.

Early on in his third -- and abbreviated -- day of testimony, Roberts said Congress has the authority to pass laws barring discrimination based on race, gender and disability, and he defended his record on minority issues.

He said he had argued cases in favor of and against affirmative action and noted that he had participated in a program to assist minority students considering law school.

"Yes, I was in an administration that was opposed to quotas," Roberts told Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass. "Opposition to quotas is not the same thing as opposition to affirmative action."

Several Democrats have criticized Roberts for assailing the Supreme Court's 5-4 ruling in Plyler v. Doe, which struck down a Texas law and said the state had to provide free public education to illegal immigrant children.

Roberts, then working for the Reagan administration, criticized the ruling and argued that the administration should have gotten involved in the case.

Feinstein asked if Roberts, as a person, believed illegal immigrant children should be educated. Roberts offered legal responses, before saying, "My own view, every child should be educated."

As chief justice, Roberts would assign the writing of opinions in which he was with the majority. He could keep the best cases for himself, or dole them out to other justices.

DOJ_NMG_0006253

Rehnquist's predecessor, Warren Burger has been accused of being manipulative in the assigning of opinions, even joining the majority, though he disagreed, so he could assign the opinion to himself and try to limit the outcome.

Roberts rejected the idea of assigning himself cases as a strategic move.

"Trying to use that assignment power in a tactical way -- it causes tension on the court and I think undermines the ability of the chief justice -- to the extent he has that ability, and it's obviously limited -- to act as a force to help bring about some cohesiveness and collegiality," he said.

With Roberts Hearings Complete, Democrats Wrestle With Their Votes (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - His grilling over, Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. now waits for the Senate to render its verdict.

His performance during four days before the Senate Judiciary Committee wowed even many Democrats, who conceded they were torn between admiration for his intellect and his modest judicial demeanor versus his reluctance to reveal more about his views on legal issues.

In his final day of taking questions, Roberts tried to assure senators that he isn't an ideologue, describing himself instead as a strict follower of the "rule of law." He said his work as a lawyer had made him an advocate of the law no matter the cause.

He admitted, for instance, that while he helped a gay-rights group prepare for a Supreme Court case, he would just as easily have agreed to argue the opposing side.

"To some, they may say, well, that sounds like you're a hired gun," he said. "I think that's a disparaging way to capture what is, in fact, an ennobling truth about our legal system, that lawyers serve the rule of law above and beyond representing particular clients."

Republican strategists predicted a near straight party-line vote next week in the Republican-run committee, which includes some of the Senate's most liberal and most conservative members. But even there, some Democrats were struggling with their votes.

"I don't really know what I'm going to do," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "You've gone through this in a remarkable way. I'm convinced you will be there, God willing, for 40 years. And that even concerns me more, because it means that my vote means more."

In the full Senate, signs emerged of bipartisan support for Roberts, especially from so-called "red-state Democrats."

"If you look at his performance, his education, his attainments, that is the kind of person who has the quality to be in the Supreme Court," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., whose state voted 63 percent for President Bush last year. Conrad faces re-election next year. "This man has a mind like a jewel."

Even Roberts' most ardent opponents, such as Nan Aron of the liberal Alliance for Justice, acknowledged that he didn't seem cast from the strict-constructionist mold of Justice Antonin Scalia.

There's little question that Roberts, boosted by an unflappable presentation before the committee, will be confirmed to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist. The issue is whether the Senate will confirm Roberts by an overwhelming margin, as it did Scalia in 1986 and liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg in 1993, or whether the vote will split along party lines.

While Roberts would become chief justice whether the vote is 100-0 or 51-49, the margin could be an important benchmark when Bush nominates a replacement for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

All 55 Republicans are expected to support Roberts. Some Democrats say a close vote would signal Bush that a more conservative nominee would face a more difficult time. Others say a bipartisan vote would free Democrats from an obstructionist label and make it easier for them to stand against a more conservative replacement for O'Connor.

"What kind of justice will John Roberts be?" Schumer mused aloud. "Will you be a truly modest, temperate, careful judge? ... Will you be a very conservative judge who will impede congressional prerogatives but does not use the bench to remake society, like Justice Rehnquist? Or will you use your enormous talents to use the court to turn back a near-century of progress and create the majority that Justices Scalia and (Clarence) Thomas could not achieve?

"That's the question that we on the committee will have to grapple with this week."

Roberts Gains Respect, If Not Converts (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0006254

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — "I'm not an ideologue," John G. Roberts Jr. told the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday. And with that comment, he aptly summarized the case he made for himself during four days of hearings on his nomination as the Supreme Court's chief justice.

Based on his self-portrait, the Roberts court would not be the place where those in search of new legal rights and protections would find them. Nor, however, would the high court under his leadership press a conservative counter-revolution.

Roberts, in short, presented himself as a mainstream conservative, not a right-wing activist who was eager to roll back the liberal decisions of decades past on civil rights, women's rights and the environment.

He said he was devoted to precedent and stability in the law, even if that meant upholding rulings he may have disagreed with years ago.

He said he aspired to be a "modest" judge, someone who followed the law and did not promote a political agenda.

Thursday, the committee intends to vote on whether to recommend Roberts' confirmation. Its recommendation is virtually assured because Republicans hold a 10-8 advantage on the panel.

He then likely will be confirmed by the GOP-controlled Senate, perhaps during the last week of September.

In his testimony, Roberts distanced himself from the "originalist" approach followed by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, which looks back to the history of the 18th century to decide the meaning of the Constitution. Roberts said he believed the guarantees of liberty and equal protection should be interpreted broadly in light of modern times and changing conditions.

And when asked about the president's power — a concern voiced by liberals troubled by the bold moves of the Bush White House — Roberts repeatedly invoked the 20th century's most important ruling limiting the chief executive — the 1952 case involving Harry S. Truman's seizure of the steel mills during the Korean War.

His words reassured some listeners.

"What we learned generally about him is that, taken at his word, he is not somebody who is going to be a revolutionary on the bench, which I find comforting," said Douglas T. Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel, a law firm that specializes in environmental cases.

Roberts' confident performance during this week's hearings certainly did not undercut his cause. His calm manner and encyclopedic grasp of the law won him bipartisan praise.

"You have an amazing knowledge of the law," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) told him. "You may very well possess the most powerful intellect of any person to come before the Senate" for confirmation to the Supreme Court.

Schumer and other Democrats, however, voiced concerns about Roberts' heart.

Roberts refused their repeated invitations to characterize himself as a big-hearted judge who would give the benefit of the doubt to minorities or the poor. Instead, he said his duty was follow the law as he saw it.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy is going to win in court before me," Roberts told Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then the big guy is going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution."

Roberts' testimony did not sway the liberal groups and civil rights organizations that have opposed him. They noted he refused to state his opinion on contemporary disputes such as abortion rights, or controversial past decisions such as the ruling that stopped the vote recount in Florida in 2000 and ensured that George W. Bush would become president.

Roberts also stood behind most of the sharply worded memos he wrote as a young conservative in the Reagan administration.

The memos opposed several civil rights initiatives of the time, and sometimes did so in a mocking tone.

One memo, for example, referred to illegal immigrants as "illegal amigos."

Another memo strongly opposed an expansion of the Voting Rights Act, which allowed lawyers to challenge voting systems or electoral districts that weakened the voting power of blacks or Latinos. The 1982 law is credited with vastly increasing the number of minority officeholders.

When Democrats repeatedly broached the subject of these memos, Roberts repeatedly responded that he was a staff lawyer who was carrying out the policies of the Reagan White House.

Pressed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) on the disputed provision in the Voting Rights Act, he said he did not now think it was "constitutionally suspect."

His cautious answers to the questions about the memos caused some to doubt he had changed his opinions.

His take on the Voting Rights Act "makes me think he likely still holds these views," said Richard L. Hasen, a voting rights expert at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles. "The tone of the memos is a tone of indignation."

At times, Roberts succeeded in turning the senators' questions back on them.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) asked Roberts why he argued in 1991, as deputy solicitor general in the administration of George H.W. Bush, that a schoolgirl who was a victim of sexual harassment at her Atlanta-area high school could not sue the school district for damages in federal court.

Leahy told Roberts he could "actually bring justice" by allowing her and others like her to sue. He asked Roberts why he did not take that view.

The reason, Roberts replied, was that Congress did not include in the law a provision that would allow people to sue. The law in question, Title IX of the education code, said schools and colleges that received federal money had to treat girls and boys equally. It did not say, however, whether private lawsuits were authorized.

Over and over again, Democrats cited such examples to question whether Roberts had a big heart.

Roberts said the issue was the law, not his heart.

"If Congress would simply spell it out in the legislation," he said, there would be no doubt victims could sue.

"All of those cases arose because Congress did not address the question. All Congress has to do is write one sentence" authorizing private lawsuits, he said.

"I became a lawyer because I believe in the rule of law," Roberts said in summarizing his case. "I would hope you'd look at my briefs and my arguments before the Supreme Court and conclude that's a person who respects the law, respects the court and will the approach the law in a similar way as a judge."

'I'm Not An Ideologue,' Roberts Tells Senate Panel (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Jo Becker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday summed up his Senate hearings to become the nation's 17th chief justice by declaring, "I'm not an ideologue," brushing aside his early years in the trenches of the conservative Reagan revolution as he portrayed himself as a lawyer and judge devoid of social agendas.

With his confirmation to the Supreme Court virtually assured by solid support among Republicans, who control the Senate, Roberts used the closing moments of his 2 1/2 days of testimony to try -- with uncertain results -- to soothe Democratic skeptics.

Saying that his loyalties are to the Constitution and "the rule of law," Roberts said that he had displayed no ideological bias during his two years as a federal appeals court judge and that he had, during 13 years in private practice, represented clients on all sides of contentious issues.

Some conservatives were alarmed last month over the disclosure that he had helped gay activists win a landmark Supreme Court in 1996. But Roberts testified yesterday that he would have been equally willing to represent the opposing side, the state of Colorado, if it had asked for his help first.

On the other hand, Roberts broke with orthodoxy among Republicans, including President Bush, who say that medical liability lawsuits are out of control. Asked whether he thinks lawyers who represent people in product-liability or medical-malpractice cases are harming the United States, Roberts replied that he did not, citing a former fellow law clerk who he said "does a wonderful job" as a personal injury lawyer.

"If you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath," the nominee said, "that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue."

The careful conclusion of Roberts's 20 hours of testimony leaves one drama unresolved in the Senate role in the first Supreme Court vacancy in 11 years: How many Democrats will join Republicans in voting to give him a seat on the court?

The Judiciary Committee is scheduled to convene for a vote next Thursday, and GOP leaders plan to begin debate on Roberts's confirmation in the full Senate on Sept. 26, with a floor vote sometime that week. That timing would allow Roberts, if confirmed, to join the court when it begins its new term Oct. 3.

Bush originally nominated Roberts to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor but made him his choice for chief justice after the death of William H. Rehnquist on Sept. 3. Bush has not indicated when he intends to name a successor to O'Connor.

All week, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee complained that Roberts was evasive about his views and values on a range of polarizing issues, including abortion, civil rights, the scope of presidential power and the right to die. Even as the hearing was ending, several Democrats urged him to reveal more of what they called his heart.

"Many of us are struggling with . . . what kind of a justice would you be, John Roberts," implored Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.)

The eight Democrats on the panel have not said how they plan to vote. Yesterday, Feinstein and several others vacillated openly.

DOJ_NMG_0006256

Feinstein said she had expected Bush to select someone more conservative than Roberts appeared to be. "I don't see anything definitive," Feinstein said of his record and testimony. "And I do see things to believe that . . . this is a fine legal scholar who will truly look at the law."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said that he was trying to decide which Supreme Court justice Roberts would resemble most. Biden said that he would vote against Roberts if he decided the nominee were akin to Justice Antonin Scalia but probably would support Roberts if he were most like Rehnquist.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said, "I, for one, wake up in the middle of the night thinking about it, and have been unsure how to vote." He told Roberts: "You will in all likelihood affect every one of our lives in many ways for a whole generation. So this isn't just rolling the dice -- it's betting the whole house."

Republicans countered that many of them had supported justices chosen by President Bill Clinton, while differing with their views. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) took issue with the Democrats' efforts to discern what lies in Roberts's heart.

"There are bleeding hearts and there are hard hearts," Graham said. "And I want this committee to understand that if we go down this road of putting people's hearts in play, and the only way you can have a good heart is 'Adopt my value system,' we're doing a great disservice to the judiciary."

Before the questioning ended, Democrats made a final attempt to draw out Roberts on his views. He answered a greater portion of their questions than he had on Wednesday, when several Democrats erupted in frustration over his refusal to give substantive responses.

At one point yesterday, Roberts backtracked from a position he had advocated in an early-1980s memo concerning a Supreme Court ruling in a Texas case that gave children the right to attend public schools, even if they were illegal immigrants. Roberts had argued that the Reagan administration should have defended a Texas law that allowed schools to exclude such youngsters.

Yesterday, Roberts said: "My own view is that, if you have a child, he or she should be educated. We'll worry about status later." Nevertheless, he added: "As a personal view . . . yes. It's a separate issue as a legal question, as you know."

He also disavowed a 1981 memo on the issue of whether inmates, including those who have been sentenced to death, have a right to file habeas corpus appeals in federal courts, challenging the constitutionality of their convictions. The memo said: "The question would seem to be not what tinkering is necessary in the system, but rather why have federal habeas corpus at all?"

Yesterday, Roberts said that he had simply been endorsing reforms to eliminate a glut of frivolous appeals, as Congress eventually did: "I'm not in favor now and was not in favor then" of eliminating such appeals.

The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), questioned Roberts about how he would handle one of the responsibilities of the chief justice: appointing judges to an unusual court, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, which has gained expanded powers under the USA Patriot Act. Critics have said the FISA court abridges civil liberties in the name of combating terrorism.

Leahy asked whether Roberts, if confirmed, would be willing to work with Congress "to add more transparency" to the court. Roberts replied that the court "is a surprising institution" and said that "the people appointed to it have to be of the highest quality, undoubted commitment to all the basic principles, both of the need for the court and the need to protect civil liberties." He stopped short of saying he would change the court's ground rules.

After Roberts left the witness chair, Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Leahy said they found nothing in a routine FBI background check on Roberts that would disqualify him from serving on the court.

For the rest of the day, the committee heard from more than 30 witnesses who sought to reinforce, sometimes in dramatic terms, the case for or against his confirmation. They included law professors and theologians, former clients and bosses of the nominee, an Alabama girls basketball coach, and a female lawyer whom Roberts had helped win a promotion.

A representative of the American Bar Association, testifying for the Republicans, explained why the organization had given Roberts its highest rating.

Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a civil rights leader who was arrested more than 40 times during protests of the 1960s, testified that he does not accept Roberts's assertion that arguments he made in memos as a high-ranking legal adviser in the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush did not reflect his personal views. "The judge was on the wrong side of history," Lewis said.

US High Court Nominee: 'I'm Not An Ideologue' (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro And Richard Cowan

Reuters, September 16, 2005

Declaring "I'm not an ideologue," John Roberts finished a four-day Senate committee appearance on Thursday with Democrats and Republicans predicting he will be confirmed to head the Supreme Court as the 17th U.S. chief justice.

In fact, the 100-member, Republican-led U.S. Senate appeared headed toward approving President George W. Bush's 50-year-old conservative nominee before the high court begins its new term on October 3.

Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record), a North Dakota Democrat, said upward of half of the 45-member Democratic caucus may join Republicans in voting for Roberts, who has drawn fire from major liberal groups.

"He's highly intelligent. He has strong credentials. He is a conservative, but I think he is mainstream conservative," Conrad said in a brief interview.

Still, some frustrated Democrats took a final crack at trying to pin Roberts down on some hot-button issues such as civil rights and challenged his record based largely on memos he wrote as a young attorney two decades ago in the Reagan administration.

"What kind of justice would you be?" Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), a California Democrat, asked in posing one of the final questions to Roberts at his Judiciary Committee hearing.

Roberts replied by describing himself as a person who respects the law and would interpret the Constitution without a political tilt. He has declined to predict how he may decide specific controversial cases, including abortion.

Roberts urged committee members to examine his record the past two years as a member of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"I think if you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath, that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," Roberts said.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy's going to win in court before me. But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then the big guy's going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution. That's the oath," he said.

POTENTIAL FOR LONG TENURE

If confirmed, Roberts would succeed the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who was the high court's conservative anchor for 33 years.

Roberts would become the youngest person in two centuries to hold the lifetime post and be positioned to head the federal judiciary for decades, helping shape the American way of life on matters from civil rights to voting rights to gay rights.

The committee is scheduled to vote on a recommendation to the Senate on Roberts next Thursday. The Senate plans to consider the nomination the week of September 26.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (news, bio, voting record), a New Jersey Democrat, said: "I don't think there is any doubt he'll be confirmed. The question is how many Democrats vote for him."

Lautenberg said he was undecided but leaning toward not voting to confirm Roberts because he failed to answer too many questions.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said six of the eight Democrats on the Judiciary Committee met after Roberts' testimony and all were undecided.

Easing Roberts' anticipated approval was the belief he would not greatly alter the court's conservative outlook developed by Rehnquist.

A bigger fight was anticipated for Bush's next nominee, who would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who has often been the swing vote on the sharply divided nine-member court.

Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record), a Texas Republican, said: "John Roberts will be confirmed. The question is will Democrats jeopardize their credibility and vote against him, or bolster their credibility by voting for this highly qualified nominee -- and hold fire for the next one."

Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat who led some of the most aggressive questioning of Roberts, said he was undecided.

Schumer told Roberts, "I for one wake up in the middle of the night thinking about it and have been unsure how to vote."

Roberts' Senate Testimony Comes To A Close Some Questions Still Open (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts exuded such steadiness during four days in a Senate witness chair that New York Democrat Charles Schumer on Thursday asked Roberts for advice on what questions senators should ask to try to learn more about him.

DOJ_NMG_0006258

It was one of many moments this week that showed the respect that members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have for Roberts, President Bush's choice to succeed the late William Rehnquist as the nation's chief justice. The conservative Roberts' deftness in giving non-committal answers to Democrats on a range of legal issues reflected the skills that made the nominee, in Schumer's words, “one of the best litigators in America.”

For Democrats on the panel, a big question remained Thursday: John Roberts, the lawyer, may be first-rate, but what of the man? Does he bring together, as Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., put it, “the mind and the heart”? What are his “feelings as a man?” Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., asked at one point. Feinstein also observed that Roberts was a “very cautious, very precise man … obviously with staying power.

“You've gone through this in a remarkable way,” Feinstein told Roberts, a 50-year-old federal judge. “I'm convinced you will be (chief justice), God willing, for 40 years. And that even concerns me more because it means that my vote means more.”

Democrats' concerns about Roberts stem from the possibility that he could be part of an effort by Bush to move the divided Supreme Court to the right.

With Roberts likely to win Senate confirmation to replace the conservative Rehnquist, Bush soon will pick a successor for Sandra Day O'Connor, a more moderate justice who has been a key vote in preserving, among other things, abortion rights and affirmative action in college admissions. That's why the coming battle over her replacement likely will be more contentious than the one over Roberts.

The Judiciary Committee will vote on Roberts' nomination next Thursday. Although Roberts' confirmation has seemed inevitable, Schumer, Kennedy, Feinstein and other Democrats peppered him with questions that sought to reveal just how conservative he is.

Shortly before Roberts finished his testimony Thursday, he urged senators not to view him as an “ideologue.” And perhaps to show a warmer side to Democrats, he said he realizes that legal decisions “have impact on real people and real lives.” Roberts also said the law should give the “little guy” the same chance in a legal dispute as a big corporation.

Roberts cast himself as sympathetic to the concerns of women, minorities and the disabled, but he declined to offer more precise views about specific disputes involving such groups.

Senators later heard from witnesses for and against Roberts. Among the opponents was Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., who as a leader in the civil rights movement was beaten, arrested and jailed in the 1960s. Lewis said Roberts, who as a lawyer in the Reagan and first Bush administrations sought narrow interpretations of civil rights laws, was “on the wrong side of history.”

“We cannot afford to elevate an individual to such a powerful, lifetime position, whose record demonstrates such a strong desire to reverse the hard-won civil rights gains that so many sacrificed so much to achieve,” Lewis said.

Peter Kirsanow, a Bush appointee on the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, countered that Roberts has shown “an unwavering commitment to equal protection under the law and a comprehensive understanding of our civil rights laws.”

For Roberts, 1 Question Remains (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON – Completing nearly 20 hours of Senate testimony, Judge John Roberts moved closer to confirmation Thursday amid a lingering debate over both his head and his heart.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee ended the four days of hearings with praise for Judge Roberts' intellect but remained skeptical that a former corporate lawyer understands how ordinary people are affected by the nation's highest court.

"It's important to determine not just the quality of your mind, but the fullness of your heart," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

The Supreme Court: Justice profiles, key decisions

Judge Roberts, for his part, assured the committee this week that he is not an ideologue, but would decide cases on the law and the Constitution.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy is going to win in court before me," said the federal appeals court judge. "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then, the big guy is going to win."

Party-line vote?

The committee scheduled a vote on Judge Roberts for Thursday. A number of aides said it could be a party-line vote, with 10 Republicans endorsing Mr. Roberts and eight Democrats opposing.

The nomination then goes to the Senate floor, where Republicans control 55 of the 100 seats. Judge Roberts' backers hope to pick up support from more conservative Democrats and expect him to formally replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist when the Supreme Court's next term opens Oct. 3.

DOJ_NMG_0006259

Both sides are gearing up for these final debates with an eye on the next set of confirmation hearings, after President Bush announces a nominee to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The White House has suggested that the selection will not be made until after Judge Roberts is confirmed.

Curt Levey, general counsel for the pro-Roberts Committee for Justice, said the only question remaining is how the Roberts vote will affect the next nominee.

"People are saving up their budgets for the next nomination," Mr. Levey said.

Democrats have not mentioned filibustering Judge Roberts, which would require 60 Senate votes to break. Some aides said Democrats, without such a filibuster, might seek to keep Judge Roberts' vote under 60 – sending a message to the administration that Democrats could muster the numbers for a filibuster the next time around.

Republicans said some Democrats are attempting to change the standards by which nominees have been confirmed, including knowledge of the law, experience, integrity and temperament.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., noted that most Republicans backed Clinton nominee Ruth Bader Ginsburg despite political differences with the former American Civil Liberties Union attorney.

"If I wanted to judge Justice Ginsburg on her heart, I might take a hard-hearted view of her and say she's a bleeding heart," Mr. Graham said. "She has a different value system than I do, but that doesn't mean she doesn't have a good heart."

A right to know

Democrats said people are entitled to know more about Judge Roberts' views, especially potential litigants who are targets of discrimination and government oppression.

"All of us are trying to get down to, what are your core values?" Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., told the judge.

By the end of the proceedings, the committee had heard from 33 witnesses who testified for and against Judge Roberts, including longtime colleagues, college professors and several plaintiffs whose cases have been decided by the Supreme Court.

Among them was Henrietta Wright, chairwoman of the Dallas Children's Advocacy Center and a longtime friend of Judge Roberts and his wife, Jane. Ms. Wright described him as a private man, with eclectic tastes in reading and a love of golf, and as an attentive father, capable of operating as a single parent when his wife is working.

"From my experience," she said, "John Roberts has no agenda other than to apply the law as it is written."

Critics speak up

Others were less flattering. Marcia D. Greenberger, co-president of the National Women's Law Center, accused Judge Roberts of "developing, advancing and embracing legal arguments and positions that would undermine women's most basic legal rights."

Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a longtime civil rights leader, told the Senate panel that he, too, views the Roberts nomination with skepticism.

"I fear that if Judge Roberts is confirmed, the Supreme Court would no longer hear the people's cries for justice. I fear the leadership of the court would promote politics over the protection of individual rights and liberties."

As he neared the end of his testimony, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., joked to Judge Roberts: "You're going to miss doing this every day. ... You're not even going to answer that one, are you?"

"Well," replied Judge Roberts, "it's a once-in-a-lifetime experience."

Senators Save Breath For Next Court Debate (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — The big question surrounding John Roberts as he wrapped up testimony before a Senate committee Thursday was not whether he will become the nation's 17th chief justice, but how the vote on his nomination this month will affect President Bush's next Supreme Court pick.

Roberts, 50, seems assured of confirmation because several members of the “Gang of 14,” a group of moderate Democratic and Republican senators whose support would be needed to block his nomination, say they don't think such an effort would be justified. “I can't imagine a filibuster,” said Sen. Ben Nelson, a Nebraska Democrat. Neither can Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the group's senior Republican, who says he has talked with others in the group.

A filibuster is a maneuver that allows a minority of senators to block a vote. Because Republicans hold 55 of the Senate's 100 seats, Roberts' opponents say it's probably the only way to stop him. “I can count,” said Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation.

It takes 41 votes to sustain a filibuster, and there won't be enough without the support of the seven Democrats in the Gang of 14. Even some of the eight Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who sparred with the nominee this week told him they were at least considering a vote in his favor.

Those committee members are among the chamber's most liberal Democrats, and several have reason to court liberal activist groups: Sens. Joseph Biden of Delaware and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin are weighing bids for the presidency in 2008; Sen. Charles Schumer of New York is trying to solicit funds for 2006 candidates as head of the Democrats' senatorial campaign committee.

An important factor in the Democrats' strategy: how best to position themselves for the next Supreme Court debate. The president has said he will act in “a timely manner” to fill the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a critical vote on the often divided nine-member court. Because O'Connor is a moderate conservative who — unlike the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist — often voted with the court's four-member liberal wing, her seat affects the court's direction.

Democrats such as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada want a moderate nominee like O'Connor. Some prominent women, including O'Connor, have suggested that Bush pick another woman. Bush has hinted he might make his attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, the first Hispanic justice. Conservative Republicans such as Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas want a justice more obviously opposed to abortion and gay marriage than Roberts has appeared to be.

Bush was rebuffed this year when Republican leaders tried to end filibusters of judicial nominees, a move that would have made it easier to win approval of conservative appointees. The Gang of 14 consists of seven Democrats who promised to use a filibuster only in “extraordinary circumstances” and seven Republicans who back Democrats' right to filibuster.

Democrats in the group want what Sen. Mark Pryor of Arkansas calls “a nominee who will unite us, not divide us.” They hope Bush will consult them, as he did before nominating Roberts. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said Bush aides asked her about Edith Clement, a judge on the U.S. appeals court that covers Louisiana, Texas and Mississippi. Clements' lack of controversial writings on abortion could make her an appealing candidate.

“She would be very high in my book,” Landrieu said.

Nominee Reveals Pragmatic Approach To Constitution (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - For someone accused of saying very little, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. revealed a great deal about how he will approach his work if confirmed as the 17th chief justice of the United States.

Over three days of testimony, between declining to answer questions on specific cases and legal issues, Judge Roberts made clear that his approach to interpreting the Constitution is more varied and flexible than the originalism subscribed to by Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia. President Bush has singled them out as models for the sorts of justices he planned to appoint.

"I think the framers, when they used broad language like 'liberty,' like 'due process,' like 'unreasonable' with respect to search and seizures, they were crafting a document that they intended to apply in a meaningful way down the ages," Judge Roberts said Wednesday.

He said he would consider not only how the framers of the Constitution understood those words, but also how courts have interpreted them and how they apply to evolving societal conditions.

That approach disappointed some conservative legal scholars.

"He is not in the mold of Scalia and Thomas," said Steven G. Calabresi, a law professor at Northwestern and a chairman of the Federalist Society, the conservative legal group. "They have more of a theory of how to decide cases, and they look to text and original meaning. Roberts will look at text and original meaning, but he will also look to precedent and the consequences of his decisions."

Judge Roberts, for his part, said his approach would be pragmatic and case-specific. That approach places Judge Roberts closer to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has often provided the swing vote in important cases.

"I do not have an overarching judicial philosophy that I bring to every case," he said Tuesday. "I tend to look at the cases from the bottom up rather than the top down."

He would be guided, he said, by the level of generality inherent in particular constitutional provisions. "If the phrase in the Constitution says two-thirds of the Senate," he said, "everybody's a literalist when they interpret that."

But other phrases in the Constitution are broader, he added, giving as an example the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures.

"You can look at that wording all day," Judge Roberts said, "and it's not going to give you much progress in deciding whether a particular search is reasonable or not."

Under the 14th Amendment, adopted after the Civil War to protect blacks, said Douglas W. Kmiec, a law professor at Pepperdine University, "Judge Roberts made it reasonably clear that gender and other categories can receive protection."

DOJ_NMG_0006261

That is at odds, Professor Kmiec said, with the approach advocated by Judge Robert H. Bork, whose nomination was defeated in 1987 when Democrats controlled the Senate.

"Under the Bork version of originalism," Professor Kmiec said, applying the 14th Amendment to sexual discrimination "doesn't make any sense."

He continued: "That was probably the major tripwire that started his downhill descent at his hearings."

Judge Bork was also both more expansive and combative in answering questions than Judge Roberts was, as a matter of both necessity and temperament.

"Bork was extremely forthcoming," said Patrick J. Schiltz, a law professor at the University of St. Thomas, "but he had no choice. He had written a lot about everything. He's written about every major doctrine in constitutional law."

Judge Roberts seemed most at ease in sorting through and explaining Supreme Court precedents without offering his own views on whether the decisions were correct.

"In terms of understanding Supreme Court case law," said Cass Sunstein, a law professor at the University of Chicago, "he's the most impressive in recent memory, even more than Bork, and Bork was pretty impressive."

But unlike Judge Bork, Professor Sunstein said, Judge Roberts appeared prepared to build on those Supreme Court decisions rather than depart starkly from them.

Judge Roberts disappointed some conservatives in the way he answered questions concerning the scope of Congressional power. In a series of decisions, the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist endorsed significant limitations on the ability of Congress to legislate on local matters.

"Roberts will be very deferential to Congress," Professor Calabresi said, "more so than Rehnquist."

Judge Roberts also made clear that it is not the role of the courts to interpret statutes more broadly than warranted. If Congress wants to allow certain kinds of lawsuits, he said, the legislation it passes should say so plainly and directly.

Judge Roberts provided substantial information, at least at the level of theory, about the right to privacy. He said it existed, located it in various constitutional provisions including the 14th Amendment and gave some examples of what it requires. He endorsed a 1965 decision of the Supreme Court holding that the right to privacy guarantees that married couples may use contraceptives.

But his adamant refusal to answer other questions frustrated Democratic senators and liberal scholars.

"From Bush v. Gore to the Second Amendment to separation of church and state to abortion," Erwin Chemerinsky, a law professor at Duke University, said of Judge Roberts, "he was masterful at saying a lot but avoiding answering the key questions."

Professor Chemerinsky said he took some comfort from Judge Roberts's endorsement of an aspect of Justice O'Connor's majority decision in an affirmative action case involving higher education.

Judge Roberts said that pragmatic considerations about the consequences of allowing race to play a role in admissions decisions properly played a role in her decision. Justices Scalia and Thomas dissented in the decision, saying that the Constitution forbids such preferences.

Judge Roberts also declined to state his personal views on almost every matter, on the theory that they were irrelevant to a judge's work. (He relented briefly on Thursday, saying, "My own view is that if you have a child, he or she should be educated.")

"Other nominees," Professor Schiltz said, "after making clear that they weren't talking about the law but only their personal views, were pretty willing to talk."

At times, Judge Roberts's limited conception of the judge's role struck Democrats as evidence of a cramped approach to the law from a lawyer more taken with technicalities than with justice. Judge Roberts declined to second-guess positions he had taken as an advocate arguing that a student who had been sexually abused was not entitled to damages and that a death row inmate could not present new evidence of his innocence if certain deadlines had passed.

Judge Roberts was repeatedly confronted with documents he wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration. They were studded with caustic comments, uniformly took conservative positions and frequently argued for an understanding of the Constitution starkly at odds with the Supreme Court doctrine of the day.

Judge Roberts stressed that the documents represented the views of a staff lawyer setting out the views of his client, but he did not for the most part directly disavow the sentiments in them. But Professor Sunstein said that Judge Roberts's testimony was in an entirely different vein than his early writings.

"He doesn't talk like someone who believed at any level in changing the current understanding of the Constitution," Professor Sunstein said. "He's not the same person he was in his 20's."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, summed up what he called the pros and cons of the Roberts nomination on Thursday.

The pros, Mr. Schumer said, are that Judge Roberts is brilliant, is "a lawyer above all" and is devoted to "a judicial philosophy of modesty and stability" that "respects precedent, the Congress and other judges' opinions."

DOJ_NMG_0006262

On the negative side, Mr. Schumer said, were the questions Judge Roberts would not answer, the White House's refusal to release documents from his years as a more senior lawyer in the first Bush administration and what Mr. Schumer called "the question of compassion and humanity."

"We must now take the evidence we have and try to answer the fundamental question," Mr. Schumer said. "What kind of justice will John Roberts be?"

Judge Roberts, for his part, summed up his philosophy on Thursday.

"Somebody asked me, you know, 'Are you going to be on the side of the little guy?' " he said. "And you obviously want to give an immediate answer, but, as you reflect on it, if the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy's going to win in court before me. But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then the big guy's going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution. That's the oath."

Frustrated By Roberts, And Unsure How To Vote (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - Senate Democrats are deeply conflicted about how to vote on the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be the nation's 17th chief justice, and appear divided about how, and whether, to use their vote to send a message to President Bush as he selects a candidate to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy.

"That's a critical part of this conversation," Senator Richard J. Durbin, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat and a member of the Judiciary Committee, said Thursday, when asked if he hoped to send a message to Mr. Bush about the next nominee. "We understand that this is the first of two vacancies on a court that's so evenly divided that one bad choice could make a - from my point of view - could have an impact for a long time."

Judge Roberts's unflappable performance during three days of questioning has clearly put Democrats in a quandary. Some say a strong vote against his nomination could prod the White House into naming a centrist to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a crucial swing vote. Others say that supporting the Roberts nomination could make Democrats appear reasonable, giving them more credibility to oppose the next nominee.

Despite Mr. Durbin's remark, the Democratic leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, said the vote on Judge Roberts "shouldn't be message time."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the New York Democrat whose vote will be among the most closely watched in the Senate because of her possible White House bid in 2008, agreed.

"I have found it is very difficult for Democrats to influence this White House on anything, and so I don't count on them paying attention to our legitimate concerns," Mrs. Clinton said, adding, "They will do what they think is in their interest, however they define it."

As the Judiciary Committee wrapped up its questioning of Judge Roberts on Thursday morning, Democrats, who have repeatedly assailed the nominee for not being forthcoming, expressed obvious frustration. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, told Judge Roberts that she had "one impression of you when we had our hour in private," and another at the hearing.

Later, in an interview, Senator Feinstein declined to elaborate. "I'm sorting out what I feel now," she said, shaking her head.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who is a Judiciary Committee member, delivered a lengthy soliloquy during the hearing in which he called Judge Roberts's performance at the hearing "a tour de force" and said he might well "possess the most powerful intellect" of any person to come before the Senate for the position of chief justice. But Mr. Schumer worried aloud that he did not have enough evidence to answer "the fundamental question" of what kind of justice Judge Roberts would be.

"I, for one, have woken up in the middle of the night, thinking about it," Mr. Schumer said, "being unsure how to vote."

That angst is spilling over into the rest of the Democratic caucus, and no Democrat interviewed Thursday would commit one way or the other on the vote. Mr. Reid said six of the eight Democrats on the judiciary panel had conferred but were still undecided.

Representatives of liberal advocacy groups, who are pressing Democrats to oppose the nomination, said they felt confident of a straight party-line vote, or close to it, when the committee takes up the nomination next Thursday.

The vote will come as Democrats sense President Bush is vulnerable. His poll numbers are at the lowest point of his presidency amid public outrage over the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, and Democrats hope to turn that outrage into a powerful message to voters during the 2006 midterm elections. On Thursday, Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said he thought Judge Roberts did not deserve to be confirmed.

But Democrats are keenly aware that they risk being labeled obstructionist if they vote in a bloc against a nominee like Judge Roberts, whose legal qualifications are impeccable. And though they have complained bitterly that the White House has refused to provide them access to legal memorandums Judge Roberts wrote when he worked for the first Bush administration, Democrats appear to have little appetite to block the nomination by filibuster on the Senate floor.

"No, no," Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. said Thursday, waving off the question of a filibuster. Mr. Biden, Democrat of Delaware, said that after voting to confirm Justice Antonin Scalia, one of the most conservative members of the court, he vowed never again to vote for "anybody who I don't have some sense of their constitutional methodology."

Asked if he had a sense of Judge Roberts's methodology, Mr. Biden replied, "No, I don't." That was why, he said, "it's such a dilemma."

Perhaps no Democrat faces as big a dilemma as Senator Clinton, who has been positioning herself as more of a centrist as she considers a possible White House bid. Republican senators are already taking pains to remind the public that many of them voted in favor of President Bill Clinton's Supreme Court nominees, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

Like other Democrats, Mrs. Clinton was circumspect Thursday, saying she would review the hearing transcript before deciding how to vote.

"There are a lot of considerations and some of them are competing, so we just have to weigh each of them," she said, "and every senator might have a slightly different weight to give."

One problem for Democrats is that Judge Roberts performed so well as a witness. Hour after hour, he delved into the minutiae of the law without referring to a single note or taking one. And while Democrats have assailed Judge Roberts for not answering enough of their questions, they are hard-pressed to argue that he did not answer any at all.

"Part of the reason people are conflicted is because Roberts has shown just enough leg to get a second date," said one Democratic strategist, speaking on the condition of anonymity so as not to give away internal party deliberations. "No magic moment has occurred where you could say, 'Oh, we can't put this guy on the bench.' "

One important question is how Democrats in Republican-leaning states will vote. Among them is Senator Reid, who said Thursday that he did not intend to insist that his colleagues vote in a bloc, and that he would not necessarily follow the recommendation of his colleagues on the judiciary panel. "It all boils down to an individual vote," he said.

Another question is what Democratic members of the "Gang of 14," a bipartisan group of senators who drafted a compromise to avoid a filibuster on several of President Bush's judicial nominees this spring, will do. One of them, Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, had previously said he was inclined to vote in favor of Judge Roberts. But in an interview Thursday, Mr. Nelson used a football analogy to suggest he was hedging.

"It's halftime," the senator said. "The game's not over."

Democrats Hit Roberts' Ambiguity (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Democrats laid the groundwork yesterday to oppose the Supreme Court nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr., accusing him of withholding his personal views on political and judicial matters.

"You did speak at length on many issues and sounded like you were conveying your views to us," Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, told Judge Roberts yesterday. "But when one went back and read the transcript each evening, there was less than met the ear that afternoon."

As he had throughout his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Judge Roberts calmly explained that -- as with previous nominees such as Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- it would be improper for him to discuss his personal views on certain issues, especially those that might come before the court.

In addition, the chief justice nominee said, those views are irrelevant, because his goal is to merely apply the law within the confines of the Constitution.

Still, it was the overriding concern of Democrats on the panel, which will vote on the Roberts nomination next week. Senate Republicans say they don't expect to pick up a single vote from the eight committee Democrats, but several -- including Mr. Schumer -- insist that they haven't made up their minds.

Outside the Senate, a coalition of liberal interest groups released a new television commercial showing snippet after snippet of Judge Roberts explaining during his testimony that he couldn't answer certain questions, many of which had been asked repeatedly.

Yesterday marked the fourth and final day of hearings on Judge Roberts' nomination to become the nation's 17th Supreme Court chief justice. It is widely expected that the full Senate will confirm Judge Roberts by the time the high court convenes Oct. 3.

DOJ_NMG_0006264

Among those Democrats being closely watched is Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, who has said she will not support a nominee who will undo federal abortion rights.

"I don't really know what I'm going to do with respect to voting for you or against you," she told Judge Roberts yesterday.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican who is pro-life, dismissed such interest in Judge Roberts' stance on abortion. He spent two hours with the nominee and said he tried mightily to pin him down. He couldn't, but plans to vote for him based on his overall judicial philosophy and intellect.

Although no Democrats expressed support for Judge Roberts' nomination, they heaped more praise on him yesterday for his intellect and coolness under intense questioning. Throughout his 19 hours and 55 minutes of testimony, Judge Roberts never referred to or jotted down one single note with the pad and pencil supplied to him on the witness table.

Before questions began yesterday, Mr. Schumer greeted Judge Roberts, shook his hand and said, "You have done an amazing job."

Later, during the hearing, however, Mr. Schumer and other Democrats said they just weren't convinced that Judge Roberts isn't a conservative ideologue.

"I think if you've ever looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath, that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," the judge replied.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, wondered whether Judge Roberts would be sensitive to the plight of the powerless and impoverished.

"If the Constitution says that the little guy should win, then the little guy's going to win in the court before me," Judge Roberts responded. "But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well then the big guy's going to win because my obligation is to the Constitution."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said it is wrong to evaluate Judge Roberts on his political opinions.

"We're down to the heart," he said. "Well, there are all kinds of hearts. There are bleeding hearts and there are hard hearts."

Referring to Justice Ginsburg, who was nominated by President Clinton, Mr. Graham said, "She has a different value system than I do. But that doesn't mean she doesn't have a good heart. And I want this committee to understand that if we go down this road of putting people's hearts in play, and the only way you can have a good heart is, 'Adopt my value system,' we're doing a great disservice to the judiciary."

Roberts Concludes Three Days Of Testimony (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Law.com, September 16, 2005

Eliciting praise for his intellectual firepower from one of his sharpest Democratic critics, Judge John Roberts Jr. concluded his time before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday by declaring that he was not an ideologue and defending his three days of testimony as both "fully expansive" and "fully responsive."

Roberts noted that despite only two years spent as a federal appeals court judge, he has written 50 opinions, telling Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.: "I don't think you can read those opinions and say that these are the opinions of an ideologue. And you and I agree that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

Schumer, in a third and final round of questioning, called Roberts' legal knowledge and calm and precise presentation before the committee a "tour de force."

But he said he still had questions about Roberts' ability to "truly empathize" with the less fortunate.

"It didn't seem much, for instance, to concede that the wording 'illegal amigos' was unfortunate, yet you refused to say so," Schumer told Roberts, referring to a 1983 memo Roberts wrote to White House Counsel Fred Fielding, in which he used that term while referring to an upcoming presidential interview with a Hispanic newspaper.

Schumer, like almost all of the committee's eight Democrats, criticized Roberts' refusal to comment on any issue that might come before the Court.

"You did speak at length on many issues and sounded like you were conveying your views to us, but when one went back and read the transcript each evening, there was less than met the ear that afternoon," Schumer said.

Still, Schumer, considered among the most liberal of committee Democrats, professed to being conflicted about whether to vote to confirm Roberts, and would not predict how either he or his colleagues would vote during the Sept. 22 committee meeting.

After two lengthy days of interrogations, Thursday's session was essentially cleanup time for the Democrats, several of whom besides Schumer still wanted to question the witness.

It was clear, however, as had been true since the first day of questioning, that Roberts was going to remain a disciplined nominee, rarely commenting on any case or issue that might one day appear before the Court.

But as in Wednesday's hearing, in which Roberts did reveal some slivers of his legal thinking, Thursday's session also provided a few glimmers of his views, and not merely a recitation of hornbook legal principles about precedent.

Queried by Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., Roberts said he was "not in favor now and not in favor then" of eliminating federal habeas corpus for inmates. "People do succeed at that phase," he said.

The day before, Roberts had said he agreed with one part of Grutter v. Bollinger, a 2003 decision that said public universities can take race into account in order to achieve a diverse student body, as long as they don't use rigid quotas. "You do need to look at the real-world impact in this area," Roberts said, referring to the decision's assertion that there was a clear public interest in creating a diverse student body.

And Roberts has asserted a constitutional right to privacy, although he was careful to give no indication whether that right to privacy extends to a woman's right to an abortion.

After Roberts finished late Thursday morning, the committee began hearing from a series of six panels totaling 30 witnesses, 15 from each side, each of whom was to give five minutes of testimony.

The witnesses ranged from Beverly Jones, a plaintiff in a landmark ruling about the Americans for Disabilities Act, to former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Carol Browner, to civil rights pioneer Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., to former Solicitor General Charles Fried.

"As I read some of the criticism of Judge Roberts, I wonder whether we are talking about the same man," said Fried, a Roberts supporter. "What I see is a fidelity to the law, not the pursuit of an agenda."

Other witnesses, however, were scathing in their remarks.

"Bork by accretion," said Georgetown University Law Center professor Peter Edelman, referring to Judge Robert Bork, whose Supreme Court nomination was defeated in 1987. "I think what it adds up to is far more radically conservative than Judge Bork," added Edelman, a former Clinton administration official.

"Judge Roberts has a vision of judicial restraint that really represents a retreat from the fundamental goal of protecting the rights of Americans through the federal courts," said Wade Henderson, who heads the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, in an interview after completing his testimony.

Roberts did appear to stumble at least once Thursday, during questioning by Sen. Edward Kennedy, Mass., the committee's senior Democrat, who quizzed him over language he used in a June 7, 1983, memo to White House Counsel Fielding. In the memo, Roberts made what could be viewed as a disparaging comment about the Equal Opportunity Employment Commission.

"I have been unable to confirm that the President promised to abolish the EEOC," Roberts wrote Fielding, referring to a letter (the sender's name has been redacted) that noted President Ronald Reagan promised to get rid of the agency. Roberts continued: "We should ignore that assertion in any event, as well as the assertion that the EEOC is 'un-American,' the truth of the matter notwithstanding."

Roberts quickly repudiated the view that the EEOC was "un-American," noting that the expression came from the unnamed correspondent. But his explanation for the final phrase was labored, and Kennedy, for one, wasn't buying it.

Roberts, whose memos and court opinions demonstrate a punctilious writing style, told Kennedy that the phrase did not refer to the words immediately before it. Rather, they referred to the first assertion in the sentence -- the claim by the letter writer that Reagan had promised to dismantle the agency -- Roberts said.

"He hasn't made a single mistake in grammar," Kennedy said during a break in the hearing. "I think he's trying to have it both ways."

The final day of the Roberts hearings was a day of Democratic musings; Republicans, now confident that he will be confirmed, had little to say.

Besides Schumer, California's Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D, also publicly aired her indecision about how she would vote.

Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., however, best summed up his party's feelings about the hearings, and Democrats' frustration at trying to figure out who Roberts is.

Noting that Roberts had provided pro bono advice to those challenging a Colorado anti-gay rights measure before the Supreme Court in 1996, Durbin wondered whether Roberts would have instead represented Colorado if he had been asked. "I think I probably would have," Roberts responded.

Durbin continued: "Where would you draw the line, if you would ever draw the line?"

Replied Roberts: "People become lawyers for all kinds of reasons. Civil rights. Environmental protection. Rights for the disabled. You won't be able to effectively vindicate those rights if you don't have a rule of law. That's why I became a lawyer, to promote and vindicate the rule of law."

Roberts Shows Some Openness (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Jeanne Cummings, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- After a week of carefully parrying pointed questions from both ends of the political spectrum during closely watched hearings, Judge John Roberts concluded his Senate confirmation hearings for chief justice by declaring, "I'm not an ideologue."

But Judge Roberts did flag some significant elements of his judicial approach during questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, even as he cautiously avoided discussing matters that he said could come before the Supreme Court. Among other things, Judge Roberts, currently on the U.S. appeals court here, suggested openness to a broad view of the federal power to regulate interstate commerce, some acceptance of constitutional privacy rights -- and some distance from liberal civil-rights advocates and civil libertarians.

While he frustrated some Democrats who said he was avoiding answering their questions, he gave Republicans no assurance that he was sympathetic to their causes. He demurred, for instance, when Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.) asked "whether the unborn child is a person or is a piece of property."

Still, Republicans professed no doubts about Judge Roberts, who himself offered no objection when Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) praised him as a "strict constructionist." And by the end of the third day of hearings yesterday, his more open demeanor appeared to mend fences with some Democrats who had complained about his cooperation earlier in the week.

Here are some highlights from Judge Roberts's testimony on key areas:

Federal Power and the Commerce Clause: Judge Roberts gave Democrats some hope that he backed a broad view of the Commerce Clause, the constitutional provision giving Congress power to regulate interstate commerce. For more than 70 years, the clause has been the linchpin of ambitious national legislation, including the New Deal economic plan, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Endangered Species Act.

Some conservative legal scholars reject the theory behind Wickard v. Filburn, the 1942 opinion that gave Congress virtually unfettered power under the Commerce Clause. But Judge Roberts suggested he might accept the reasoning in the case, which found that even an individual activity of minor economic impact could be regulated if many people doing the same thing cumulatively affects interstate commerce.

"Under the Commerce Clause, can Congress pass a law banning even non-commercial cloning?" Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) asked yesterday.

"It would seem to me that Congress can make a determination that this is an activity, if allowed to be pursued, that is going to have effects on interstate commerce," Judge Roberts replied. "Obviously, if you were successful in cloning an animal, that's not going to be simply a local phenomenon. That's going to be something people are going to -- "

"You can leave it at that," Sen. Schumer said. "That's a good answer, as far as I'm concerned."

In a separate exchange with Sen. Schumer, though, Judge Roberts declined to give a blanket endorsement of the Wickard decision as beyond challenge. Sen. Schumer called that disturbing, warning that "if certain viewpoints became majority viewpoints," that could lead to "the dismantling of the entire apparatus to protect our rights, through the narrowing of the commerce clause."

Privacy: Judge Roberts went further than some conservative legal scholars -- and further than conservative Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia did in their confirmation hearings -- in asserting that the Constitution accords a right to privacy -- a crucial prerequisite, though not a guarantee, for legal support of abortion rights and gay rights.

In particular, he endorsed the majority opinion in the 1965 contraception case, Griswold v. Connecticut, saying he agreed "with the Griswold court's conclusion that marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that. The court, since Griswold, has grounded the privacy right discussed in that case in the liberty interest protected under the Due Process Clause."

At a different point in the hearings, he said liberty "does cover areas such as privacy and it's not protected only in procedural terms, but it's protected substantively as well."

At his 1991 hearing, Justice Thomas acknowledged the court had created a privacy precedent but notably didn't take a position approving it. When Justice Scalia was asked at his 1986 hearing whether he thought there was a right to privacy, he refused to give an opinion, saying, "I can tell you that that is what a number of Supreme Court opinions now say."

But Judge Roberts did leave himself some wiggle room, refusing repeatedly to say how broadly he would interpret privacy rights, and in particular whether he felt the right applied to abortion.

Civil Rights: One area in which Judge Roberts didn't significantly distance himself from the court's most conservative judges was civil rights. Despite repeated invitations by Democrats to disown his 1980s memos critical of busing and challenging congressional efforts to strengthen the Voting Rights Act, Judge Roberts didn't do so.

DOJ_NMG_0006267

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) cited a memo in which Judge Roberts, then working in the Reagan administration, said a portion of the Voting Rights Act was "constitutionally suspect" and asked the judge whether he still felt that was so. Judge Roberts said he saw "no basis" today to think so. Some civil-rights advocates said that answer could mean that he hasn't seen a smart-enough argument to overturn it.

Judge Roberts did appear to take a more liberal view than Justices Thomas or Scalia when he said it was appropriate for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to weigh real-life ramifications when ruling on Michigan law-school admissions affirmative-action programs. But it was left unclear how much weight he would give such information or how much real-life evidence he might consider.

Listening to Congress: Judge Roberts took pains to distinguish himself from Justice Scalia on the value of reading legislative history in interpreting statutes, a sensitive point for many lawmakers.

Justice Scalia has been critical of using legislative history, saying he reasons from the original meaning of legal texts. Critics say legislative history can help judges understand how lawmakers intended their measures to apply. Senators in both parties seemed pleased when Judge Roberts said he relied on it on his current court and would continue to do so as chief justice.

"But I have quoted and looked to legislative history in the past to help determine the meaning of ambiguous terms, and I would expect to follow that same approach on the Supreme Court," he said.

Death Penalty: Judge Roberts seemed to defend policies speeding executions as he discussed his reasons in past years for pushing to limit the access of condemned inmates to federal courts. Despite probing by Sen. Russell Feingold (D., Wis.), he didn't endorse concerns raised more recently that wrongfully convicted prisoners may face execution.

That is a contrast to the court's senior justice John Paul Stevens. In a speech last month Justice Stevens noted that new DNA evidence demonstrates "a substantial number of death sentences have been imposed erroneously," indicating "serious flaws in our administration of criminal justice."

Roe V. Roberts (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

In our lifetime has there been a more politically poisonous Supreme Court decision than Roe v. Wade ? Set aside for a moment your thoughts on the substance of the ruling. (I happen to be a supporter of legalized abortion.) I'm talking about the continuing damage to the republic: disenfranchising, instantly and without recourse, an enormous part of the American population; preventing, as even Ruth Bader Ginsburg once said, proper political settlement of the issue by the people and their representatives; making us the only nation in the West to have legalized abortion by judicial fiat rather than by the popular will expressed democratically.

The corruption continues 32 years later. You could see it played out hour by hour in the Senate confirmation hearings of Judge John Roberts. Question upon question that pretended to be about high constitutional principle was really about abortion in ill-concealed disguise.

Senators asked gravely about how deeply Roberts believes in upholding precedent. Do you think that any of the Democrats were concerned whether Roberts would uphold Richmond v. Croson , the precedent that outlawed racial quotas in municipal contracting? Or Boy Scouts v. Dale , which permitted the exclusion of gay Scout leaders?

This is all about Roe . Take the lines of interrogation about Roberts's belief in the right to privacy. They are not asking about search and seizure in your home. They are asking about the "right to choose" (a brilliant locution that expunges the ugly word abortion from all political debate about abortion) -- what Roberts in 1981 correctly termed the "so-called 'right to privacy,' " a skepticism he is now required to disavow.

Why? Because everyone knows what happened to Robert Bork when he forthrightly and honestly denied some kind of separate, newly hatched right to privacy.

And then there are the learned Judiciary Committee disquisitions on "originalism" -- the judicial philosophy by which Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas try to anchor the Constitution in something real, i.e., the meaning of the words as intended and understood at the time they were written.

Originalism is itself highly problematic, the worst judicial philosophy except for all the others, because they permit unmoored and arbitrary constitutional interpretation -- and thus unmoored and arbitrary judicial power. The learned senators, however, really don't care much about originalism, except to the extent that it would, almost by definition, make Roberts a categorical opponent of Roe . Which is why Roberts denies that he has any ideology, any "overarching judicial philosophy," and is nothing more than an ad hoc, bottom-up type of guy.

Maybe he is. Maybe he isn't. But he knows that if he dares to say otherwise, he gets Borked. If, on the other hand, he pretends to have a mind so scrubbed of theory that he is at a loss to explain gravitation itself, he gets to be chief justice of the United States for 40 years.

In 2000 Al Gore declared that he would not nominate a justice who did not support Roe. Dianne Feinstein says today that if she determines that Roberts opposes Roe , she will be compelled to vote against him. For Democrats, abortion is an open litmus test. For Republicans, it is a test of agility: Can they find the nominee who might be against Roe but has been circumspect enough not to say so publicly and who will be clever enough to avoid saying so at his confirmation hearings?

Circumspect and clever Roberts has been. No one really knows. But I predict two things: (a) Chief Justice Roberts will vote to uphold Roe v. Wade , and (b) his replacing his former boss, Chief Justice William Rehnquist, will move the court only mildly, but most assuredly, to the left -- as measured by the only available yardstick, the percentage of concurrences with the opinions of those conservative touchstones, Scalia and Thomas.

I infer this not just by what Roberts has said in his hearings -- that he supports Griswold v. Connecticut , that he deeply respects precedent and that he finds Roe itself worthy of respect. That is little beyond boilerplate. I infer it from his temperament, career and life history as an establishment conservative who prizes judicial modesty above all. Which means that while he will never repeat Roe , he will never repeal it and be the cause of the social upheaval that repeal would inevitably bring.

Not that this in any way disqualifies Roberts in my conservative eyes. He is a perfectly reasonable traditional conservative, who will be an outstanding chief justice. He is just not a judicial revolutionary. If you're a conservative looking for a return to the good old days, you'll be disappointed. And if you're a liberal who lives for the good old days because that's all that liberalism has left, tell Chuck Schumer to relax.

Liberals And Conservatives Remain Worlds Apart On Roberts's Suitability (NYT)

By Robin Toner And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - In a sharp clash of worldviews, liberal advocates warned Thursday that confirming Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States would threaten hard-won progress on civil rights and women's rights, while conservatives countered that he was clearly committed to equal justice under law.

On the final day of Judge Roberts's confirmation hearings, liberals were arrayed in full force before the Senate Judiciary Committee: civil rights leaders, leading feminists and reproductive rights advocates, all warning about the importance of the court in the lives of average Americans.

In one emblematic moment, Representative John Lewis, the Georgia Democrat severely beaten during the civil rights movement, told the committee that he feared a Roberts court would "no longer hear the people's cries for justice," and no longer act as a "sympathetic referee" because of his philosophy of judicial restraint.

Conservatives argued that Judge Roberts was thoroughly in the mainstream of civil rights law.

Peter S. Kirsanow, a Republican member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, applauded Judge Roberts for arguing against "unlawful racial quotas or racial set-asides untethered to a showing of discrimination." Mr. Kirsanow said Judge Roberts supported the "bedrock principle of treating people on the basis of merit, without regard to race or sex."

More generally, conservatives argued that the nominee embodied the conservative view that the law should be a neutral arbiter - an umpire, as Judge Roberts put it consistently - not an instrument for changing public policy.

Judge Roberts presented himself as committed to the law above all else in his final round of questioning Thursday morning. Trying to reassure wary Democrats, he said, "I'm not an ideologue." He added, "And you and I agree that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

For all the intensity, conservatives were keenly aware that the debate was largely symbolic. Republicans, who control the committee and have a 10-vote majority in the Senate, are confident that the Roberts nomination is on a glide path.

The Judiciary Committee will vote on Judge Roberts's nomination next Thursday, and the full Senate will take it up the following week. The biggest political question, at the moment, is how many Democrats Mr. Roberts will get.

Several key Democrats, signaling the likelihood of a party-line vote in committee next Thursday, said Judge Roberts had yet to show his values and core commitments, beyond his commitment to the legal process.

Senators Charles E. Schumer of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California both said they were haunted by the question, "What kind of justice will John Roberts be?"

Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, pressed Mr. Roberts on whether there was any client he would not represent in his years as a lawyer. Would he have aided either side in a suit challenging a state constitutional provision on the ground that it restricted gay rights, for example?

DOJ_NMG_0006269

Mr. Roberts, who assisted gay rights advocates in such a suit, replied, "I probably would have," saying that a lawyer should not sit in judgment of his client.

Mr. Durbin responded, "If this is just a process, a legal process and you'll play for any team that asks you to play, it raises a question about where would you draw the line, if you would ever draw the line?"

He said, "All of us are trying to get down to, what are your core values?"

Republican senators responded that Democrats were simply creating a new standard for judging a nominee who was clearly more than qualified - a point driven home Thursday by the American Bar Association, which pronounced Judge Roberts "well qualified."

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said, "Nobody can question your intellect, because it would be a question of their intellect to question yours, so we're down to the heart."

Mr. Graham added, "If we go down this road of putting people's hearts into play, and the only way you can have a good heart is, 'Adopt my value system,' we're doing a great disservice to the judiciary."

The challenge to Judge Roberts's values was perhaps most pointed in a panel on civil rights. Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, said that a strong federal role was key to enforcing civil rights for more than a century. Judge Roberts, Mr. Henderson said, repeatedly advocated a more restricted, limited federal role on civil and voting rights during his years in the Reagan administration.

Republicans argued that Mr. Roberts was representing the views of his client - the Reagan administration - in advocating a new approach to civil rights in the early 1980's. In any event, Republicans said, that was an argument over the means to reach equality and a colorblind society, not the goal.

Mr. Lewis argued that the Reagan proposals for stricter requirements to prove voting rights violations, had they prevailed, would have resulted in fewer black elected officials. "The judge was on the wrong side of history," he said.

Judge Roberts had an army of defenders on Thursday, including friends and former colleagues who testified to his legal acumen and disinterested professionalism.

Prof. Charles Fried of Harvard, a former Republican solicitor general, applauded Judge Roberts for adhering to his views of the law, even when doing so led to outcomes his opponents have attacked. "I wonder whether the critics are not really complaining that Judge Roberts didn't start with a result - their result - and then wrestle the law around until it fitted," Professor Fried said.

"He knows the difference between law and politics," Professor Fried said. "Judge Roberts seems to understand this down to his shoes."

At the end of the hearing, as at the beginning, Judge Roberts's views on privacy, and the uncertainty over whether that would translate into support for a constitutional right to abortion, loomed large.

Karen Pearl, interim president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, testified against Judge Roberts's nomination, citing a 1989 warning by Justice Harry A. Blackmun that "a chill wind blows" for abortion rights.

"Accepting anything less than clarity" from Judge Roberts, Ms. Pearl said, "would be irresponsible."

At the same time, conservatives were arguing that Judge Roberts had not gone too far in endorsing the right to privacy.

Leonard Leo, Jay Sekulow and Wendy Long, three conservative lawyers organizing support for the administration's judicial nominees, circulated a memorandum arguing that Judge Roberts's testimony put him firmly in line with the conservative icons Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

"His testimony on the right to privacy mirrored that of Clarence Thomas during his Supreme Court confirmation hearing," the lawyers wrote. "He refused to concede that there was a general privacy right, resisting Senator Schumer's effort to force the term."

After four days of hearings, some Democrats on the committee said they remained uncertain and confused. Senator Joseph R. Biden, Democrat of Delaware, said, at day's end: "My question is, Is Justice Roberts going to be a Scalia, a Rehnquist or maybe a Kennedy? If I think he's going to be a Justice Scalia, who I like personally very much, I vote no. If I think he's going to be a Kennedy, I vote yes. If I think he's going to be a Rehnquist, I probably vote yes because it won't change anything."

John Roberts And A Judge Of History (WP)

By Marcia Davis, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

John Roberts is well on his way to head the nation's judiciary, or so it's widely believed. Washington knows this in the manner that it knows such things: There's little left to do now but count the votes.

DOJ_NMG_0006270

But yesterday, Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), the longtime legislator and civil rights icon, sat at the table before the Senate Judiciary Committee anyway. He sat along with other Roberts opponents -- Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and retired 6th Circuit Judge Nathaniel Jones, former general counsel of the NAACP.

Others had a seat at the table, too -- Jennifer Cabranes Braceras and Peter Kirsanow, both members of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and supporters of Roberts, were among the day's 30 witnesses offering their views on the nominee.

The diversity before the microphones in Hart Room 216, stood in sharp contrast to the scene that's dominated the week's proceedings.

In this exercise in representative democracy, the 18 committee members are all white -- 17 men and one woman, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). There have also been only a handful of people of color witnessing the proceedings, be they activists from the right or left, students or simply those who wanted to observe history.

"The nature of the Senate for most of its history has been an organization of white men," says Richard Baker of the Senate's historical office. "That's just a fact. No question about it."

Barack Obama, the newly elected Democratic senator from Illinois, is the only African American senator, the fifth in the nation's history. There have been only 18 people of color since its founding -- black, Latino, Asian or Native American. There have been only 33 women: 32 white, one African American.

"It still raises the whole issue of race and class in the very room," Lewis said later yesterday afternoon. "That we are still a society where minorities, people of color, they are not present, just not there. . . . They are not in a position to raise some of these hard and tough questions." And "that's why it is left on the shoulders of some of the progressive" whites in the Senate and other bodies, he said.

Public questioning of Roberts ended yesterday morning, leaving the ensuing testimony, pro and con, to be delivered to a dwindling audience. All of it is in the record, and the senators receive the statements. By the time the panel including Lewis was on deck, there were seven senators in the room, and few journalists.

Kirsanow and Braceras echoed Roberts's call for judicial restraint, with Braceras noting that the court "is neither the first nor the last word on civil rights."

Like Lewis, Jones and Henderson spoke of the special role the courts had played in expanding racial equality.

But it was Lewis's presence that offered the drama of history.

"When I was growing up in rural Alabama," read Lewis, 65, "I saw those signs that said, 'White Men, Colored Men,' 'White Women, Colored Women.' I used to ask my parents, my grandparents, 'Why racism? Why racial discrimination?' And they would tell me, 'Don't get in trouble. Don't get in the way.' "

"As a participant in the civil rights movement of the 1960s, I decided to get in the way. I was beaten, arrested and jailed more than 40 times for peaceful, nonviolent protests against legalized segregation in the South."

He spoke about Hurricane Katrina and how it had exposed, with its images of mostly poor African Americans facing the aftermath of the storm in New Orleans, race and class remain great dividers.

"In 1965, Judge Roberts was only 10 years old. He may be a brilliant lawyer, but I wonder whether he can really understand the depth of what it took to get the Voting Rights Act passed," Lewis continued.

Voting rights and other issues such as the right to privacy (a key element in Roe v. Wade) have been a focus of Democratic senators questioning Roberts. They have made it more than clear that they have not been happy with his responses.

Lewis knows how to count votes. He is aware of where Roberts may be heading in the coming days. And it didn't bother him at all that he was reading to an almost empty room. He also knows that the proceedings were televised.

"It is my hope that my testimony will give the senators, especially those who have not made up their mind, but even those who have made up their mind, some additional information, give them some food for thought."

"I don't buy this idea that during the time that Judge Roberts was a young attorney in the Reagan administration he was just doing his job and working for someone who believed one thing and he believed something else."

Lewis watched Roberts's questioning closely and found himself frustrated: "People wanted to know, they wanted to know how he felt. What is your overall feeling, what is in your heart?"

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) asked Lewis how he felt about all that Roberts had said. After all, Roberts noted, at 50 he is not the man he was in his twenties.

But Lewis isn't convinced. Nor does it matter, he says, that he is not expecting to change history this time.

There have certainly been colleagues and activists who say, "Why get in the way? This wheel is already rolling. . . . Now he's going to be the chief justice. . . . You shouldn't say anything, you shouldn't get in the way."

But that just wouldn't be Lewis.

Final Day Of Nomination Hearings: Yawn. (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

John Lewis, legend of the civil rights movement and Democratic congressman from Georgia, was giving it his all before the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday afternoon. "I fear that if Judge Roberts is confirmed to be chief justice of the United States, the Supreme Court would no longer hear the people's cries for justice," he pleaded.

Lewis's testimony was passionate, poignant -- and pretty much irrelevant to the outcome. Only four of the committee's 18 senators were on hand for much of his testimony; Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) could be seen consulting his wristwatch. Of the 120 seats in the press gallery, 104 were unoccupied. And dozens of seats reserved for the public went unoccupied.

Skipping the final session, committee members Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) gave a news conference outside the hearing room. The pair found themselves talking mostly to camera crews, as a couple of reporters half-listened. "Questions?" Brownback asked.

Nobody replied.

As witnesses gave their views for and against the man who will almost certainly be the next chief justice, one thing was clear: John G. Roberts has no Anita Hill. In 20 hours of questioning that ended yesterday morning, Democrats were unable to bloody the nominee significantly. With Republicans in possession of enough votes to confirm Roberts -- and no skeleton peering from the nominee's closet -- the fourth and final day of hearings into Roberts left the firm impression that senators were just going through the motions.

As Democrats proceeded through their final round of questioning, the Republicans did not conceal their boredom. Sen. Tom Coburn (Okla.) yawned. Brownback closed his eyes and rubbed his brow. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) let out a big yawn and fixed his hair. Five GOP staffers shared a joke, then passed a note to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah), who read it, looked over at the Democratic side and chuckled.

As Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) wrapped up his questioning of Roberts, he listed a number of documents he wanted included in the record.

"Mr. Chairman, if those items could be entered in the record?" Feingold asked of Specter.

Silence.

In the chairman's seat, Specter sat, scribbling or doodling, unaware that all eyes were on him to grant the routine request.

"Mr. Chairman?" Feingold said again.

This roused Specter from his reverie. "Yes?" he asked, looking up, and then he finally mustered "Without objection, so ordered."

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a stalwart supporter of Roberts, skipped most of the afternoon session. Instead, this distinguished committee member distributed laminated cards labeled "Crying Wolf Bingo" with words such as "Ideologue!" "Partisan!" "Far Right!" "Zealot!" "Extremist!" An accompanying news release chronicled "the sad history of attacks against previous nominees."

In the hallway outside the hearing room, the scene had the feel of open-microphone night at a karaoke bar, as liberal and conservative lobbyists lined up in front of two idle television cameras to give their views. It wasn't clear whether any of the footage -- filmed by C-SPAN and a pooled network camera -- would ever see the airwaves.

Among the appearances most of the senators missed:

Roberts friend and legal partner Kathryn Webb Bradley, calling herself a Democrat who didn't support President Bush in either election, said she felt "confident entrusting my own rights and those of my children and their generation to John Roberts for safekeeping."

On the other side, Roderick Jackson, a high school girls basketball coach from Alabama, spoke of how a 5 to 4 Supreme Court ruling saved his job after he was fired for complaining about unequal treatment of girls. "A shift in even one vote would have left me without any remedy," he said.

The thing that seemed to alarm Democrats was not Roberts himself or his writings but the fact that ideologues on the right love him so much. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) held a news conference during the afternoon hearing and waved "publications from conservative journals" assuring conservatives that they should be "secure in knowing they have a true soul spirit with this nominee."

At times yesterday, the hearing took a promising turn, as when Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) pleaded with Roberts to say whether he would be a Felix Frankfurter, a William Rehnquist or an Antonin Scalia.

"I think if you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath; that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue," Roberts replied. "And you and I agree that that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court."

DOJ_NMG_0006272

It was a powerful moment -- while it lasted. Cornyn broke in to criticize Democrats' demands for more Roberts papers. Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) started talking about Paris Hilton's telephone records. Graham requested time to denounce the views of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's views on prostitution.

And, with that, Specter put an end to the questioning of Roberts.

Democrats On Receiving End In Flap Over Roberts (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Sen. John Cornyn turned the tables on Democrats yesterday, transforming the confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. into one of the nastiest partisan conflicts the Senate Judiciary Committee has seen in recent years.

Throughout the four days of hearings, Democrats called for the release of internal legal documents Judge Roberts wrote while working in the Solicitor General's Office. Republicans said those documents fall under attorney-client privilege and cannot be released.

Fed up with the repeated pleas, Mr. Cornyn, Texas Republican, reminded the Democrats on the panel of their stunned outrage when some of their own internal records wound up in public.

"It strikes me as odd, having been on the committee last year when we had an unfortunate theft of internal documents that were written by staffers of individual senators and which were published to the outside world," he said. "There was bipartisan outrage over that and we, as I recall, referred the matter for investigation and possible prosecution."

He was making reference to 14 internal memos that were downloaded from Democratic computers by two Republican staffers and were published by the Wall Street Journal and The Washington Times. The memos revealed a cozy relationship between Democrats on the Judiciary Committee and outside groups with special interests in the federal judiciary.

In one memo, staffers for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, recommend that a Bush nominee to the 6th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals be stalled until after that appellate court had decided a landmark affirmative action case.

"The thinking is that the current 6th Circuit will sustain the affirmative action program, but if a new judge with conservative views is confirmed before the case is decided, that new judge will be able, under 6th Circuit rules, to review the case and vote on it," the staffers wrote to Mr. Kennedy.

In another memo to Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, Washington lawyer Miguel A. Estrada was singled out as "especially dangerous" because "he is Latino." Mr. Estrada, born in Honduras, withdrew his nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit after being filibustered by Democrats for eight months.

At yesterday's hearing, Mr. Durbin reminded Mr. Cornyn that a Republican staffer -- Manuel Miranda -- "was discharged" over the matter, which was turned over to the Justice Department for investigation.

Just this week, it turned out, Mr. Durbin had written Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to commend his department for successfully prosecuting the man who hacked into the cell phone of hotel heiress Paris Hilton and stole her telephone records. In the letter, he asked if any precedent had been created to go after Mr. Miranda.

There was no disagreement from Republicans and, in any event, that was beside the point, Mr. Cornyn said.

"Surely if the legislative branch is entitled to confidential communications between our lawyers and us so we can do our jobs and get candid advice, the executive or the president is entitled to the same sort of confidential and candid communications," he said.

Americans for Rice, a group that's trying to drum up support for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to run for president in 2008, has put together a 60-second television ad that it hopes to air by the end of the month.

"While driving from Fargo, North Dakota, to Nashville in my Mini Cooper plastered with 'Condoleezza Rice for President' bumper stickers, numerous cars honked at me and the drivers either waved or gave a thumbs up," writes Crystal Dueker, the organization's national co-chairman.

"It set the tone for our successful fund-raising booth at the National Federation of Republican Women. Over 1,500 women from across the United States gathered to discuss politics, leadership and a vision for the future of our nation," she said.

About 190 women donated an average of $15 each toward the funds to put the ad on television. In the meantime, it can be viewed at www.americansforrice.com.

Religious test

DOJ_NMG_0006273

"They should be ashamed. We should be ashamed. We have not progressed much in 45 years it seems, and we appear to be traveling in the wrong direction," Manuel Miranda writes at www.OpinionJournal.com.

"Article VI of the Constitution prohibits a religious test from being imposed on nominees to public office. The clause was motivated by the experience of Catholics in the Maryland colony and Baptists in Virginia who had been the targets of Great Britain's two Test Acts. These infamous laws of intolerance sought to prevent anyone who did not belong to the Church of England from holding public office. The Test Acts did not say that Catholics could not hold office; the bigotry was more subtle. Officials questioned would-be public servants to determine whether they believed in particular tenets of the Catholic faith," Mr. Miranda said.

"While questioning John Roberts on Tuesday, Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter asked: 'Would you say that your views are the same as those expressed by John Kennedy when he was a candidate, and he spoke to the Greater Houston Ministerial Association in September of 1960: "I do not speak for my church on public matters, and the church does not speak for me." '

"Hours later, Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California made it worse: 'In 1960, there was much debate about President John F. Kennedy's faith and what role Catholicism would play in his administration. At that time, he pledged to address the issues of conscience out of a focus on the national interests, not out of adherence to the dictates of one's religion. ... My question is: Do you?'

"How insulting. How offensive. How invidiously ignorant to question someone like Judge Roberts with such apparent presumption and disdain for the religion he practices. The JFK question is not just the camel's nose of religious intolerance; it is the whole smelly camel."

Dean screams

The Democratic National Committee yesterday stepped up its attacks on Judge John G. Roberts Jr., with DNC Chairman Howard Dean saying that the Supreme Court nominee was "the wrong man at the wrong time for our country."

Mr. Dean used similar phasing during his ill-fated 2004 presidential campaign when he condemned the U.S. war in Iraq, calling it "the wrong war in the wrong place at the wrong time."

"The skills John Roberts displays are like those of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove or House Republican Leader Tom DeLay. Both of those men have sharp political minds — they are among the smartest in Washington. But they use those skills to push a narrow ideology and win at any costs," he said.

"Roberts has spent a career using the law to protect corporate interests and roll back the rights that protect us all," Mr. Dean said in an e-mail fundraising solicitation to Democratic Party members.

Hatch's hint

Among the witnesses who testified in support of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. during yesterday's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing was Utah District Judge Denise Posse-Blanco Lindberg. Judge Lindberg seraved as a lawyer with Judge Roberts at the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson LLP, and worked with him as a Supreme Court clerk.

Observers have suggested that President Bush would like to make a Hispanic or a woman his next Supreme Court nominee, and Judge Lindberg is both — a point that Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, made sure to emphasize yesterday.

After Judge Lindberg had testified, Mr. Hatch thanked her effusively for her testimony and recited her impressive biography: The daughter of a Puerto Rican mother and a Cuban father, she was 9 years old when her family fled Cuba after communist dictator Fidel Castro came to power.

In addition to her magna cum laude law degree from Brigham Young University, Judge Lindberg also holds a master's degree and a doctorate from the University of Utah. She is a devout Mormon and the mother of two grown sons.

She was appointed to her state court position in 1998 by Gov. Michael O. Leavitt, a Republican whom Mr. Bush has since chosen as secretary of health and human services.

Praising her as having "one of the strongest backgrounds of any woman lawyer in this country," Mr. Hatch told Judge Lindberg, "I was particularly pleased to listen to your experiences as a woman, as a minority, as an able jurist. ... That means a lot to me, and I personally want to pay tribute to you as somebody who has not only excelled in the legal profession, but deserves the accolades that I've just given."

Arnold ready

The worst-kept secret in California is that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will seek a second term in 2006, and he is expected to make it official today, the San Francisco Chronicle reports.

"I'm not in this just for the short term," Mr. Schwarzenegger told a friendly crowd of more than 120 people at a town-hall meeting in Clovis on Wednesday.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who took office after the October 2003 recall of Democratic Gov. Gray Davis, left little doubt as to what he would announce during today's appearance in San Diego.

"If you start something, you have to finish it," he said. "People sent me to Sacramento to fix a broken system. I'm going to stay and fight for the people until the system is fixed once and for all."

New chairman

The House Republican Conference announced yesterday that New York Rep. Peter T. King will be the new chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

Mr. King succeeds former Rep. Christopher Cox, California Republican, who left the House to become head of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

'This Great City Will Rise Again' (NSDY/AP)

By Nedra Pickler, The Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- President Bush promised tonight the government will pay most of the costs of rebuilding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast in one of the largest reconstruction projects the world has ever seen. "There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again," the president said.

Standing in Jackson Square in the heart of the French Quarter, Bush acknowledged his administration had failed to respond adequately to Hurricane Katrina, which killed hundreds of people across five states. The government's costs for rebuilding could reach $200 billion or beyond.

"Four years after the frightening experience of Sept. 11, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency," the president said. When the government fails to meet such an obligation, Bush said, "I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

Bush ordered his Cabinet secretaries to join in a comprehensive review of the government's faulty response. In addition, he told the Department of Homeland Security to undertake an immediate review of emergency plans in every major city in America.

He also said a disaster on the scale of Katrina requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces.

Unusual for a prime-time address, Bush stood tieless in a blue dress shirt. At his back, the famous palm tree-framed St. Louis Cathedral was brightly lit. Elsewhere in the famed city, workers were still pumping out flooded neighborhoods and collecting bodies left behind in the frantic evacuation.

Bush proposed establishment of worker recovery accounts providing up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care during victims' search for employment. He also urged legislation to provide education, small business help and health care. He proposed creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama offering tax breaks to encourage businesses to stay in the devastated region and new businesses to open.

In the speech, which lasted a bit over 20 minutes, he said he would ask Congress to approve an Urban Homesteading Act in which surplus federal property would be turned over to low-income citizens by means of a lottery to build homes, with mortgages or assistance from charitable organizations.

Other proposals, according to congressional officials briefed by the White House, include:

A 100 percent reimbursement to states to cover their costs of health care for treating many evacuees through the end of next year.

$1.9 billion to reimburse states for educating displaced students, including some money that could go to religious schools.

Six-month forgiveness on student loan interest for affected areas, at an estimated cost of $100 million.

Bush repeated a hotline number, 1-877-568-3317, for people to call to help reunite family members separated during the hurricane. Moments later, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., criticized Bush, saying "Leadership isn't a speech or a toll-free number."

"No American doubts that New Orleans will rise again," Kerry said. "They doubt the competence and commitment of this administration." House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in a joint statement, said, "We are concerned by Bush administration initiatives this week waiving wage protections, environmental safeguards and protections for veterans, minorities, women and the disabled."

Bush described the hurricane's aftermath as "days of sorrow and outrage," and he said the nation had "witnessed the kind of desperation no citizen of this great and generous nation should ever have to know." He deplored scenes of victims calling out for food and water, criminals who had no mercy, and bodies of the dead lying uncovered in the street.

He said the suffering of victims was tempered by acts of courage and kindness. To the hundreds of thousands of people forced from their homes, Bush said, "You need to know that our whole nation cares about you -- and in the journey ahead you are not alone."

Promising better days ahead, Bush said, "The streets of Biloxi and Gulfport will again be filled with lovely homes and the sound of children playing. The churches of Alabama will have their broken steeples mended and their congregations whole.

"And here in New Orleans, the street cars will once again rumble down St. Charles, and the passionate soul of a great city will return."

Bush faced the nation at a vulnerable point in his presidency. Most Americans disapprove of his handling of Katrina, and his job-approval rating has been dragged down to the lowest point of his presidency also because of dissatisfaction with the Iraq war and rising gas prices. He has struggled to demonstrate the same take-charge leadership he displayed after the Sept. 11 terror attacks four years ago.

Across five Gulf Coast states, the death toll from Katrina climbed today to 794, led by 558 in Louisiana.

Faulting the government's response, Bush said that Katrina "was not a normal hurricane _ and the normal disaster relief system was not equal to it." State officials have blamed the federal government for failing to respond more quickly, and federal officials have pointed fingers at state and local officials.

Responding to charges that help would have been sent more quickly if most victims had not been poor and black, Bush noted that the persistent poverty, rooted deep in the Gulf region, was broadcast for all Americans to see.

"That poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America," Bush said. "We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action."

Bush said the goal was to get evacuees out of shelters by mid-October and into apartments and other homes, with assistance from the government. He said he would work with Congress to ensure that states were reimbursed for the cost of caring for evacuees.

Bush called for new measures to protect New Orleans from flooding and said the Army Corps of Engineers would work with state and local officials. "Protecting a city that sits lower than the water around it is not easy, but it can and has been done," the president said.

"The work that has begun in the Gulf Coast region will be one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen," Bush said. He praised Americans for giving generously for disaster relief, saying the fund led by former Presidents Bush and Clinton had received pledges of more than $100 million.

Rebuilding across the devastated region is expected to cost $200 billion or more in the near term. The final tab could approach the more than $300 billion spent thus far on U.S. wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Congress has already approved $62 billion for the disaster, but that is expected to run out next month.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., speaking after the president's address, said the recovery programs would add to the nation's debt. GOP leaders are open to suggestions from lawmakers to cut government spending elsewhere, he said.

AP Writer Nedra Pickler reported from Pascagoula, Miss., and New Orleans and Terence Hunt reported from Washington.

Bush Announces Massive Recovery Program (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Erika Bolstad

Knight Ridder, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Speaking from the center of a deserted and devastated city, President Bush on Thursday outlined one of the biggest recovery efforts in history for Hurricane Katrina and promised to overhaul the government's disaster-response plan.

"This government will learn the lessons of Hurricane Katrina," he said in a nationally televised speech from Jackson Square, in the symbolic heart of New Orleans' French Quarter. He assured Katrina's victims that they would get the help they needed to resume normal lives.

"The work that has begun in the Gulf Coast region will be one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen," he said. "I know that when you sit on the steps of a porch where a home once stood or sleep on a cot in a crowded shelter, it is hard to imagine a bright future. But that future will come."

Bush made his fourth trip to the stricken Gulf Coast on a day of hope for New Orleans. Hours before Bush's speech, Mayor Ray Nagin announced that nearly 200,000 residents and business owners would be allowed to return starting this weekend.

"It's a good day in New Orleans," Nagin said. "We're bringing New Orleans back, and this is our first step."

The mayor's optimistic mood contrasted with the finger-pointing and ill will that followed the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, which ravaged the Gulf Coast. Bush's speech was the latest in a series of White House efforts to address concerns about the government's response and questions about the president's leadership.

Bush, whose job-approval ratings have fallen to around 40 percent in a series of recent polls - the lowest of his presidency - went further than he ever had in acknowledging the missteps and accepting responsibility.

"It was not a normal hurricane, and the normal disaster-relief system was not equal to it," he said. "The system, at every level of government, was not well coordinated and was overwhelmed in the first few days. It is now clear that a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces.

"Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency," he added. "When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

The president also addressed concerns raised by televised images of suffering crowds of city residents, many of whom were low-income African-Americans. Polls indicate that most blacks believe that the slow government response was related to the race of the victims. Most whites reject that explanation.

Bush said Americans watching the disaster-relief efforts on television saw "some deep persistent poverty" that "has roots in a history of racial discrimination."

"We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action," he said. "When the streets are rebuilt, there should be many new businesses, including minority-owned businesses, along those streets."

Bush didn't put a price on the recovery effort, but most estimates put the tab between $200 billion and $300 billion, roughly equal to the combined cost to date of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. The government will borrow the money, driving up the national debt. This year's deficit is already $331 billion.

The president outlined a series of steps to aid flood victims: vouchers to let displaced students attend private or parochial schools at public expense; federal reimbursements to help states deal with higher Medicaid costs for evacuees; up to $5,000 for some unemployed hurricane victims so that they can pay for training, child care or other services that might help them find work; the creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone that would give tax breaks and loans in return for business investment; and new "worker recovery accounts" to expand unemployment benefits.

The school voucher plan is likely to be particularly controversial because Congress has blocked similar plans in the past. Democrats accused Bush of trying to use the disaster to advance an ideological agenda.

"The Gulf Coast region does not deserve to be treated as a laboratory for political opportunism or ideological experimentation," Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California said in a joint statement.

In New Orleans, the first significant steps toward normalcy will come on Saturday, when business owners will be allowed to return to some sections of the city. Areas set to open in stages include the central business district, the French Quarter, the section known as Uptown, and Algiers, located across the Mississippi River. Businesses on Bourbon Street will be ready to reopen their doors to greet customers on Sept. 26.

Residents will start returning on Monday, on a schedule devised by zip codes.

To return to the city, residents and business owners will be asked to verify proof of residence or business ownership with identification. About 182,000 people live in the areas to be reopened over the next two weeks, out of a city of nearly 500,000.

Despite the cleanup and plans for rebirth, nearly half of New Orleans remains flooded and uninhabitable. The Army Corps of Engineers estimates that it will take until Oct. 8 to pump all the water out of the city.

The death toll also continues to rise along the Gulf Coast. At least 794 bodies have been found so far, including 558 in Louisiana. On Thursday, government forecasters confirmed what had seemed clear for weeks: Katrina was the most destructive hurricane ever to strike the United States.

Hurricane Andrew, the previous worst storm, cost about $21 billion in today's dollars when it hit South Florida in 1992.

Bush pledged to work closely with city and state officials along the Gulf Coast during the reconstruction. He said federal funds would cover "the great majority of costs" of repairing roads, bridges, schools, hospitals and other public facilities. He said all expenditures would be closely monitored to guard against fraud and waste.

White House aides selected a setting for Bush's remarks that provided a reassuring view of one of the city's most recognizable landmarks. The square, dominated by the cream-colored spires of St. Louis Cathedral and a statue of Andrew Jackson on horseback, was spruced up Monday by a fire-fighting crew from Arizona.

The crew, part of a California-based emergency-response team, was in New Orleans to help set up accommodations, showers and meal tents for thousands of federal law enforcement workers helping with the cleanup. Sam Wilbanks, a U.S. Forest Service employee on the emergency-response team, said crew members weren't aware of Bush's visit when they volunteered to clean the square.

The White House kept the site of Bush's speech secret until Wednesday night, and troops from the 82nd Airborne patrolled the area. The precautions guaranteed that Bush wouldn't face the kind of heckling that Vice President Dick Cheney endured during his recent visit to the Gulf Coast, when he was loudly cursed.

Mr. Bush In New Orleans (NYT)

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006277

President Bush said three things last night that desperately needed to be said. He forthrightly acknowledged his responsibility for the egregious mishandling of the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. He spoke clearly and candidly about race and poverty. And finally, he was clear about what would be needed to bring back the Gulf Coast and said the federal government would have to lead and pay for that effort.

Once again, as he did after 9/11, Mr. Bush has responded to disaster with disconcerting uncertainty, then risen to the occasion later. Once again, he has delivered a speech that will reassure many Americans that he understands the enormity of the event and the demands of leadership to come.

But there are plenty of reasons for concern. After 9/11, Mr. Bush responded not only with a stirring speech at the ruins of the World Trade Center and a principled response to the Taliban in Afghanistan. He also decided to invade Iraq, and he tried to do it on the cheap - with disastrous results, for which the country continues to pay every day.

This time, Mr. Bush must come up with a more coherent and well-organized follow-through.

Clearly chastened by the outcry over his slow response to the disaster and his administration's bumbling performance, Mr. Bush said last night that he was prepared to undertake "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen." If he is sincere about his commitment to New Orleans and the other damaged localities, and to the displaced residents, he may have a fight on his hands in persuading Congress to support such an ambitious and necessary effort. Obviously, any official with even a minimal sense of responsibility would understand that this work will have to begin with a promise to give up on any more of the Republican Party's cherished tax cuts.

The speech, as good as it was, marks only a moment of clarity. Mr. Bush's problem in dealing with Katrina has been, at bottom, the same one that has bedeviled the administration since 9/11. The president came to office with a deep antipathy toward big government that has turned out to be utterly inappropriate for the world he inherited. The result has not been less government, but it has definitely been inept government.

We have already seen what happened to the Federal Emergency Management Agency when it was taken over by an administration that didn't like large federal agencies with sweeping mandates. For Iraq, the White House asserted that open-ended and no-bid contracts doled out to big corporations run by people known to government officials would mean swifter, more efficient operations. What we got was gross inefficiency, which has run up costs while failing in many cases to do the jobs required.

Given this history, it's impossible not to worry about what will happen to the billions of dollars being committed to New Orleans, especially since the Army Corps of Engineers' top man in the reclamation effort was once the corps' top man overseeing contracts in Iraq.

The administration is staffed several levels deep with officials who share their leader's distrust of large, expensive federal undertakings. But it is now faced with an unprecedented task: housing hundreds of thousands of homeless people, making sure their children are educated over the short term and eventually getting them a start on a new life. There is no way to do that without a focused federal effort.

Last night, the president was particularly strong when discussing the nation's shocking lack of preparedness for disaster, and the stark fact - obvious to every television viewer around the globe - that the people left homeless and endangered by Katrina were in the main poor and black.

The entire nation, he said, saw the poverty that "has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America." Polls show that black Americans are far angrier and more skeptical than whites about the administration's actions since the storm. Mr. Bush's words could begin a much-needed healing process. But that will happen only if they are followed by deeds that are as principled, disciplined and ambitious as Mr. Bush's speech.

Bush's Buffeted Leadership (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann, Staff Writer

The Christian Science Monitor, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON - As New Orleans and the devastated Gulf Coast region look ahead to rebuilding and renewal, so, too, President Bush is digging out from the political damage hurricane Katrina has wreaked on his presidency.

The biggest blow to Bush, personally, may be to his image as a leader - the core quality that gave him high marks for his handling of 9/11 and, eventually, helped him win a second term.

As he ran for reelection last year, polls consistently showed a majority of the public credited him for leadership, even as they disagreed with him on many issues. Now, for the first time, less than half the public (49 percent) say he has "strong leadership qualities," down from 63 percent last year, according to a Newsweek poll last week.

DOJ_NMG_0006278

Bush's planned prime-time address to the nation Thursday night, to be delivered from New Orleans, will mark the latest in a series of steps aimed at moving away from the early finger-pointing and appearance of detachment, and toward a can-do approach.

The president was to announce an unprecedented federal commitment to rebuilding the flood zone, with a price tag that aides say could top $200 billion. And Friday Bush will make remarks at Washington's National Cathedral as part of his proclaimed National Day of Prayer and Remembrance for the Victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Both speeches follow the president's "buck stops here" moment on Tuesday, when he declared, "To the extent the federal government didn't fully do its job right, I take responsibility."

One lesson for Bush, says presidential scholar Martha Joynt Kumar, is "that [you] can get it right as a leader for four years, and that doesn't guarantee you're going to continue to get it right.

"You have to be poised on your toes, and you just can't get comfortable with the system you have," says Professor Kumar, a senior fellow at the Academy of Leadership at the University of Maryland. "Different conditions can come up that test your system. [Katrina] certainly tested it in a different way."

A hallmark of Bush's system is planning, in contrast with President Clinton's more chaotic style that nevertheless lent itself to sharp pivots in focus. The day after Katrina hit, Bush stuck with his plan to deliver a speech in San Diego marking the anniversary of VJ Day - and seeking to boost support for the Iraq war - before cutting his vacation short and heading back to Washington the next day.

"This man is an incredible planner," says Carolyn Thompson, a Chicago-based training consultant and co-author of a book on Bush's leadership. "He is not a detail person, but he surrounds himself with people who gather details and feed them to him.... Once everything's in place, then they go."

She's withholding judgment on the White House's initial response to Katrina, stressing that "this is a very closed-mouthed White House" and that, with time, more may be learned about the factors that fed into a stretch that, for now, "looks ugly."

What is known is that Bush treasures his time at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, and that while he has all the access to aides and information there that he would have in Washington, the human dynamic is different. Getting information from multiperson videoconferences, the system in Crawford, is different from the way it works at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, where a range of people can come through and make their points in meetings.

"You can get ahead of things a little better at the White House," says Professor Kumar, who often observes White House press operations in person.

Bush is also famous for not paying close attention to media reports, another point that may have delayed a full understanding of the magnitude of Gulf Coast devastation, and the 9/11-level of leadership required.

Even after arriving in the region, comments such as those making light of youthful time spent there and his "attaboy" gesture to Michael Brown, now resigned head as head of federal emergency management, showed he was still behind the curve.

By this week, when Bush made his qualified statement of responsibility - a rare moment for a president who has been loath to admit any failings - analysts agreed that he finally had it right. Bush's taking of responsibility "suggests he's finding his voice," says Fred Greenstein, a presidential scholar and professor emeritus at Princeton University.

Evacuees Find Comfort And Encouragement In Speech (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

HOUMA, La., Sept. 15 - Evacuees at a shelter here said they took comfort Thursday night from both the substance and the symbolism of the speech President Bush gave in the city many of them had fled.

When Mr. Bush talked about breaking the cycle of poverty and increasing the rate of home ownership on the Gulf Coast, one evacuee shouted, "Thank you! Thank you!" Others at the shelter, at the civic center in Houma, a small city southwest of New Orleans, nodded in approval at several points during the speech.

"I feel very encouraged because he's accepted responsibility, and in doing that, I feel that he has stepped up to the plate," said Evelyn Green, 58, a retired health care worker from the New Orleans area. "He touched me. I know now he's going to be there to help us rebuild our cities and towns. I take him at his word. I want to see everything he said tonight fulfilled."

Another evacuee, Muhammad Abdullah Ali, a 52-year-old security officer from New Orleans, said: "I feel that now he's going to take control and do the best he can. I felt good about the speech. It was a good speech. Now I want to see some action."

Others said they appreciated Mr. Bush's specific references to New Orleans culture and were glad to see the president speaking from Jackson Square, a familiar and comforting image from home.

DOJ_NMG_0006279

The president's comments were greeted with praise from local officials, including Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat.

"Louisiana's people are strong, optimistic and determined to rebuild this great region," Ms. Blanco said, "but we cannot do it without the resources of our nation and our government. I take the president at his word when he says those resources will be there when we need them."

Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, described Mr. Bush's proposals as "innovative and bold" and said: "The president picked a very inspiring spot to make this speech. The image is worth many words in terms of what Jackson Square and the cathedral mean to New Orleans and what New Orleans means to the nation."

But the Rev. Jesse Jackson said that even the president's nod to poverty and race issues would have to be matched by actions.

"I thought there was a sense of urgency," Mr. Jackson said about the speech. "I think he backed into the war on poverty, and touched on the issues of race and poverty and class obliquely, which is new for him."

Bush Calls For Massive Rebuilding (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon, Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

President Bush promised a massive federal effort aimed at rebuilding lives, levees and communities on the Gulf Coast and said such large disasters call for greater federal authority, including a bigger role for the armed forces.

Mr. Bush, in a hopeful and sympathetic speech crafted at least in part to revive his political fortunes, sought to reassure Americans about the region's future in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, as well as the nation's own readiness for another disaster.

"Tonight I ... offer this pledge to the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes -- we will stay as long as it takes -- to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives," Mr. Bush said, standing before St. Louis Cathedral in the city's French Quarter. "And all who question the future of the Crescent City need to know: There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again."

Mr. Bush also laid out a range of initiatives to start the rebuilding process. They include a Gulf Opportunity Zone to foster job creation through tax breaks and small-business loans in the affected region; Worker Recovery Accounts to provide as much as $5,000 to pay for job training, education and child care for evacuees who need help finding work; and an Urban Homesteading Act that would give low-income people federally owned land through a lottery, in return for their pledges to build homes on it. He also called for strengthening the system of levees that protects New Orleans, much of which sits below sea level.

The president set himself a difficult balancing act, promising that his administration will do whatever necessary to rebuild, while also seeking to reassure both those on the Gulf Coast and his conservative allies that Washington won't dictate all the details of reconstruction or simply throw money at the problem.

He pledged a "close partnership" with the affected states as well as the city of New Orleans. He said federal funds will cover the "great majority" of the cost of rebuilding public roads, bridges, schools and water systems. But he also promised "a team of inspector generals" to review all expenditures, some steps of which already have been taken.

Mr. Bush made one of his most sweeping acknowledgments that the government's disaster response was lacking, saying that "the system, at every level of government was not well coordinated, and was overwhelmed in the first few days." He said that "a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces."

That announcement could mean a bigger role for the military in homeland defense, an idea that has encountered some resistance in military circles especially at a time when active-duty troops are stretched by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The speech left open the question of whether the federal government will offer to pay for private-property owners' losses in a region where many went without flood insurance. Other details unresolved were whether the administration will appoint a rebuilding "czar" with sweeping authority to help coordinate the effort. The scope of such an enterprise will likely involve enormous expense, but Mr. Bush offered no cost estimates or steps his administration would take to pay for it.

Democratic congressional leaders criticized Mr. Bush's plan for being long on comforting words, but short on action. They called for a "Marshall Plan" to "help families get back on their feet, back into homes and back on the job," according to a statement by Senate leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

Mr. Bush is hoping his long-term response to Katrina will shore up his standing with many Americans who appear to be losing confidence in his leadership. One such group is African-Americans, who have seen images of fellow blacks suffering due to poor initial emergency planning and management.

Last night Mr. Bush said he hoped his recovery initiatives would leave poor people better off than they were before the storm. "Let us restore all that we have cherished from yesterday, and let us rise above the legacy of inequality," he said. He also emphasized the need for people in the region to get preference for new jobs created by the recovery effort.

The administration hopes a well-organized and effective reconstruction effort will go a long way to re-establishing the president's diminished credibility as a leader with voters generally. In other steps aimed at improving readiness, he said cities "must have clear and up-to-date plans for responding" to disasters.

The president's speech came as Congress approved legislation advancing $6.2 billion in federal funds to ease the welfare crunch for states as homeless families from the storm are relocated. And Republicans leaders said a deal had been reached on a $6 billion to $7 billion tax-relief package for Katrina's survivors. The agreement, expected to go to the White House next week, would relax tax rules on corporate deductions to spur business donations and make it easier for households to claim tax breaks on their personal casualty losses. Families seeking to rebuild would be permitted to withdraw as much as $100,000 from retirement accounts without the customary penalties over the next year.

Bush Promises A Massive Rebuilding Of Gulf Coast (LAT)

By Edwin Chen And Mary Curtius, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — President Bush, declaring that the federal government had rebounded from its early failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina, promised Thursday to lead an ambitious rebuilding program — "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen" — on behalf of a battered Gulf Coast region that has seen hundreds of lives lost and tens of thousands of homes and jobs washed away.

In a prime-time address from this city's storied French Quarter, where once-bustling streets were desolate, Bush said Washington would provide most of the funding for a combined federal, state and local program to resurrect New Orleans and rebuild stricken regions of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives," Bush said.

Bush did not estimate a cost for reconstruction, but budget analysts predicted it would reach $200 billion — roughly the same amount spent on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan combined, and about double the inflation-adjusted cost of the Marshall Plan, which rebuilt Europe after World War II.

He called on Congress to pass an Urban Homesteading Act to let the poor build homes on federal property that would be distributed by lottery. He proposed a Gulf Opportunity Zone offering tax incentives and loan guarantees for small businesses.

The president said evacuees should be given up to $5,000 for training, child care and transportation to find new jobs.

Bush also called for faith-based organizations to join the rebuilding effort.

Conservatives have long favored some of the proposals as alternatives to conventional government programs.

It was unclear how much of the rebuilding task Bush's proposals would address. At least 350,000 replacement housing units are estimated to be needed, for example, but municipal governments' existing homesteading programs have created only a few thousand units of housing. Habitat for Humanity, which Bush cited as one group that could help low-income people build homes on federal lots, last year put up 5,455 units.

The president addressed some of the most sensitive issues since the hurricane: doubts about the federal government's ability to respond to future disasters including terrorist attacks, and the "deep, persistent poverty" revealed by television coverage of residents, most of them black, unable to flee the floodwaters in New Orleans.

He promised to address both problems.

"Poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination," he said, and the rebuilding effort will aim to "rise above the legacy of inequality. When the streets are rebuilt, there should be many new businesses, including minority-owned businesses, along those streets."

He said more residents should own, rather than rent, the new housing, a theme Bush has used in the past before minority audiences.

The president promised to uncover "all the facts" about the government's response to the crisis and directed cities to improve emergency plans for natural disasters, disease outbreaks and terrorist attacks.

"Four years after the frightening experience of Sept. 11, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency," he said. "When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

The 22-minute nationally televised address was the president's most determined effort yet to counteract widespread criticism of the initial response by officials at all levels of government to a natural disaster that killed hundreds of people, left several hundred thousand homeless and destroyed billions of dollars' worth of property. He wore no jacket or tie and talked directly to a television camera, with the historic St. Louis Cathedral and a statue of Andrew Jackson behind him.

The speech also represented an attempt to restore the president's credibility at a time when his approval ratings had fallen to new lows. The Katrina crisis appears to have eroded support for the fight against terrorism, the Iraq war effort and the president's second-term domestic policy initiatives.

Bush's advisors cast the speech as a bold gesture that might be a turning point for both the president and the institutions of government sullied by Katrina's floodwaters.

Their hopes were buoyed by positive developments in New Orleans, including an announcement by Mayor C. Ray Nagin that businesses in some parts of the city would reopen this weekend and that evacuated residents could begin returning to their homes.

Some African American leaders said several of the president's proposals sounded good but were difficult to judge because details were missing.

"Given that 80% of the people in the crisis were people of color, we want the proposals to be very responsive to the needs of people of color," said NAACP President Bruce S. Gordon. "That has to be precise."

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said he was disappointed by the lack of specifics.

Republicans praised Bush for being contrite and setting out a vision of recovery.

Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who had been sharply critical of the government's initial response to the hurricane, said Bush had provided the right response by conceding fault and accepting responsibility.

"We're taught as young kids: Acknowledge your mistakes, admit your lies," Foley said. "It's cathartic. That's what I think the speech did. He didn't just try to blame someone else."

Democratic leaders said Bush's assurances were not enough.

"The victims of Hurricane Katrina don't need just words, they need a plan that will lead the way in recovery, rebuilding and renewal," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) in a joint statement.

Bush began his address with remarks directed at Gulf Coast residents driven from their homes by Katrina. He offered America's sympathy and vowed a speedy recovery effort in which all levels of government would participate.

"You need to know that our whole nation cares about you, and in the journey ahead you are not alone," he said.

Yet even as he promised a thorough investigation of the government's initial response to the hurricane, which has been widely characterized as slow and poorly coordinated, Bush seemed somewhat defensive.

"It was not a normal hurricane, and the normal disaster relief system was not equal to it," he said. "The storm involved a massive flood, a major supply and security operation, and an evacuation order affecting more than a million people."

Speaking from historic Jackson Square in the heart of the French Quarter, Bush put to rest any doubts about the wisdom of rebuilding New Orleans, much of which lies below sea level. "Protecting a city that sits lower than the water around it is not easy, but it can and has been done," he said.

"There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again," he said.

Bush said federal funds would "cover the majority of the cost" of repairing public infrastructure, such as roads, bridges, schools and water systems. He also assured residents that state and local officials would have the primary role in planning their futures, and he promised to deploy "a team of inspectors general" to make sure the money was spent wisely.

The president did not put a price tag on the package of housing, education, healthcare and job assistance. Analysts have said the $62 billion appropriated by Congress is likely to run out this month.

In his remarks, Bush signaled he might seek a new role in domestic emergencies for U.S. armed forces, which played a crucial role in helping supply and secure the Gulf Coast.

"It is now clear that a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces, the institution of our government most capable of massive logistical operations on a moment's notice," Bush said.

Although the president did not provide details, White House officials have said the administration would review whether to expand the president's power to send troops into disaster areas and to assign them law enforcement duties.

Others have proposed more drastic changes. Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) asked the Pentagon this week to review the Posse Comitatus Act, which prohibits active-duty U.S. troops from carrying out law enforcement missions within the United States.

Bush's address came at a critical point in his presidency, largely a result of what Washington-based pollster Andrew Kohut called "a summer's worth of bad news" — soaring gas prices, escalating violence in Iraq and, finally, Katrina.

Bush has seen his job approval ratings plummet to the lowest level of his presidency, fueling speculation about his ability to govern effectively in his remaining 3 1/3 years. Many of Bush's key initiatives — restructuring Social Security, permanently eliminating the estate tax, restructuring the tax code — were facing declining odds even before Katrina devastated much of the Gulf Coast and distracted Republican leaders in Washington from their agenda to approve tens of billions in unanticipated spending.

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense, an independent watchdog group that monitors pork-barrel spending in Congress, expressed disappointment that Bush had neither attached a price tag to his rebuilding commitment nor offered to offset the emergency spending with budget cuts.

"The lack of a spending plan makes this speech appear to be more about political damage control than disaster relief," Ellis said. "The bottom line is, we can't afford to simply hand over the keys to the Treasury."

Bush delivered his address at the conclusion of his fourth visit to the hurricane-devastated region. On his way to New Orleans, he stopped in Mississippi, where he toured a Pascagoula oil refinery knocked out of commission by Katrina.

After returning to Washington early this morning, Bush was to participate in a National Day of Prayer and Remembrance for hurricane victims at the National Cathedral.

President Chooses A Serene Spot To Frame His Message (LAT)

By Paul Brownfield, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

The set piece was in sharp contrast to the backdrop that TV reporters and anchors have been using in the last few weeks, their dispatches filed from the edge of floodwaters and ruined homes, from shelters where lives had been turned upside down.

President Bush's address Thursday night, by contrast, was held in a Jackson Square lighted up like Disneyland, the president framed before the statue of Andrew Jackson and St. Louis Cathedral in the background.

It was Bush striking a new note, one that Americans could be excused for finding strange. We have been seeing only devastation on our screens, access to a fresh hell giving TV personalities and journalists instant dramatic heft.

It's where we've been seeing Diane Sawyer on "Good Morning America," Oprah on "Oprah" and Anderson Cooper on CNN. Several weeks of news organizations hunting for misery and devastation left the president searching for a counter-image.

So the spooky placidity of Jackson Square, on what conveyed an otherwise peaceful evening in New Orleans, seemed an oddly appropriate choice for a president who throughout this crisis has been unable to halt the image of a leader who has been neither here nor there.

The speech seemed to float in the same kind of limbo that the setting provided — was the point to allay our fears or take responsibility for the federal government's stumbling response?

Introducing the president, ABC News' Ted Koppel noted dryly that the White House was supplying the electricity used to light the stage. Of Bush's previous visits to the region, some via fly-overs, Koppel said: "It struck some people as literally and figuratively a little too removed from what was happening on the ground."

To be sure, "You really have to be here" has been the overarching theme of a rehabilitated television news business, anchors confessing to getting up-close-and-personal with the story, which has been another way of saying they're up-close-and-personal with Americans' pain.

"When I'm not there, I think about it. When I'm there, I'm consumed by it. I'll admit that … I plan to commute back and forth to this story for the foreseeable future," NBC "Nightly News" anchor Brian Williams told the Philadelphia Inquirer this week.

Bush, you thought, could have given this speech from the Oval Office, but he came to stake his own version of being there. And he chose the only kind of postcard left on the racks — the impossibly serene one.

Bush Pledges Federal Role In Rebuilding Gulf Coast (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006283

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 - President Bush called Thursday night for the rebuilding of the devastated Gulf Coast through the creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone, a government enterprise that he said would provide help on taxes, housing, education and job training for the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"The work that has begun in the Gulf Coast region will be one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen," Mr. Bush said in remarks delivered in Jackson Square against the brightly lighted backdrop of St. Louis Cathedral, a symbol of the heart and soul of New Orleans for almost three centuries.

Mr. Bush delivered his speech, carried live by the major television networks, in the middle of the city's darkened French Quarter, where Army troops from the 82nd Airborne Division were on patrol. The Bush White House, well practiced in the art of presidential stagecraft, provided its own generators for the lighting and communications equipment that beamed Mr. Bush's remarks to the nation.

"And tonight I also offer this pledge of the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives," Mr. Bush said.

The mayor of New Orleans announced Thursday that residents and business owners could return to some parts of the city during daylight.

Mr. Bush ordered an immediate review of emergency plans for all cities, and said there was a need for greater federal authority and a broader role for armed forces in certain emergencies. He called for a federal government assessment of his administration's response to the storm and said that he would work with both parties in Congress in an investigation of what went wrong.

"This government will learn the lessons of Hurricane Katrina," Mr. Bush said.

The president did not, however, embrace calls for an independent commission to investigate the disaster.

White House officials viewed the speech as the culmination of a pivotal week in which Mr. Bush tried to turn around his image as a chief executive slow to respond to the greatest natural disaster in American history. The speech was meant to portray Mr. Bush as a forceful leader in control of the crisis and sympathetic to the people in the region.

"Tonight, so many victims of the hurricane and flood are far from home and friends and familiar things," Mr. Bush said. "You need to know that our whole nation cares about you, and in the journey ahead you are not alone. To all who carry a burden, I extend the deepest sympathy of our country."

Mr. Bush, dressed uncharacteristically in shirt-sleeves for a formal national address, said that the Gulf Opportunity Zone, encompassing Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, would provide tax incentives and loans for small businesses, including, he pointed out, minority-owned enterprises. Mr. Bush also said the federal government would provide evacuees with accounts of up to $5,000 that they could use for job training and education.

In addition, he asked Congress to pass what he called an Urban Homesteading Act, which would provide building sites on federal land through a lottery to low-income citizens, free of charge. In return, Mr. Bush said, residents would promise to build on the lots, with either a mortgage or help from a charitable organization like Habitat for Humanity.

Mr. Bush spoke after he was driven through empty, pitch-black streets, where members of the 82nd Airborne stood on corners in the darkness saluting the motorcade.

"I am speaking to you from the city of New Orleans, nearly empty, still partly under water and waiting for life and hope to return," Mr. Bush said from a lectern set up in the grass and hidden behind camouflage netting in Jackson Square.

In the aftermath of the storm, Mr. Bush said, "we have seen fellow citizens left stunned and uprooted searching for loved ones, and grieving for the dead and looking for meaning in a tragedy that seems so blind and random."

In his fourth trip to the region since the storm, Mr. Bush directly addressed the suffering of the largely poor, black evacuees at the New Orleans Superdome and convention center: "We have also witnessed the kind of desperation no citizen of this great and generous nation should ever have to know - fellow Americans calling out for food and water, vulnerable people left at the mercy of criminals who had no mercy and the bodies of the dead lying uncovered and untended in the street."

The president said state and local officials would have the primary role in planning for reconstruction, and in changing zoning laws and building codes. He listed many of the relief efforts now under way, including the registration of evacuees and retraining for workers.

Mr. Bush also tackled the tough issues of race and poverty that have been the source of enormous criticism and caused even Republicans to question the administration's commitment: "As all of us saw on television, there is also some deep, persistent poverty in this region as well. And that poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America. We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action. So let us restore all that we have cherished from yesterday, and let us rise above the legacy of inequality."

Mr. Bush did not offer cost estimates for his proposals on Thursday night, but they were drawn from the kind of experiments - with "opportunity zones" and tax incentives - that Republicans have greatly preferred to huge federal spending efforts. The president seemed to try to balance a comprehensive government plan with an assurance that Washington would back away and allow Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama - and the city of New Orleans - to decide how to rebuild.

"That is our vision of the future, in this city and beyond: We will not just rebuild, we will build higher and better," he promised.

Aside from the opportunity zone, Mr. Bush also proposed "worker recovery accounts" of up to $5,000 that evacuees could use for job training and education. The proposal sounds much like the kinds of accounts set up after the passage of the North America Free Trade Agreement in the early 1990's to help retrain workers displaced by foreign competition, a program that met with mixed reviews.

But in his speech, Mr. Bush also left some of the most controversial ideas unmentioned. His words seemed to imply that New Orleans neighborhoods would be rebuilt on the same sites that were flooded, rather than letting that land return to its original state, as wetlands that could provide a relief valve in the case of a future flood. Many of the most vulnerable neighborhoods were largely occupied by the city's poorest, and relocating those neighborhoods opened issues that one White House official said today "are not for us to deal with."

"Protecting a city that sits lower than the water around it is not easy," Mr. Bush said, "but it can and has been done."

He added: "And all who question the future of the Crescent City need to know: There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again."

The federal government, Mr. Bush said, will undertake a "close partnership" with Mississippi and Louisiana, with New Orleans and other Gulf Coast cities so they can rebuild in a "sensible, well-planned way." He said the federal government will cover the majority of the costs of rebuilding the infrastructure in the disaster zone, from roads and bridges to schools and water systems.

The president said he expected the work to be done quickly, and that taxpayers would expect it to be performed "honestly and wisely." He promised to have a team of inspectors reviewing all expenditures.

But many Republicans predicted that the costs could run as high or higher than the war in Iraq, up to $200 billion, and noted that the White House had said $51.8 billion in emergency federal funds just approved by Congress, on top of an earlier $10 billion, would last for just a few weeks. Mr. Bush did not name a lead rebuilding official in the speech, as some White House officials are urging, and Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, did not rule out the naming of such an official at a later date. Gen. Tommy Franks, who commanded forces in Afghanistan and Iraq, and John F. Welch Jr., the former chief executive of General Electric, are names often mentioned by Republicans as possibilities.

The president's proposal for an opportunity zone draws on more than a decade of federal experience with offering tax credits and other incentives for investment in economically depressed areas.

In 2002, the Bush administration selected New Orleans as a renewal community, eligible to share in billions of dollars worth of federal tax incentives intended to stimulate job growth and economic development. Last October, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana said the program had helped create jobs and must expand across the Delta.

Mr. Bush's proposal goes further. He would provide tax breaks, loans and loan guarantees to encourage businesses to invest in areas hit by the hurricane.

The Government Accountability Office, an investigative arm of Congress, said last year that federal agencies did not collect the data needed to assess the existing program or to show how the tax benefits had been used.

The president's comments were met with praise from local officials, including Ms. Blanco, who along with other local officials listened to Mr. Bush's speech from a bench in Jackson Square.

"Louisiana's people are strong, optimistic and determined to rebuild this great region, but we cannot do it without the resources of our nation and our government," she said. "I take the president at his word when he says those resources will be there when we need them."

Bullhorn Or Not, Bush Aims For A Boost Speech Is Chance To Change Minds, But This Isn't 9/11 (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his advisers never said publicly that they thought he needed another “bullhorn moment” like his spontaneous post-9/11 rallying cry at Ground Zero, but they knew Thursday's speech about Hurricane Katrina recovery was crucial.

The dramatic backdrop, the prime-time scheduling and Bush's emphatic pledge to use all the federal government's power to rebuild signaled that a great deal was at stake. “We will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes,” Bush said.

But his big ideas — proposals for tax and loan incentives for businesses, cash to help evacuees find jobs and free federal land for homes — were ignored in statements by Democrats in Congress after Bush spoke.

Martin Kaplan, associate dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Southern California, called the initiatives "good use of government from a guy who's demonized it these last five years."

Ken Khachigian, who worked for Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan, called the speech a blend "of salve and solutions" that was appropriately low-key and included sympathy and "a message of hope."

Bush needed some hope himself. Since the sluggish initial response to the hurricane, polls have shown a decline of confidence in his leadership. That could undercut the U.S. mission in Iraq, sideline his domestic agenda and diminish his effectiveness through his remaining years in office.

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll released this week found that 52% of Americans consider Bush a strong and decisive leader — the lowest rating of his presidency on those characteristics.

Bush's speech was part of a strategy that has included four trips to the region, his statement Tuesday taking responsibility for problems and unprecedented federal spending on recovery. He did not, however, name a "czar" to oversee reconstruction.

Bush has spoken in prime-time at key moments, including:

·On July 19, he said he was nominating Judge John Roberts to the Supreme Court.

·On June 28, he delivered an update on Iraq from Fort Bragg in California.

·On the first anniversary of 9/11, he spoke at Ellis Island, the Statue of Liberty behind him.

The New Orleans speech was most reminiscent of that one. In the 2002 speech, Bush spoke of pain and healing and set the stage for another defining event, the war with Iraq that began six months later. "America has entered a great struggle that tests our strength," he said then.

Thursday's speech also was intended to be a pivot point for Bush, shifting attention from mistakes to a new national challenge. "All Americans are needed in this common effort," he said.

Unlike in the aftermath of 9/11, there are few signs now of a pause in political partisanship, and Bush's plea for unity seems unlikely to end criticism. "No American doubts that New Orleans will rise again, they doubt the competence and commitment of this administration," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass.

Democrats said it's too late for Bush to regain the aura of decisiveness that sustained him in other crises. "The fundamental positive feelings the American people had for him are gone," said Joe Lockhart, a former press secretary for President Clinton.

Kaplan said this speech couldn't replicate the bullhorn moment, when Bush vowed payback for terrorists. "It was seen by everyone as authentic, genuine and spontaneous," Kaplan said, but on Thursday, "the subtext — please like me again — was louder than the text."

Bush can't solve his problems with one speech, said Republican pollster Steve Kinney. But Bush is again showing "his ability to connect with people's hearts."

Khachigian said Clinton's rebound after his 1998 impeachment showed that predictions of political ruin can be wrong. "Presidents tend to get all the burden on disasters like this," he said. "They also get all the benefit when recovery takes place."

A Bid To Repair A Presidency (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

The main text of President Bush's nationally televised address last night was the rebuilding of New Orleans and the Gulf Coast, but the clear subtext was the rebuilding of a presidency that is now at its lowest point ever, confronted by huge and simultaneous challenges at home and abroad -- and facing a country divided along partisan and racial lines.

Hurricane Katrina struck at the core of Bush's presidency by undermining the central assertion of his reelection campaign, that he was a strong and decisive leader who could keep the country safe in a crisis. Never again will the White House be able to point to his often-praised performance after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, without skeptics recalling the fumbling and slow-off-the-mark response of his administration after the hurricane and the flooding in New Orleans.

His response to these criticisms last night was a speech largely shorn of soaring rhetoric and stirring turns of phrase of the kind that marked his efforts to rally the country after the terrorist attacks. Instead, as if recognizing that his own road back will be one marked by steady but small steps, he spoke with workmanlike focus, spelling out the details of what has been done and will be done to help those displaced by the storm.

Katrina has added an enormous new burden to a presidency already bending under the stresses of public dissatisfaction with Bush's policies in Iraq and growing anger over rising gas prices. Bush's objective last night was to set out a strategy and commitment for recovery along the Gulf Coast. But the critical question is whether the damage will limit his ability to govern effectively in the remaining 40 months of his presidency and whether he will successfully rebuild the Gulf Coast and Iraq, let alone win approval for other major initiatives on taxes and Social Security.

In again taking responsibility for the federal government's failures, Bush signaled last night that the White House has decided not to contest the widespread perceptions that his administration failed in the early days of the crisis. By embracing those criticisms, they hope to make the issue a sideshow that will play out sometime in the future. Instead, after a halting start, the White House appears intently focused on demonstrating the president's capacity to manage the huge rebuilding effort ahead.

Bush's advisers believe that, despite the partisan finger-pointing over what happened, most Americans are not looking back and will judge the president on what happens going forward. But as Iraq has shown over the past two years, the facts on the ground shape public confidence in the president more than words or promises.

There is nothing certain about the success he hopes to demonstrate. The rebuilding at Ground Zero in New York has taken four years, and although the work in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast will begin almost immediately, the scope of the reconstruction virtually guarantees debates and delays that could sap public patience. Already there are signs of a brewing battle between business and government elites and organizers working with those displaced over whose voices will be heard in shaping the reconstruction.

Second-term slumps hit every reelected president, but often they come later than this one. Bush has little time to waste to rejuvenate his governing capacity, given the reality that lame-duck status awaits him in the not-too-distant future. But just as it will take time to rebuild New Orleans and the Gulf Coast, it may take many months for Bush to rebound from what now troubles his presidency. Given the added burdens of Iraq and the economy, the president's road to recovery "will be longer and more difficult," said Ross K. Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University.

The road back will also be contentious. Republicans and Democrats are at swords' points over who should investigate what happened -- a congressional committee as the GOP favors or an independent investigation proposed by the Democrats.

The president also may face opposition to his proposal to give the federal government and the U.S. military greater authority in a time of such disaster. There will be no hesitancy on either side to spend what it takes to rebuild -- Bush last night envisioned one of the largest reconstruction efforts in history -- but already sharp differences are emerging over the policies that animate that rebuilding.

The policies Bush outlined last night bear the distinctive stamp of a conservative president, a hallmark of an executive who has never shrunk from seeking to implement a right-leaning agenda even in the face of a divided country. They are long on tax relief and business grants and loans, and focused on entrepreneurial ideas. Bush already has drawn fire from Democrats for suspending the law that requires contractors to pay prevailing wages on federal projects in the regions, and there will be a battle over the proposal to provide private and parochial school vouchers to children of displaced families.

At other points in his presidency, Bush was strong enough to intimidate and often defeat his Democratic opponents. Although the Democrats remain relatively weak, Bush's own problems have emboldened them to challenge him at every turn and to believe they are better equipped to deal with the challenges in housing, education, health care and urban poverty that the hurricane and flooding have produced. Competing visions of how the federal government should respond will produce a vigorous debate -- far from the united response to 9/11.

The public appears to have little patience with partisan bickering right now, which complicates the Democrats' effort to challenge Bush, but every recent poll indicates the public knows who controls both the White House and the Congress, and Republicans likely will pay a greater price in next year's midterm elections for any perceived failures by Bush or the federal government.

Among the most worrisome elements of the aftermath of Katrina to the administration is the vast racial divide that has opened up over the federal government's response, with an overwhelming majority of African Americans believing the slow reaction was racially motivated and a similarly large majority of whites saying race was not the reason.

Bush and his advisers have denied there was any racial motivation in the government's response, but they know there will be a continuing political cost if they do not turn those perceptions around. The racial gulf threatens not only the administration's hope of slowly attracting more black support at the polls, but also the fabric of an already divided society. "It is something that all leaders across the country need to engage in, and this president will," said a senior administration official.

The president directly addressed the racial divide last night, noting that the Gulf Coast is afflicted with "deep, persistent poverty" and saying that poverty "has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which has cut off generations from the opportunity of America." He pledged bold action to "rise above the legacy of inequality."

For those who doubt Bush's ability to manage multiple challenges, administration officials would point to his nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. as the next chief justice of the United States, which appears to be moving easily through the Senate.

But what confronts him in the Gulf Coast and Iraq is far more complex. His speech last night was only the beginning of the effort to repair his storm-damaged presidency. He has proved in the past his commitment to stay the course once he sets it. The question is whether, in his weakened condition, he can continue to persuade the country to follow.

Bush's Approval At Lowest Level Yet (WT)

By James G. Lakely

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

President Bush's approval has slipped in the polls since the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina, but his speech last night from the devastated Gulf Coast promised an unprecedented federal spending effort and may mark the beginning of a political turnaround.

A Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll released yesterday put Mr. Bush's job-approval rating at 41 percent, the lowest level of his presidency. It was the first time that more than half of the poll's respondents -- 51 percent -- gave Mr. Bush poor marks.

Democratic political consultant Scott Segal, however, thinks the political storm soon will blow over, and the president will be helped by performances of New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, both Democrats.

"While there is no question that the administration is doing a better job of putting a competent face on recovery activities, they have also benefited from a political windfall," Mr. Segal said. "The New Orleans mayor and the governor of Louisiana have seemed intent on criticizing each other, which leaves a clearer path for the president."

The Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll supports that view, showing that 42 percent of respondents thought the state and local governments were most responsible for the problems responding to the hurricane. Just 29 percent blamed the federal government, and 19 percent blamed both.

Republican political consultant Bob Moran said Hurricane Katrina "will not have a national impact 14 months from now" in midterm congressional elections, largely seen as much a referendum on the sitting president as on Congress.

"The Democrats are acting out of weakness and not strength here. They are trying to shift blame away from the failure of local Democrats," Mr. Moran said.

Nonetheless, Mr. Bush publicly took responsibility for the problems, accepted the resignation of Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) Director Michael D. Brown and put new people in charge of the federal efforts on the ground.

Democrats, however, continue to exploit what they see as Mr. Bush's vulnerability on the issue, releasing critical statements almost daily and calling for an independent commission to study the administration's slow response to the disaster.

The liberal Campaign for America's Future is trying to tie the Republican majority in Congress to the performance of the Bush administration, saying the slow reaction to the hurricane proves "the failure of the radical, conservative attack on government."

"The president is claiming responsibility for the failure, but this wasn't just a failure to handle one natural disaster," said Roger Hickey, co-director of the think tank. "This debacle shows the failure of three decades of conservative, anti-government philosophy."

Mr. Segal said there are "many hard questions for administration officials to answer" about the recovery effort, but fears Democrats might be overplaying their political hand.

"The tone Democrats strike must be constructive and balanced, and not simply strident," he said.

Amid The Ruins, A President Tries To Reconstruct His Image, Too (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - George W. Bush, whose standing for the last four years has rested primarily on issues of war and peace, introduced himself to the nation on Thursday night in an unfamiliar and somewhat uncomfortable new role: domestic president.

The violence of Hurricane Katrina and his faltering response to it have left to Mr. Bush the task not just of physically rebuilding a swath of the United States, but also of addressing issues like poverty and racial inequality that were exposed in such raw form by the storm.

The challenge would be immense for any president, but is especially so for Mr. Bush. He is scrambling to assure a shaken, angry nation not only that is he up to the task but also that he understands how much it disturbed Americans to see their fellow citizens suffering and their government responding so ineffectually.

So for nearly 30 minutes, he stood in a largely lifeless New Orleans and, to recast his presidency in response to one of the nation's most devastating disasters, sought to show that he understands the suffering. He spoke of housing and health care and job training. He reached with rhetorical confidence for the uplifting theme that out of tragedy can emerge a better society, and he groped for what he lost in the wind and water more than two weeks ago: his well-cultivated image as a strong leader.

It was not the president's most stirring speech, but it conveyed a sense of command far more than his off-key efforts in the days immediately after the storm, when he often seemed more interested in bucking up government officials than in addressing the dire situation confronting hundreds of thousands of displaced and desperate people.

But if the speech helped him clear his first hurdle by projecting the aura of a president at the controls, it probably did not, by itself, get him over a second: his need to erase or at least blur the image of a White House that was unresponsive to the plight of some of the country's most vulnerable citizens and failed to manage the government competently.

Whether he can put a floor under his falling poll numbers, restore his political authority and move ahead with his agenda will determine not just the course of his second term but the strength of his party, which by virtue of having controlled both the White House and the Congress for more than five years has trouble credibly pinning the blame elsewhere.

"He was giving a speech as if the nation were disheartened and worried and had lost its spirit, but that's not what people were thinking," said Mickey Edwards, a former Republican congressman from Oklahoma. "They were thinking, why did the government screw up?"

To those storm victims in need of immediate help and to those who face the continued upheaval of their lives for weeks or months or longer, he offered an expansive government safety net of specific programs, from paying the costs of reuniting families to a commitment to moving everyone out of shelters into housing by mid-October. Doing so marked a distinct shift for a president whose perceived hostility or indifference to government's role in social welfare programs - manifested in budgets that have sought to cut such programs or curtail them - has long been a flash point in his relationship with poor and minority voters.

But if this was big government, it was at least in part on Mr. Bush's ideological terms: federal reimbursement to allow displaced students to attend private and parochial schools, tax-free business zones, a call for charitable and religious groups to continue with relief work. Having no choice but to open the fiscal floodgates, he sought to reassure nervous conservatives that he would guard against fraud and waste.

When it came to the issues hardest to address and most in need of sustained commitment, new ideas and risk-taking leadership - the gap between rich and poor, its causes and consequences, its racial components - he was less effective.

"We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action," he said.

Yet he spoke of "deep, persistent poverty" as something the nation had seen on television rather than as a condition that many citizens had been living in for generations. He defined the problem as regional rather than national in scope, and offered only regional rather than national solutions.

"The reconstruction, massive as it is, is really the easy part," said Bruce Reed, president of the Democratic Leadership Council, an organization of centrist Democrats. "Rebuilding confidence, especially among the poor and vulnerable, is going to be extraordinarily difficult."

In dealing with the more concrete aspects of the job ahead, Mr. Bush slipped comfortably into the language that he has used as commander in chief to comfort and exhort the nation as it has waged war, hailing those Americans who have "served and sacrificed" and vowing that the government "will stay as long as it takes" to get the job done, an echo, almost word for word, of his formulation for how long the United States will remain in Iraq.

The president forthrightly linked the failures in response to the storm to a vulnerability to a terrorist attack and said he wanted to know "all the facts" about what had gone wrong.

Mr. Bush called for unity in tackling the problems. But with only a camera before him, and New Orleans silent around him, he could draw no strength or self-assurance from the cheers of a united nation, as he did when he addressed a joint session of Congress nine days after the Sept. 11 attacks. Not only did his own stagecraft leave him alone in the spotlight, but whatever good will flowed to him across the aisle in those moments after the terrorist attacks is long gone, a victim of a polarized political culture that he did not create but to which he has often contributed.

For Mr. Bush, this was a moment for the country to turn away from what he and his aides have dismissively labeled "the blame game" toward a hopeful vision of a rebuilt Gulf Coast and a smarter government. But it is not yet clear that his performance will stanch the political wounds he has suffered or ensure that he can avoid being hobbled through his second term, not just by what he lost in the faltering response to Hurricane Katrina but by the rising death toll in Iraq, sky-high energy prices and worrisome deficits.

Democrats Say Gulf Needs A Marshall Plan (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Brian Debose

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006289

Democrats yesterday said the Gulf Coast needs a Marshall Plan to get back on its feet and that President Bush should seek more aid.

"The families in the Gulf don't need to hear a speech from me, and frankly, they don't need to hear another speech from the president," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "What they need is leadership."

Speaking hours before Mr. Bush's televised address last night, Mr. Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the government must be prepared to spend on education, health care and other services to make the region whole again.

Hours before the Democratic leaders made their challenge to the president, members of the Congressional Black Caucus and civil rights groups proposed an eight-point plan to assist the Gulf region. The plan includes an estimated $100 billion for unemployment assistance, job training, school placement and aid to the cities providing safe haven to the displaced.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Urban League said they want to make sure minority contractors will have the ability to win federal reconstruction contracts.

The $51.8 billion appropriations bill Congress passed last week to fund Katrina disaster relief exempted federal contracts below $10 million from coverage under the Small Business Act, which assures contracting opportunities be provided for the economically disadvantaged. That target is $5 million higher than current law, and the groups said that would eliminate many minority contractors.

The CBC proposed a 50 percent residency hiring target for all contracts and a 40 percent minority vendor target for all reconstruction.

Meanwhile yesterday, the House, over the objection of Democrats, yesterday approved a bill that calls for the House and Senate to coordinate on an investigation into government failures in response to the hurricane.

The committee coordination passed 224-188, with seven Democrats and 217 Republicans in favor, and one Republican, one independent and 186 Democrats opposed.

Democrats had wanted an independent commission styled on the one that investigated the September 11 terrorist attacks, and said a Republican-controlled congressional investigation won't take a serious look at a Republican administration.

"After the flood comes the whitewash," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat.

But Republicans said it was the role of Congress to conduct oversight and that it would be an abdication of duty to turn it over to a commission.

Mrs. Pelosi earlier had said she would not have Democrats participate in a bicameral committee. But yesterday she backed off, saying, "We'll see where we go from here."

Mr. Reid, though, said he will not allow Senate Democrats to participate. In that case, the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which already is looking into matters, would become the Senate's main investigative body for Katrina.

Conservatives Balk As Spending Soars In Katrina's Wake (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The open-ended commitment by President Bush and congressional leaders to rebuild New Orleans and the Gulf Coast is stoking anger among conservatives over the Republican government's record of higher spending and debt.

Following the nation's worst-ever natural disaster, no Republican in Congress is opposing federal aid that already totals $62 billion and is expected to exceed $200 billion. But the party's conservative wing, led yesterday by Oklahoma's Tom Coburn in the Senate and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana in the House, is calling for offsetting "sacrifices" in federal spending. And they're backed by a growing chorus of conservative activists, columnists and bloggers.

"It's not about taking care of the folks that need us," Mr. Coburn said in an interview. "But I wouldn't vote for another penny until we get real about the hard choices of cutting some spending." In what would be a real break for conservatives, Mr. Coburn said he is also not inclined to vote to extend the Bush tax cuts absent some fiscal restraint.

The divisions go to a broader debate over the party's identity and legacy a decade after Republicans broke Democrats' 40-year control of Congress and nearly five years after they captured the White House as well.

But conservatives' rebelliousness threatens a range of Bush initiatives before Congress. Moreover, Republican strategists worry that widespread disenchantment among the party's bedrock conservatives could lead many to stay home in next year's midterm elections.

In a year marked by setbacks to Mr. Bush's foreign and domestic agenda, Hurricane Katrina's costs to the federal government have dashed the one boast Mr. Bush had -- that a sound economy was producing higher-than-expected tax revenue, and bringing down the deficit. Deficits are expected to be much higher than the $333 billion the White House recently projected for the year ending Sept. 30 and $341 billion for fiscal 2006.

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers, yesterday told a group of economists, "The costs of rebuilding after Katrina are, of course, substantial and will add to the budget deficit in the near term; incurring those costs is essential if we are to repair the unprecedented damage wrought by that natural disaster. This necessary spending should not, however, jeopardize the president's long-term deficit-reduction goals."

Administration officials also express frustration that conservatives in Congress are criticizing the White House even as Congress has balked at making the Medicaid cuts that Mr. Bush had called for earlier this year.

Also taking conservatives' hits is House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, after the Texas Republican this week told reporters that for all the complaints that hurricane spending must be offset by spending cuts, "nobody has been able to come up with any yet." He suggested that the government has little fat. "After 11 years of Republican majority, we've pared it down pretty good," he said.

"This comes as quite a surprise to most Americans," wrote budget analyst Brian Riedl at the conservative Heritage Foundation. He and others, including the Coburn-Pence group, gave Mr. DeLay's office their lists of proposed budget cuts, including some that Mr. Bush proposed in February. Mr. Coburn said the president's budget director, Joshua Bolten, told him there wasn't time to take up such proposals.

Mr. Bolten's spokesman, Scott Milburn, said that given the speed with which the hurricane-relief bills had to be passed, "It's just not realistic to expect that Congress could produce and also agree to offsets of that magnitude in just a few hours. It's also unrealistic to expect that cuts of such magnitude would not cause very deep disruptions in other portions of the budget."

Beyond spending, many conservatives are troubled by the prospect that a new government bureaucracy will be created to handle the Katrina response. Even before Katrina hit, they had become increasingly critical of the White House for the jump in federal spending on Mr. Bush's watch. They also cite the creation of the huge Department of Homeland Security, an expanded federal role in grade-school education and a prescription-drug benefit for Medicare recipients that is the biggest new federal entitlement program since Medicare itself.

Senate Republican leaders this week sent Mr. Bush a letter calling for "a 'Marshall Plan' for the Gulf Coast," in reference to the nation's huge post-World War II effort to rebuild Europe.

Among those who have brought ideas to the White House table is conservative Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker. His model is government-sponsored enterprises such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Mr. Gingrich proposes a Gulf States Redevelopment Corp., backed by the federal government but controlled and regulated by officials in the region, to issue bonds, make loans and grants, provide natural-disaster insurance, raise taxes and finance public works, including levee reconstruction.

"If we do not have a bold set of solutions to propose in the next week or two, the left will propose a huge government run bureaucratic rebuilding program with maximum welfare and minimum progress," Mr. Gingrich wrote in an email to conservative Republican senators.

G.O.P. Split Over Big Plans For Storm Spending (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - The drive to pour tens of billions of federal dollars into rebuilding the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast is widening a fissure among Republicans over fiscal policy, with more of them expressing worry about unbridled spending.

On Thursday, even before President Bush promised that "federal funds will cover the great majority of the costs of repairing public infrastructure in the disaster zone," fiscal conservatives from the House and Senate joined budget watchdog groups in demanding that the administration be judicious in asking for taxpayer dollars.

One fiscal conservative, Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, said Thursday, "I don't believe that everything that should happen in Louisiana should be paid for by the rest of the country. I believe there are certain responsibilities that are due the people of Louisiana."

Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, called for restoring "sanity" to the federal recovery effort. Congress has approved $62 billion, mostly to cover costs already incurred, and the price tag is rising. The House and Senate approved tax relief Thursday at an estimated cost of more than $5 billion on top of $3.5 billion in housing vouchers approved by the Senate on Wednesday.

"We know we need to help, but throwing more and more money without accountability at this is not going to solve the problem," Mr. DeMint said.

DOJ_NMG_0006291

Their comments were in marked contrast to the sweeping administration approach outlined by Mr. Bush in his speech from New Orleans and a call by Senate Republican leaders for a rebuilding effort similar to the Marshall Plan after World War II. Congressional Democrats advocated their own comprehensive recovery program Thursday, promoting a combination of rebuilding programs coupled with housing, health care, agriculture and education initiatives. The president also emphasized the importance of private entrepreneurship to create jobs "and help break the cycle of poverty."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said he believed that providing rapid and extensive help overrode the need to cut spending elsewhere. "I think we have to understand that we have a devastation that has to be taken care of," Mr. Reid said. "And I'm not into finding where we can cut yet."

That mindset is troubling to other lawmakers who fear that in addition to a reborn Gulf Coast, something else will rise from the storm: record federal deficits.

"We know this is a huge bill," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona. "We don't want to lay it on future generations." Given the fierce political backlash to the stumbling relief effort in the days after the hurricane struck, House Republican leaders have been reluctant to stand in the way of any emergency legislation. After the speech, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert acknowledged that the price tag means that "for every dollar we spend on this, it is going to take a little bit longer to balance the budget." He said he was willing to listen to ideas to pay for the aid, but, "Quite frankly, we have to get this job done."

Despite those comments, many Republicans are increasingly edgy about the White House's push for a potentially open-ended recovery budget, worried that the president - in trying to regroup politically - was making expensive promises they would have to keep.

"We are not sure he knows what he is getting into," said one senior House Republican official who requested anonymity because of the potential consequences of publicly criticizing the administration.

The fears about the costs of the storm are building on widespread dissatisfaction among conservatives about spending in recent years by the Republican-controlled Congress. That unrest was already high after Congressional approval of a transportation measure that critics denounced as bloated with marginal home-state projects.

That sore spot was rubbed raw earlier this week when Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader, suggested that the Republican Congress had already trimmed much of the fat from the federal budget, making it difficult to find ways to offset hurricane spending.

Mr. Coburn called such a claim ludicrous and other Republicans took exception as well.

"There has never been a time where there is more total spending and more wasteful spending in Washington than we have today," said Pat Toomey, a former Republican congressman from Pennsylvania and the head of the conservative Club for Growth. "There is ample opportunity to find the offsets we need so that this does not have to be a fiscal disaster as well as a natural disaster."

On another front, Republicans and Democrats continued their dispute over how to investigate government failures in the storm response. The House approved a select committee to oversee the inquiry despite Democratic objections that only a special commission outside of Congress could do a credible job.

The House voted 224 to 188 to establish a 20-member panel to work in concert with a similar Senate panel in studying the adequacy of local, state and federal preparations for the storm and why the relief effort was so troubled, stranding thousands in chaotic conditions without sufficient food, water or medical care.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, said the special committee was an effort to "whitewash" the inquiry though she later said she would not stand in the way if Democrats want to sit on the panel. In another effort to reduce Democratic opposition, Mr. Hastert on Thursday named Representative Thomas M. Davis III, a sometimes Republican maverick from Virginia, to lead the panel.

As for paying for the recovery, Ms. Pelosi raised the possibility of 50-year bonds tied to the reconstruction.

The conservative Republicans worried about the outlays said the president and Congressional leaders need to ask the public to share in the sacrifice and suggested savings could be easily wrung from federal agencies or in Congress in ways like eliminating pet projects.

"Katrina breaks my heart," said Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana and chairman of a caucus of more than 100 House Republicans who advocate conservative spending policy. "Congress must do everything the American people expect us to do to meet the needs of families and communities affected by Katrina. But we must not let Katrina break the bank for our children and grandchildren."

GOP Lawmakers Urge Cuts To Offset Storm-relief Costs (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006292

A group of Republicans yesterday challenged President Bush to propose spending cuts to cover some of the cost of aid for Hurricane Katrina, saying now is a time for him to show leadership.

"We just can't throw money at the problem, and if we do throw money at the problem, which seems to my way of thinking some of what we're doing today, we better figure out how we're going to handle the financial difficulties that come from that," said Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican.

He joined Sen. John McCain of Arizona, Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina and leaders of the House conservative caucus in saying that the hurricane offers a chance to cut parts of the federal budget.

The lawmakers said the government should spend what is needed to aid hurricane victims, but also must be worried about a deficit that the Congressional Budget Office says would reach $331 billion this fiscal year even without including hurricane spending.

Mr. DeMint said the federal role should be re-evaluated and, in places, should take a back seat.

"Our government needs to take stock of what America is already doing -- the money that has already been contributed -- and see that we have a better role supporting what America can do on its own."

The group won't find much support among Democratic leaders.

"I'm not really into cutting right now," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "I'm into figuring out a way that we can get the Republican majority in the Senate to care about those people down there who are still desperate."

He said that instead of cutting, Republicans should postpone Medicaid spending cuts they want as part of the budget process. He also said Republicans should put off $70 billion in further tax cuts this year.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said there could be "creative funding" for rebuilding. She suggested an arrangement like the Tennessee Valley Authority or the post-September 11 New York model of a regional board with a credit guarantee from the federal government.

The spending is enraging conservative activists, and members of Congress are proposing alternatives to deficit spending.

Rep. Louie Gohmert, Texas Republican, introduced a bill yesterday that would halt all government building except when related to Hurricane Katrina efforts and national security requirements.

Mr. Coburn said it was a "ludicrous claim" House Majority Leader Tom DeLay made earlier this week that he hasn't seen ways to offset the spending with cuts elsewhere.

In his weekly briefing, Mr. DeLay said it was appropriate to borrow money to pay for hurricane relief, and that the billions of dollars in transportation earmarks should be maintained.

"My answer to those that want to offset the spending is sure, bring me the offsets, I will be glad to do it, but no one has been able to come up with any yet," he said.

Mr. Coburn said he would "be happy to have that debate with Mr. DeLay."

He said he has identified $74 billion in cutting room and that one place to start is the $315 million the highway bill spent for a bridge in Alaska that will reach a community of several dozen people, "who have a wonderful ferry system right now."

Mr. DeLay said Republicans could declare "ongoing victory" and, asked whether the government was running at peak efficiency with little cutting room left, he said, "Yes. After 11 years of Republican majority, we pared it down pretty good."

Yesterday, DeLay spokesman Kevin Madden said his boss "made it very clear that fiscal discipline is an ongoing process -- with an emphasis on 'ongoing.' "

"The House of Representatives has, in the past, worked through the budget and reconciliation process to pare down government spending and target wasteful programs," Mr. Madden said. "We will continue to adhere to those principles as we move forward."

Plan Includes Homesteading, Jobs Programs (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Promising “this great city will rise again,” President Bush dedicated the federal government on Thursday to “one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen” and pledged that it would pay most of the costs.

Bush put no price tag on the overall effort or his proposals to help evacuees find jobs and give them a chance to get free federal land for new homes. So far, the government has spent more than $13.7 billion of the $62.3 billion approved by Congress. The final cost is expected to be much higher.

As the area is rebuilt in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Bush said, the country must confront poverty and “rise above the legacy of inequality” so people can return to jobs and houses they own.

Bush said he wants all evacuees out of shelters by mid-October. Wearing no tie or jacket, he spoke for 22 minutes from the French Quarter's Jackson Square, with St. Louis Cathedral as a backdrop.

DOJ_NMG_0006293

He acknowledged that the chaotic initial response to Katrina showed that disaster planning is inadequate and again took responsibility for failures by the government. Four years after 9/11, he said, “Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency.”

He said he has ordered every Cabinet secretary to review the flawed response but did not suggest he'll agree to Democrats' demands for an independent inquiry.

The speech was part of a White House strategy to ease criticism of the initial response to the disaster and assert Bush's leadership as attention shifts to reconstruction.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, a Democrat, said she was “greatly heartened” by Bush's pledge. But Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada and Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, Democratic leaders in Congress, said “the victims … don't need just words, they need a plan that will lead the way. ”

Bush proposed three initiatives requiring congressional approval:

· An “opportunity zone” in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to give tax incentives to businesses that create jobs and loans and loan guarantees to small businesses.

·Recovery accounts of up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care for each evacuee seeking a job.

·A lottery to give low-income citizens of the region free federal land. In return, they would pledge to build homes on the lots.

U.S. Government Has Doled Out $13.7B On Katrina Relief (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — The federal government has spent more than $13.7 billion on Hurricane Katrina relief, the Department of Homeland Security said Thursday in a report for Congress.

The spending includes $7.2 billion for Louisiana, where flooding devastated New Orleans; $4.8 billion for Mississippi and $1.5 billion for Alabama.

Among the major categories of spending: $3.6 billion to purchase mobile homes and trailers and $1.8 billion for housing assistance, including $2,000 debit cards handed out to those left homeless, the report said. Costs for urban search-and-rescue teams totaled $52 million, part of $4.8 billion spent to send government workers to the region.

The report, a snapshot of spending on Katrina as of Wednesday, was the first of the weekly status reports Congress mandated last week when it passed a $51.8 billion emergency spending bill for hurricane relief. The report came amid calls on Capitol Hill for greater care in the spending of federal relief money.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., asked the panel's investigative staff to focus on disaster spending, given the record $62.3 billion allocated in the past two weeks. “Congress has properly provided historic levels of assistance,” Lewis said. “Now we must fulfill our constitutional obligations to conduct vigorous oversight over those funds.” The committee also will conduct hearings to track how the money is spent, Lewis said.

In a speech in New Orleans, President Bush said, “Taxpayers expect this work to be done honestly and wisely, so we will have a team of inspector generals reviewing all expenditures.”

Lou Reigel, the former special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office and now a top official in the agency's cybercrimes unit, said the city has a long history of corruption among public officials, although the climate has improved in recent years.

“You're going to have to be cautious when dispensing these funds,” he said.

“There is certainly a big risk,” said Joshua Hochberg, chief of the Justice Department's fraud section until last week, when he left to join a private law firm. “The availability of money seems to attract the worst types of white-collar thieves.” The potential for problems rises when the government waives normal competitive-bidding rules to speed the delivery of relief services, as it has in this emergency, Hochberg said.

The FBI has set up a tip line, 1-800-CALL FBI, to collect allegations of corruption and fraud. The Homeland Security Department has sent auditors and investigators to the region to monitor the spending of relief funds.

Bush Pledges Historic Effort To Help Gulf Coast Recover (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 -- President Bush, summoning the American spirit and "a faith in God no storm can take away," vowed from the heart of the Hurricane Katrina disaster zone Thursday night to rebuild this devastated city and the rest of the Gulf Coast with "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen."

DOJ_NMG_0006294

In a prime-time address televised from the storm-battered French Quarter, the president appeared without coat and tie to mourn "a tragedy that seems so blind and random" while promising to help its victims with unprecedented federal assistance to secure homes, jobs, health care and schooling.

"You need to know," he said, directly addressing the dislocated and desperate, "that our whole nation cares about you, and in the journey ahead you're not alone. . . . And tonight I also offer this pledge of the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives."

Although Bush cited no price tag, he committed the nation to a plan that officials and lawmakers believe could top $200 billion, roughly the cost of the Iraq war and reconstruction, and which promises to reorient government for the balance of the Bush presidency. It will create much larger deficits in the short term, siphon off money that would have been spent on other programs and dramatically shift the focus of the White House, Congress and many state governments for the indefinite future.

Even as he embraced a spending program the scale of which few Democratic presidents ever advanced, Bush signaled that he would shape its contours with policy ideas long sought by conservative thinkers. He proposed creation of a "Gulf Opportunity Zone" that would grant new and existing businesses tax breaks, loans and loan guarantees through 2007. And in documents released before the speech, Bush called for displaced families that send children to private schools, including religious ones, to be eligible for federal money.

Eighteen days after Katrina smashed through the levees here, flooding the city, killing hundreds and displacing more than 1 million, Bush endorsed most of the criticism of the government's stutter-start response to the storm and vowed to investigate and retool its emergency plans, calling in particular for "a broader role for the armed forces" in future domestic crises. He ordered his Cabinet to reexamine disaster plans for every major American city. But he seemed to embrace a Republican plan for a GOP-majority congressional inquiry rather than the independent commission sought by Democrats.

During his 26-minute speech, the president evoked the horror that Katrina wrought on the region, recalling scenes of the abandoned seeking food and water, survivors victimized a second time by looters, and "bodies of the dead lying uncovered and untended in the street." Bush likened Katrina to the worst disasters of American history, including the Chicago fire of 1871 and the 1906 San Francisco earthquake. "Every time the people of this land have come back from fire, flood and storm to build anew -- and to build better than what we had before," he said. "Americans have never left our destiny to the whims of nature, and we will not start now."

Harking back to the "compassionate conservative" rhetoric of his early presidency, Bush infused his address with religious overtones. The trials of the last few weeks, he said, "remind us of a hope beyond all pain and death, a God who welcomes the lost to a house not made with his hands." The language reflected not only Bush's own faith but also his decision to bring back Michael J. Gerson, his first-term speechwriter and now a policy adviser, to help draft perhaps his most important address since launching the Iraq war in 2003.

Biblical citations and imagery are common touchstones for the president when he tries to connect with African Americans, who polls show have been especially aggrieved by the slow federal response because the victims left behind were disproportionately poor and black. "As all of us saw on television," Bush said, "there is also some deep, persistent poverty in this region as well. That poverty has roots in a history of racial discrimination, which cut off generations from the opportunity of America. We have a duty to confront this poverty with bold action."

Bush spoke from Jackson Square, where a towering statute of Andrew Jackson is one of the few local icons left unscathed in the Big Easy. The buildings surrounding the square are boarded up and lifeless; a metal telephone pole across the street is split like small stick, a testament to Katrina's fury. The historic square commemorates the French handover of Louisiana in 1803; now, 202 years later, it marks the spot where Bush promised to rebuild the heart of Louisiana.

"There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again," Bush said. Eventually, he added, "the streetcars will once again rumble down St. Charles and the passionate soul of a great city will return."

The speech came at perhaps the most difficult political moment of Bush's presidency, with Americans losing faith in his ability to manage crisis and lead the nation out of troubled times, according to polls. His approval ratings have dropped to new lows in the past few days as gasoline prices have soared and chaos in Iraq persists. The speech capped a week-long effort to restore Bush's standing, starting with the ousting of the Federal Emergency Management Agency director, who oversaw the initial response, and a rare public embrace of responsibility for its shortcomings.

Sensitive to fueling further criticism, the White House said it paid for the electricity and lights used for the speech, limiting the local inconvenience. But Bush emerged onto the square without an audience, speaking directly into the camera from a lectern placed so the Jackson statue would be in the picture.

Congressional Democrats did not wait for the speech to lay down markers for how they think the Gulf Coast should be rebuilt -- and to lay the blame on Bush for Washington's sluggish performance.

DOJ_NMG_0006295

"The families in the Gulf . . . certainly don't need to hear another speech from President Bush," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "What they need is leadership. . . . Let's be clear about what Katrina was: a failure of leadership." Reid called for "an American Marshall Plan" to rebuild the Gulf Coast and accused Republicans of balking at even greater spending on health, housing and education for victims.

Reid insisted on an independent commission to investigate what went wrong with Katrina. But Republicans rejected that.

The House adopted a plan for a joint investigative committee that would have a Republican majority but grant Democrats authority to call witnesses and seek subpoenas from the GOP chairman. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) was tapped Thursday to serve as co-chairman along with Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). Davis said Thursday night that among the first witnesses he will call will be Michael D. Brown, the FEMA director who resigned this week under fire.

Moving to expand the $62 billion in relief already approved for the Gulf Coast, the House and Senate on Thursday passed similar tax bills estimated to cost at least $5 billion over five years to allow storm victims to draw funds from retirement accounts without penalty and to extend several housing, job and child tax credits through the disruption. The legislation also offers charitable giving incentives while easing taxes on forgiven debts and unreimbursed business losses.

In deference to local sensibilities, Bush made clear that local officials will dictate how the city is reconstructed, and that a chief aim will be to lure those who fled New Orleans and other Gulf Coast communities to return rather than relocate permanently to the places where they sought refuge. At the same time, he suggested that local authorities would have to revisit zoning laws and building codes "to avoid a repeat of what we've seen" and suggested that sections of New Orleans be rebuilt on "higher ground."

Bush called on Congress to provide property on the federal domain free of charge though a lottery. In exchange, a recipient would be obligated to build a home with a mortgage or help from a charitable organization. He also proposed creation of "worker recovery accounts" of up to $5,000 for evacuees to use for job training, education and child care.

Bush arrived here after an earlier stop in Pascagoula, Miss. The New Orleans he found is a twisted shell of its former self, a once vibrant city that never slept left lifeless by Katrina's fury. Streets remain flooded, piles of garbage line them, and a stench seems to cling to every part of the French Quarter and beyond.

Vickie Johnston, 37, a hairdresser, sneaked into the city Thursday only to learn she had lost everything -- her clothes, furniture, and irreplaceables such as correspondence and photos. She voted for Bush twice but feels betrayed by all government. "They knew New Orleans was a fishbowl. They knew," she said. "Now it's a toilet bowl. How can they do this to us? Why did they let the water get so high?"

In his speech hours later, Bush expressed understanding of such sentiments, acknowledging that the response "at every level of government was not well coordinated and was overwhelmed in the first few days." The lesson he saw was the need for "greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces, the institution of our government most capable of massive logistical operations on a moment's notice."

As he did on Tuesday, Bush said he accepts accountability: "Four years after the frightening experience of September 11th, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency. When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

U.S. To Pick Up Rebuilding Tab (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

President Bush last night said the federal government will pay most of the estimated $200 billion to rebuild the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast in what he called "one of the largest reconstruction projects the world has ever seen."

Standing in the heart of the historic French Quarter of New Orleans, a once-thriving city now deserted and still more than 50 percent flooded 18 days after Hurricane Katrina struck, the president also announced that he had ordered the Department of Homeland Security to conduct an immediate review of disaster-response plans in every major American city.

He acknowledged that "every level of government was not well-coordinated and was overwhelmed in the first few days" after the Category 4 storm slammed into Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"Four years after the frightening experience of September 11th, Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency. When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I, as president, am responsible for the problem, and for the solution," Mr. Bush said in a 20-minute speech.

"It is now clear that a challenge on this scale requires greater federal authority and a broader role for the armed forces [-] the institution of our government most capable of massive logistical operations on a moment's notice."

DOJ_NMG_0006296

The president used most of his prime-time televised address to the nation to reassure Americans that the federal government now has the emergency response well in hand and to lay out a specific plan to rebuild New Orleans and other devastated areas on the Gulf Coast.

He said his administration will not turn a blind eye to the "persistent poverty" in the region that has led to a "legacy of inequality."

Addressing the hundreds of thousands of evacuees forced from their homes by the hurricane, the president said, "You need to know that our whole nation cares about you -- and in the journey ahead you are not alone."

"Tonight, I also offer this pledge to the American people: Throughout the area hit by the hurricane, we will do what it takes, we will stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives. And all who question the future of the Crescent City need to know: There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again."

Mr. Bush, who traveled to the hard-hit Mississippi coast before delivering his speech from New Orleans, did not directly address how the federal government would pay for the massive project.

Still, with the water level receding by the hour, the president pledged that "federal funds will cover the great majority of the costs of repairing public infrastructure in the disaster zone, from roads and bridges to schools and water systems. Our goal is to get the work done quickly."

But with some in Washington worried about the costs involved at a time of huge federal expenditures -- the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have cost nearly $300 billion so far -- Mr. Bush said taxpayers can rest assured that the reconstruction money will be monitored closely, with "a team of inspectors general reviewing all expenditures."

Democrats continued to criticize the Bush administration's response, with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi deriding the speech as "just words."

"It takes more than just taking responsibility to right the many wrongs that occurred over the past two weeks. The American people need answers from independent experts outside of the political arena to learn from the past and prepare and protect our nation and our communities for the future. We can and must do better," they said in a joint statement.

Congress already has approved $62.1 billion for rescue and relief efforts, with many private analysts forecasting that the expected $200 billion price tag of Katrina will add $100 billion or more to next year's deficit.

White House officials have told Congress that the $51.8 billion approved late last week will fund the disaster relief effort only through the first week of October, and senior congressional appropriations aides have told the White House that they need to see the next request by next week. Republicans say the next bill could exceed $50 billion.

Top White House officials acknowledged that the federal government has no choice but to run up the deficit to meet the crisis in the Gulf Coast.

"The fact of the matter is when our nation faces these type of emergencies, it unfortunately requires us to deficit spend," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said before Mr. Bush's speech.

Mr. Bush proposed three specific initiatives to speed recovery in the region, calling for the creation of a Gulf Opportunity Zone to offer businesses tax breaks, provide federally owned land to "low-income citizens free of charge and pay evacuees up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care.

If Mr. Bush's plan is put into effect, it would eclipse the Marshall Plan, which helped revive Europe after World War II and cost about $100 billion in today's dollars.

Bush's Rescue Mission (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

When President Bush stepped to the podium in front of New Orleans' St. Louis Cathedral on Thursday night, his topic was rebuilding a hurricane-ravaged region. But his goal clearly was to rescue his presidency, which Katrina's storm surge tattered as well.

Two major polls released Thursday showed that about 40% of those surveyed approved of Bush's work overall, the lowest mark of his presidency. The federal government's slow response to the crisis on the Gulf Coast has compounded growing doubts about other administration initiatives, especially the war in Iraq.

Bush, who looked like he'd dispensed with his tie and jacket just moments before appearing on camera, promised "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen."

"There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans," he said, pledging to pick up the tab for "the great majority" of the infrastructure repairs.

The president listed the impressive array of initiatives undertaken to help evacuees. And he laid out a series of initiatives that would apply Republican principles to the reconstruction effort, including proposals to give away home-building lots to displaced families with low incomes and to slash taxes for entrepreneurs who create jobs in the devastated region. The president's call for a "Gulf Opportunity Zone" is intriguing, but he needs to make sure storm relief doesn't become a Trojan horse for every conservative ideologue's favorite pet project. Flat tax, anyone?

He left for another day any discussion of where the hundreds of billions of dollars to pay for reconstruction will come from, but that day can't be put off indefinitely. He praised the generosity of Americans in the wake of Katrina, but he soon may have to ask for some sacrifice to help pay the bills. The death of the "death tax," for instance, no longer looks certain.

To his credit, Bush acknowledged the government's failure to respond effectively in the aftermath of the hurricane, and he accepted responsibility for the federal share of the problem. He also prodded local leaders to do a better job preparing for what clearly is their role — evacuating, securing and provisioning their cities in the event of a disaster or terrorist attack. Yet Bush's assertion that a challenge of this scale raises new questions about coordination between federal and local officials begs the question: What has the administration been doing in the four years since the 9/11 attacks, if not preparing the country for such a catastrophic event?

Bush's speech helped him regain his political footing for now. But whether he rescues his legacy from the putrid waters swirling in the streets of New Orleans will depend on whether the aspirations expressed Thursday night are translated into a truly bright future for the region.

Bush Plan A Solid Start, But Key Is In The Execution (USAT)

USA Today, September 16, 2005

More than two weeks after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the Gulf Coast, President Bush at last seemed to have marshaled an effective response as he addressed the nation from New Orleans Thursday night.

Bush proposed a massive plan — one that comes with huge costs that he disturbingly offered no plan to pay for — but it was, finally, in proportion to the magnitude of the problem.

Most important, he got the order of march right, setting three top priorities:

First, meet the immediate needs of those endangered and uprooted by the storm. As he described the emergency response now in place — electric power restored, gas pipelines operating, levees fixed, pumps running, ships arriving to provide housing — it appeared for the first time that the government was getting a grip on the problem. Also arriving are emergency supplies for evacuees, expedited Social Security checks, unemployment benefits, mail delivery — and more.

Second, help displaced citizens rebuild their communities and lives.

Third, rebuild the communities better and safer than before the storm. This, he promised, would be led by state and local governments, but with major federal financing.

To achieve this, the president proposes a mix of traditional big government programs more commonly associated with Democrats and conservative ideas such as enterprise zones, federally-financed savings accounts for people seeking job training and incentives for home ownership, targeted largely at low-income citizens.

It's a solid start, but one that comes with three unanswered questions:

· Who's in charge? Saying states and localities will have control is sensible, but the federal government can't just dole out money without deciding how it will be spent. Bush stopped short of creating a body to coordinate decision-making among fractious federal, state and local officials.

· Who will pay? Bush ignored the subject, suggesting he will once again indulge his worst habit: expanding government spending at record rates without taking the responsibility to pay for it. With cost estimates running as high as $200 billion, some members of Congress in his own party are already chafing at the idea. Several have suggested reopening Congress' most recent pork-barrel extravaganza, the $286 billion transportation bill that included all manner of projects that could be scrapped in favor of more urgent Gulf Coast needs.

· Will it work? On the most basic level, at least, the chances that it will work in the hurricane zone seem good, if sure to come with problems. The government, once mobilized, is good at this sort of thing, and Bush's plan is creative. He also addressed the most glaring breakdown of the post-Katrina response: its failure to address the problems of the poor.

Far less convincing, though, was Bush's broader national response. He said he has ordered a federal review of emergency response plans in all major cities, as well as instructing all federal departments to review their own response.

It sounded all too much like the initiatives Bush announced four years ago in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks. Katrina proved those to be a near total failure in their first major test, raising deep suspicions that the administration has bungled terrorism preparations as badly as it bungled the Katrina response. It there's anything good to come from this disaster, it's that those flaws have been exposed. The president noted the need for a stronger federal role, particularly military, in a disaster of this scale. That's a start, as is the broader Bush plan.

Whether it will prove to be effectively managed and responsibly financed, or just good public relations, remains to be seen.

Not the New Deal (NYT)

By PAUL KRUGMAN

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Now it begins: America's biggest relief and recovery program since the New Deal. And the omens aren't good.

It's a given that the Bush administration, which tried to turn Iraq into a laboratory for conservative economic policies, will try the same thing on the Gulf Coast. The Heritage Foundation, which has surely been helping Karl Rove develop the administration's recovery plan, has already published a manifesto on post-Katrina policy. It calls for waivers on environmental rules, the elimination of capital gains taxes and the private ownership of public school buildings in the disaster areas. And if any of the people killed by Katrina, most of them poor, had a net worth of more than $1.5 million, Heritage wants to exempt their heirs from the estate tax.

Still, even conservatives admit that deregulation, tax cuts and privatization won't be enough. Recovery will require a lot of federal spending. And aside from the effect on the deficit - we're about to see the spectacle of tax cuts in the face of both a war and a huge reconstruction effort - this raises another question: how can discretionary government spending take place on that scale without creating equally large-scale corruption?

It's possible to spend large sums honestly, as Franklin D. Roosevelt demonstrated in the 1930's. F.D.R. presided over a huge expansion of federal spending, including a lot of discretionary spending by the Works Progress Administration. Yet the image of public relief, widely regarded as corrupt before the New Deal, actually improved markedly.

How did that happen? The answer is that the New Deal made almost a fetish out of policing its own programs against potential corruption. In particular, F.D.R. created a powerful "division of progress investigation" to look into complaints of malfeasance in the W.P.A. That division proved so effective that a later Congressional investigation couldn't find a single serious irregularity it had missed.

This commitment to honest government wasn't a sign of Roosevelt's personal virtue; it reflected a political imperative. F.D.R.'s mission in office was to show that government activism works. To maintain that mission's credibility, he needed to keep his administration's record clean.

But George W. Bush isn't F.D.R. Indeed, in crucial respects he's the anti-F.D.R.

President Bush subscribes to a political philosophy that opposes government activism - that's why he has tried to downsize and privatize programs wherever he can. (He still hopes to privatize Social Security, F.D.R.'s biggest legacy.) So even his policy failures don't bother his strongest supporters: many conservatives view the inept response to Katrina as a vindication of their lack of faith in government, rather than as a reason to reconsider their faith in Mr. Bush.

And to date the Bush administration, which has no stake in showing that good government is possible, has been averse to investigating itself. On the contrary, it has consistently stonewalled corruption investigations and punished its own investigators if they try to do their jobs.

That's why Mr. Bush's promise last night that he will have "a team of inspectors general reviewing all expenditures" rings hollow. Whoever these inspectors general are, they'll be mindful of the fate of Bunnatine Greenhouse, a highly regarded auditor at the Army Corps of Engineers who suddenly got poor performance reviews after she raised questions about Halliburton's contracts in Iraq. She was demoted late last month.

Turning the funds over to state and local governments isn't the answer, either. F.D.R. actually made a point of taking control away from local politicians; then as now, patronage played a big role in local politics.

And our sympathy for the people of Mississippi and Louisiana shouldn't blind us to the realities of their states' political cultures. Last year the newsletter Corporate Crime Reporter ranked the states according to the number of federal public-corruption convictions per capita. Mississippi came in first, and Louisiana came in third.

Is there any way Mr. Bush could ensure an honest recovery program? Yes - he could insulate decisions about reconstruction spending from politics by placing them in the hands of an autonomous agency headed by a political independent, or, if no such person can be found, a Democrat (as a sign of good faith).

He didn't do that last night, and probably won't. There's every reason to believe the reconstruction of the Gulf Coast, like the failed reconstruction of Iraq, will be deeply marred by cronyism and corruption.

Auditors To Monitor Use Of Katrina Financial Aid (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Teams of auditors and investigators from the Department of Homeland Security expect to spend three to five years at hurricane recovery field offices in an attempt to prevent fraudulent use of more than $60 billion in relief funds.

DOJ_NMG_0006299

"We're going to prevent what is still going to happen, contract procurement irregularities," said Tamara Faulkner, spokeswoman for the inspector general's office.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency routinely uses inspector general auditors to monitor federal dollars that are sent to disaster zones, such as the hurricanes that hit Florida last year, but the Katrina operation and the potential for fraud is on "an unprecedented level," Miss Faulkner said.

A team of 30 inspector general employees will hit the ground Monday at field offices in Baton Rouge, La., Montgomery, Ala., and Jackson, Miss., she said. Later next week, three auditors will be sent to Texas.

Although Congress gave authority to the department's inspector general, Richard Skinner, to stop contract fraud and a $15 million budget to get started, some lawmakers want to create new watchdogs.

Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, yesterday introduced a bill to expand the jurisdiction of the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction to oversee the recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region, with an $80 million budget.

"Already, some $2 billion per day is being spent on the recovery efforts. We simply cannot wait for existing structures to organize and ramp up or create a whole new bureaucracy that will take many months to get up and running," Miss Collins said. "We need controls that are visible and on the ground as soon as possible."

She and Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, said the Homeland Security Department's inspector general is limited to watching spending within its own agency.

"The problem, however, is the spending's going to cross department lines. It's going to cross jurisdictional lines. And we believe that just beefing up the I.G. in the Department of Homeland Security won't be adequate to the task," Miss Collins said.

However, Mr. Skinner established a special inspector general working group among agencies that are expected to use hurricane relief funds, including the Departments of Defense, Health and Human Services, Housing and Urban Development, and the Environmental Protection Agency.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, and Rep. Todd R. Platts, Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the committee's government management, finance and accountability subcommittee, asked Mr. Skinner in a letter yesterday to report by Tuesday how the various inspectors will work together.

"The inspectors general have long stood as a bulwark against such fraud and mismanagement," the congressmen said.

House, Senate OK Katrina Tax Relief (AP-Y)

By MARY DALRYMPLE, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2005

Lawmakers on Thursday worked to help solve the practical problems facing those caught in Hurricane Katrina's path who need quick access to cash, housing and medical care.

The House and Senate passed nearly identical bills to let victims tap retirement accounts without penalty and help working poor families and parents retain their tax credits. Senators also voted for rental housing vouchers and aid measures for small business.

The action came ahead of President Bush's prime-time speech from New Orleans about the comprehensive recovery effort he envisions for the battered Gulf Coast.

On Capitol Hill, Republicans and Democrats fought over plans for a special, GOP-majority committee to investigate the government's sluggish response to the emergency. The House endorsed the idea by a mostly partisan 224-188 vote. Democrats warned they would boycott.

Republicans said it is their responsibility to scrutinize the GOP-run government. "In challenging times, our country expects its leaders to work together and not to engage in petty bickering," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Democrats contended that Republicans cannot be trusted to run an impartial investigation. "After the flood comes the whitewash," said Rep. James McGovern (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass. "The job of this Congress is not to run interference for the Bush administration."

Louisiana lawmakers outlined a reconstruction plan, called "Project Pelican," for their devastated state. It includes coastal restoration and economic development incentives to brings jobs and people back to New Orleans.

Help was coming from the Treasury Department, which ruled that the hurricane qualified as a hardship. That allows victims and their families tap into retirement plans, including 401(k)s, an effort aimed at people with little savings to recover from the storm.

In separate bills passed by the House and the Senate, lawmakers voted to waive penalties typically imposed on early withdrawals from retirement accounts. Lawmakers have to reconcile their differences and send the measure to the president before it can become law.

The measures help working poor families and parents retain tax credits and other benefits that can be disrupted when taxpayers, for example, lose their jobs or relocate.

Several House lawmakers reacted favorably by a proposal to two Illinois Democrats, Sen. Barack Obama and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (news, bio, voting record), to immediately advance earned income tax credits and child tax credits to families in the disaster area.

The tax bills would let people write off more of their unreimbursed hurricane losses. Also, taxes typically imposed when debts such as mortgages are forgiven would be waived. People who take in evacuees for two months or more would get tax breaks.

The Senate's housing voucher program would provide more than 350,000 families left homeless by Katrina with emergency housing vouchers averaging $600 a month, for up to six months. Any displaced family, regardless of income, would be eligible. The program was expected to cost $3.5 billion over six months.

The small business plan, approved by a 96-0 vote, would allow borrowers to defer repayment of Small Business Administration disaster loans for a year. The maximum size of an SBA disaster loan would rise from $1.5 million per loan to $10 million.

Both proposals were added to a spending bill for the departments of Commerce and Justice. But it may not get to Bush soon, despite the Katrina-related provisions.

Senators also worked on giving hurricane victims temporary access to Medicaid health services, including mental health care.

By the end of the day, Congress had also sent the president bills for Katrina victims that ease rules requiring that welfare recipients must work 30 hours a week for their benefits and expand the availability of education grants for students.

Overall, Congress has voted to spend more than $62 billion on immediate rescue and recovery efforts. Lawmakers promise to spend much more.

Ben Bernanke, the president's chief economist, said the costs of rebuilding will be substantial. "This necessary spending should not, however, jeopardize the president' long-term deficit-reduction goals," he told the National Bureau of Economic Research.

The FBI opened a telephone line (1-800-225-5324) to receive reports of public corruption and government fraud related to Katrina relief efforts and cleanup.

Senate Democrats urged Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff to reassure illegal immigrants victimized by the storm that they can seek help from relief agencies without fear of arrest. The government made such a promise after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Also Thursday, senators questioned whether Bush's nominee to run the bureau of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement has enough experience for the post.

Julie L. Myers, a former Treasury official and assistant U.S. attorney, was Chertoff's chief of staff when he led the Justice Department's criminal division.

Critics Fear Trailer 'Ghettos' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

On the sprawling, dusty grounds of Lone Star Army Ammunition Plant and Red River Army Depot in Texarkana, Tex., the recreational vehicles and mobile homes are arriving at a rate of 100 a day before being shipped out to the fringes of Hurricane Katrina's disaster zone.

Those trailers, among 300,000 to be purchased with nearly $5 billion of federal money, have become a focal point of criticism of the Bush administration's early rebuilding efforts. Some conservatives blanch at the cost. And many critics fret that mobile homes will hardly protect their residents from the next storm.

But most of all, housing experts -- conservatives and liberals alike -- worry that Federal Emergency Management Agency encampments will quickly become what former House Speaker Newt Gingrich called "ghettos of despair." Rental vouchers in a market with plenty of available housing would be cheaper and faster and provide better accommodations, they say.

"Three hundred thousand manufactured homes? People are screaming about that," fumed Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). "I tell you, FEMA is a disaster."

Beleaguered FEMA officials yesterday counseled patience. When Katrina struck, they were criticized for moving too slowly, they said. Now, they are being second-guessed for moving too quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0006301

"The governors and their local officials are looking at all these issues. They're working with all the evacuees in these communities to ensure they are incorporated into the community, they're given job assistance and the help they need," said FEMA spokesman James McIntyre. "We have more than 300,000 displaced households, and they have to live somewhere."

Besides, said Brian Sullivan, a spokesman for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, mobile homes are not the entire response. HUD will expand rental assistance, open federally insured foreclosed homes and offer up vacant public housing units to get Katrina's survivors into shelter. "The initial response now is: Get your hands on anything you can," he said.

When Katrina struck, FEMA did what it has always done in the wake of a major hurricane: turned to its standing list of contractors, including several mobile home manufacturers. Within days, the agency began discussions with the Manufactured Housing Institute, and then purchased 20,000 fully furnished mobile homes and began shipping them to staging areas in Texarkana; Purvis, Miss.; Selma, Ala.; and Baton Rouge, La.

State government then began scouring parks, government land and private sites to establish communities of evacuees. Just as quickly, housing experts of all political stripes began to howl in protest.

"If they simply put poor people in mobile homes, they would be re-creating the same troubled neighborhoods that were destroyed," said Susan J. Popkin, a housing expert at the Urban Institute. "And we know how to do this better."

Bruce Katz, a liberal housing policy expert at the Brookings Institution, rushed to draft an opinion article, urging the administration to learn from the experience of the 1994 Northridge, Calif., earthquake. Within a week of the quake, the first of 22,000 low-income displaced families were moving into new apartments with expanded HUD housing vouchers. Within a month, a major landlord-recruitment effort was pushing low-income Angelenos into higher-income neighborhoods.

"It's not rocket science," said Katz, a HUD chief of staff in the Clinton administration. "If you turned on the voucher faucet, you'd have people in apartments in a week."

Edgar O. Olsen, a conservative housing economist at the University of Virginia, said he pestered the Federal Housing Administration and HUD with faxes, imploring them to scrap the mobile home contracts for rental vouchers.

After all, he noted, rental occupancy rates are at historic lows, as are rents. There are more than 1.1 million available units in the South, with an average rent of less than $700 a month. Houston's vacancy rate stands at 15.6 percent. But Olsen said he has received no response.

The problem, he said, may lie with HUD's organizational chart. Like many other agencies, it has been hollowed out: assistant secretary for public and Indian housing, assistant secretary for policy development and research, general deputy assistant secretary for policy, assistant secretary for fair housing, general counsel, chief financial officer and assistant secretary for administration, all vacant.

Now, HUD will be in the spotlight, Katz predicted. In his 2006 budget, the president had proposed stripping the department of virtually all of its community development functions. The White House has tried to eliminate HOPE VI, the primary housing program designed to raze and rebuild failed public housing complexes. And the administration has de-emphasized the Section 8 housing voucher program.

"The administration has spent the past five years trying to ratchet back the Section 8 voucher program," Katz said. "It's going to be fairly hard for them to turn on a dime and say, 'Oh, we were just kidding.' "

But now, they may have to do just that, housing experts and politicians say. "The whole relief effort was such an incredible screw-up that they felt they just had to throw money at the program," Olsen said, referring to buying the army of trailers. "They had to do it fast. Now, the question is whether they can undo it."

Gingrich agreed: "A key test of the administration right now is to refuse to spend one more penny on such a disastrous policy."

Evacuees Are Moving Out Of Shelters Government Helps People Settle Into Temporary Homes (USAT)

By John Ritter, Tom Weir, And Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 16, 2005

ALEXANDER CITY, Ala. — Far from Hurricane Katrina's ruin on the Gulf Coast, Mitchell and Hazel Rodgers are among the first hurricane victims to settle this week into new RV trailers at Wind Creek State Park, across a lake from million-dollar real estate.

The couple join tens of thousands of Katrina evacuees moving to the next stage of what promises to be a long process of getting back home.

DOJ_NMG_0006302

The populations of hundreds of Red Cross shelters are dropping daily as families move to temporary housing, some, like the 500 trailer sites at Wind Creek, more permanent than others.

"This is the type of living my wife and I always wanted. Back to Mother Nature," says Mitchell Rodgers, 54, a disabled shipyard worker whose Gulfport, Miss., trailer-park home tipped over and filled with water. "As soon as I can, I'm going to register to vote. I'm not going back to Mississippi."

Hotels, private homes, churches, cruise ships, gyms and campgrounds will continue to accommodate many of the displaced in coming weeks. An estimated 1 million people fled Katrina.

But disaster officials say they're moving to assemble and make livable up to 300,000 trailers and other temporary housing units in Louisiana and Mississippi as fast as they can find sites and arrange utilities, schooling and other necessities with cities and counties.

The federal government has stopped selling foreclosed homes in 11 states and will make as many as 5,000 available at no charge to Katrina's homeless. Public housing authorities across the country are scrounging for every vacant unit they can find to offer to evacuees who came from public housing in New Orleans and Mississippi. An estimated 5,600 units could be made available within 500 miles of New Orleans.

Many cities — Houston, Chicago, Detroit and Philadelphia — and counties — Allegheny County, Pa., and Miami-Dade — have offered housing for thousands more.

The number of people in Red Cross shelters had declined from a high of 203,917 in the days after Katrina hit to 61,610 by Wednesday. More than 550 shelters had closed, the Red Cross said.

The Red Cross has paid about $12 million in hotel bills and expects to reimburse a total of $100 million on behalf of an estimated 132,000 Katrina-displaced people who were in hotels in 46 states.

In Baton Rouge, where tens of thousands took refuge because it's just 80 miles northwest of New Orleans, shelter populations have dropped steadily. But the metro area of 450,000 is scrambling to cope with other effects of its newfound — if temporary — status as the state's most populous.

Mayor Melvin Holden is asking the Federal Emergency Management Agency for $10 billion to build schools, roads and sewers. Highway planners are trying to sort out the swollen region's traffic congestion. FEMA expects to station thousands of mobile homes in Baton Rouge for evacuees.

Mark Bielski has been staying with friends. Although his house in New Orleans' Uptown district remains intact, he's looking for a Baton Rouge teaching job. He says he'll return to New Orleans "as soon as the lights go on."

Others see Baton Rouge as their new home. Since Katrina, 1,100 houses in the area have sold, according to the local Realtors' association. Apartment vacancy rates slid from 8% to nothing.

Evacuees poured into Houston's Astrodome and other shelters, but nobody in Texas' largest city "knows for sure how many people are here or how long they intend to stay," says Frank Michel, a city spokesman. What they know is that 46,000 former Louisiana residents are living in hotels and motels and 16,000 Louisiana children have registered in Houston schools. The city has found more than 8,000 apartments and houses to accommodate 20,000 people.

Many places seemed to open their arms, then worry later about consequences. Arkansas, one of the nation's poorest states, took in more than 75,000 evacuees, second only to Texas. That amounted to more than a 2.5% jump in the state's population, but Gov. Mike Huckabee reminded residents of the help they get after frequent ice storms and tornadoes.

"By golly, we're going to be there to take care of them now," he declared. He said midweek that at least a third of the influx had left.

Other evacuees, particularly those stranded in New Orleans after the storm, ended up farther away. Oklahoma, Virginia, Kentucky, Illinois, North and South Carolina, Maryland, Ohio, Michigan, and California each sheltered 2,000 to 4,000. Florida and Georgia each took more than 1,300.

Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson found that evacuees in Philadelphia "have come to realize they might not go back to New Orleans."

"Of the families I talked to, 90% of the families have no desire to go back," Jackson says. "But that's not what I'm hearing from Texas. It's a whole different perspective."

Perspective may depend on circumstances. The new arrivals at Alabama's Wind Creek State Park get trailers 28 to 32 feet long; some would cost $40,000.

Red Cross volunteers "are helping me get baby clothes," says Suzanne Hughes, 18, from Kiln, Miss. She's 81/2 months pregnant and waiting for her fiancé to arrive.

"It's a really good community … families that have kids, and the kids get attached to the atmosphere here," Hughes says.

DOJ_NMG_0006303

Police officers patrol the park. Evacuees undergo background checks because the park could be home to 1,000 children. Evacuees are being hired as park workers. Sporting goods companies are donating fishing gear. South Central Bell is putting in phone banks, Dell is offering laptops. Cisco is providing Internet service.

"It would turn you into a Christian, even if you weren't," says Arthur Walker, 57, known as "Mr. A" when he worked as a palm reader in New Orleans' Jackson Square.

Hutchinson: FEMA Should Remain With Homeland Security (SDN)

By Don Dailey

Springdale (AR) Daily News, September 16, 2005

ROGERS -- The Federal Emergency Management Agency, buffeted in recent weeks over its sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, should not be separated from the Department of Homeland Security, said Asa Hutchinson.

Hutchinson, a gubernatorial candidate and the former undersecretary for Border and Transportation Security in the Department of Homeland Security, said in an interview before his remarks to the Arkansas Associated Builders and Contractors at the Embassy Suites in Rogers the federal government botched its response to Katrina, but breaking out the formerly independent agency would increase communication breakdowns and red tape in future disasters.

Americans and public officials pressured the Homeland Security Department into concentrating on defending against another terrorist attack to the detriment of planning for the much-more-likely natural disasters, and a better balance between the two is needed, Hutchinson said.

"You know there are going to be hurricanes and tornadoes. You don't always have terrorist attacks every year," Hutchinson said.

He also said there need to be increased roles for the federal government and the military during natural disasters.

Hutchinson commented on a recently released status report on the 9/11 Commission's recommendations to Congress. The report gave generally low marks in the areas of emergency preparedness and response, transportation security and border security.

Hutchinson said for the most part the low grades weren't due to leadership issues or poor policy, but sluggish funding from Congress.

"Our government has the right strategy and we're making progress," he said.

The Gravette native pointed to the three areas formerly under his purview the commission reported as having had "some progress," the highest grade given in any category in the status report.

The commission said "some progress" has been made in terrorist travel intelligence, developing a biometric entry-exit system and standardizing secure identifications.

The full status report can be seen at http://www.9-11pdp.org/press/2005-09-14_report.pdf.

In his remarks to the builders, Hutchinson acknowledged the fortunate timing in leaving Homeland Security earlier this year, calling it "one of those times when you didn't stay too long."

Americans Sour On FEMA (WSJ)

By John Harwood, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Americans sour on FEMA but want to restore its independence.

By two to one, a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows, the public holds an unfavorable view of FEMA after criticism of its Katrina response. But by 61%-20%, respondents echo Democrats like Sen. Clinton who say FEMA should be autonomous, as in her husband's presidency, not part of Homeland Security; majorities of conservatives and Republicans agree. (See poll results.1)

"It took a class 4 hurricane to...[move] a polarized electorate," say Journal/NBC pollsters Peter Hart and Bill McInturff. They liken erosion in Bush's ratings to Reagan's Iran-contra dip, and say Katrina's costs and link to gas prices make the effect unlikely to fade soon.

Homeland Security chief Chertoff's 17% negative rating exceeds his 13% positive, but 50% don't know him.

BLACKS AND WHITES agree on Bush-era progress in race relations.

Despite divide in Katrina reactions, 32% of blacks and whites say race relations have improved over the past five years. Just one in 10 say relations have gotten worse; 56% of both groups say they've stayed the same.

Ten years ago, amid affirmative action fights, both races were more likely to see deterioration. Bush aides search for Roberts-style woman to succeed Supreme Court Justice O'Connor; Attorney General Gonzales, who'd be the first Hispanic pick, and PepsiCo lawyer Larry Thompson, an African-American, are also contenders. But pluralities of women and Hispanics say Bush should disregard diversity and consider only "the best person."

ECONOMISTS SHARE public wariness of the hurricane's impact.

The 45% of Americans who say the economy has gotten worse in the past year matches assessments in spring 2003 amid job-loss concerns. Two-thirds see a big economic hit from Katrina, tracking forecasters' expectation of diminished employment and growth in coming months.

Fed next week weighs interrupting interest-rate increases; Wall Street bets no. Members of National Association of Business Economists, by 3-to-1, hail monetary policy as just right but call the deficit -- swelling because of Katrina -- "too stimulative."

Concern over gas prices is highest among young people; 40% of those under 35 call it the top economic issue.

THOUGH BUSH has taken a softer line toward the United Nations, Americans aren't feeling conciliatory. Two-thirds say they lack confidence in the world body, up from half, a decade ago. The survey's margin of error is 3.1 percentage points.

TRULY NEEDY? After winning a $250 million FEMA contract to use three ships for Katrina relief, Carnival Cruise Lines gets skeptical initial response to request that Congress exempt the proceeds from federal taxes. Separately, a White House aide dismisses rolling back jet-fuel taxes in response to post-hurricane price jumps, saying, "Our focus is on bailing out the French Quarter, not the airlines."

RED AND BLUE: Republicans are three times as likely as Democrats to cite looting in New Orleans as a top Katrina concern; Democrats were six times as likely to cite treatment of poor people. But partisans on both sides agree city residents stuck at the Convention Center and Superdome couldn't help it and shouldn't be blamed.

SELECTIVE IMPACT: Despite FEMA's woes, Katrina hasn't shifted confidence in federal government generally. Some 31% say Washington can be trusted to do the right thing at least most of the time, matching a June Gallup survey. After 9/11, confidence in Washington surged.

REPUBLICANS HOPE to dodge disaster fallout.

The party's ratings are unchanged from July, even as Bush slips; each party draws positive ratings from 37% of Americans. But Democrats' 32% negative mark is nine percentage points lower. Minority leader Reid launches online organizing drive next week linking activists with Democratic Senate campaigns.

Congress draws weak 29% approval rating, though that's not as bad as the 15% lawmakers received amid Perot's outsider 1992 candidacy. Some House Republicans look to shelve Social Security debate, but costs of Iraq war remain a cloud over 2006 midterm elections.

"We better continue to hit our benchmarks" for stable democracy there, says ex-Republican Gov. Engler of Michigan.

MINOR MEMOS: After Roberts's strong Judiciary Committee performance, Engler jokes, "He should be the stand-in for whoever we need confirmed" for any post.....Yet Roberts's 32% positive rating pales next to 83% for the Red Cross amid Katrina.

FCC Plans $211M To Rebuild Communications Cash Will Come From Universal Service Fund (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Federal regulators said Thursday that the government will spend $211 million to help rebuild communications links for those affected by Hurricane Katrina and will find ways to better protect such systems.

“We need to determine how we can help companies strengthen our communications infrastructure, create more robust and reliable networks, and improve the ability to quickly restore service when disaster does strike,” Federal Communications Commission chief Kevin Martin said at a special agency meeting in Atlanta to assess the effects of the storm.

Katrina knocked out landline and cellphone service for millions in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, hobbled police radio communications and wiped out 911 emergency service in many areas.

The absence of those vital links made it difficult for survivors to find relatives and for public-safety and emergency rescue officials to talk to each other, hampering their response.

The $211 million will come from the $6 billion-a-year universal service fund, which is financed by a 10.2% surcharge on every customer's long-distance bill.

Among other things, the fund subsidizes phone service for the indigent, helps bring Internet access to schools and improves communications systems for rural health care providers. Here's how the $211 million will be spent:

·About $51 million of the $750 million low-income program will provide wireless phones and 300 free minutes for needy evacuees and others still without phone service. The program also will pay to reconnect customers' landline phones.

DOJ_NMG_0006305

·About $132 million of the $2.25 billion "E-Rate" fund will help reconnect schools and libraries to the Internet.

·About $28 million of the $50 million rural health care program will help providers such as the American Red Cross better treat disaster victims. Special linkups, for example, let doctors get X-rays remotely over high-speed Internet lines.

Martin also said he will appoint a panel to recommend ways to improve communication among public-safety agencies during disasters. The FCC also will create a bureau to promote more reliable crisis communications for police, fire and national security agencies.

After the hurricane, various public-safety agencies often could not communicate because their radio systems operate on different frequencies.

At the meeting, industry officials reported dramatic progress in fixing phone lines and radio and TV stations.

About 305,000 BellSouth customers remain without phone service, many of them in the New Orleans area, down from 2.4 million. It could take months to completely restore service. About 75% of cellphone service has been restored.

Thirty-nine radio stations, seven Louisiana TV stations and 10 cable systems are still not operating.

FCC Seeks Crisis-Response Changes (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Christopher Rhoads, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

ATLANTA -- The Federal Communications Commission, after seeing how communications systems broke down after Hurricane Katrina despite four years of attempted improvements, proposed changes that would allow it to take a larger role in coordinating emergency communications and restoring telephone services.

The agency, which held a three-hour meeting at BellSouth Corp.'s emergency-response center here, also proposed releasing $211 million from the Universal Service Fund, which subsidizes phone services in rural areas and pays for school Internet connections. The money would be devoted to helping schools rebuild Internet connections and providing free wireless phones for hurricane evacuees. Phone companies also would be allowed to use money they normally receive from the fund to rebuild networks along the Gulf Coast.

Such a move is welcome news to phone companies in the region. BellSouth estimates it could cost between $400 million and $600 million to replace ruined equipment in the three-state area hit hardest by the hurricane.

Hurricane Katrina has raised questions about just how much more robust and secure the nation's telecommunications network has become since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Many of the same problems -- no power, no phone service and first responders unable to communicate with each other -- happened again. No single federal agency has responsibility to lead the effort, but FCC Chairman Kevin Martin's proposals yesterday suggested what could become a broader move away by other agencies from relying as heavily on leadership from the Department of Homeland Security.

Under Mr. Martin's proposals -- which require full FCC approval and, in some cases, congressional backing -- the FCC would be reorganized to include a new Public Safety/Homeland Security Bureau. The FCC also would assemble an independent panel to examine what happened to the phone networks and communications between first responders and how they might be improved.

During emergencies, the FCC gathers information about outages and assists the Federal Emergency Management Agency in coordinating help. After Hurricane Katrina, FCC staff remained on call 24 hours a day so phone services could be more quickly restored.

Mr. Martin is proposing that the FCC take a greater role than just helping to free up radio frequencies for first responders -- by helping to set interoperability standards and providing guidance for communities that are upgrading two-way radio equipment.

The responses to the Sept. 11 attacks and to Hurricane Katrina showed that the biggest problem facing emergency communications is so-called interoperability, or the capacity for responders to communicate with each other regardless of the type of equipment.

This was apparent to Laurie Feagans, the emergency-management director of Manatee County, Fla., when her team aided Hancock County, Miss. -- one of the hardest-hit areas of the storm -- after Hurricane Katrina. Not only was the Hancock County emergency-operations center without any form of communication, but even with her satellite phones, Ms. Feagans was unable to contact the Mississippi emergency-operations center, she said.

Similar talk was heard after Sept. 11 -- and scant progress has been made since then.

F.C.C. Chief Offers Plan to Get Phones to Hurricane Victims (NYT)

By KEN BELSON

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0006306

ATLANTA, Sept. 15 - Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, proposed on Thursday spending $211 million to provide phone and data services to consumers, schools and hospitals affected by Hurricane Katrina.

The money would come from the Universal Service Fund, which provides about $6.5 billion a year to support access to telecommunications services for rural and low-income consumers, as well as schools and libraries.

The proposal, made at an F.C.C. meeting here, would give evacuees cellphones and 300 free minutes and help customers reconnect their phone lines. Money would also be made available to schools, libraries, health organizations and relief agencies like the Red Cross to rebuild their phone and Internet connections.

Mr. Martin also proposed establishing a committee within the next two weeks to review the hurricane's impact on the region's telecommunications network, and assess what could be done to avert problems in future storms.

For instance, wireless service failed in many areas after the storm not just because 1,000 cellular towers were damaged, but also because of damage to the networks that connect the cell towers and landlines.

"The lesson from the storm is how connected all these networks are," Mr. Martin said. "No part of the network can be effective in isolation. We're all reliant on each other."

Industry executives testifying at the meeting, which was held at the office of BellSouth, the biggest phone provider in the Southeast, said that while phone companies have made steady progress repairing their networks in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, much still needs to be done.

Steve Largent, the chief executive of CTIA, a wireless industry trade group, said, "As an industry, we have never seen an event like this."

As of Thursday, 305,100 phone lines of the 4.9 million that BellSouth operates in the three-state area were still out of commission. One-quarter of the cellular sites were still not functioning, said Ken Moran, the director of the F.C.C.'s Office of Homeland Security. And seven television stations in Louisiana are still off the air, he said.

BellSouth said last week that it expected to spend up to $600 million to repair offices and networks damaged by Hurricane Katrina. By comparison, the company spent $200 million last year to restore equipment and service after four hurricanes hit the Southeast.

"It will take some additional time to understand the magnitude of the damage," said Ron Odom, the president of network services at BellSouth.

BellSouth said 11,000 telephone poles and 26,000 lengths of cable were knocked down by the storm. Of the 578 switching stations that BellSouth operates in the three states, just 16 were out of service on Thursday.

Mr. Odom, like many of the industry executives who testified, said that one of the biggest impediments to restoring telecommunications services and radio and television broadcasts was the lack of electricity.

Though many companies had backup generators that took over when electricity was knocked out, refueling the generators was difficult because of flooding and people shooting at supply trucks, executives said.

New Lines Of Communication (WP)

By Jonathan Krim, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

As crews rush to restore basic telephone and Internet services to areas ravaged by Hurricane Katrina, some executives, academics and analysts are urging a more ambitious approach: Make New Orleans and the surrounding areas super-connected communities, with advanced services that surpass what is available anywhere in the country, if not the world.

With many poles and wires reduced to sticks and spaghetti, cell towers down, miles of streets still flooded, and parts of the region uninhabitable for the near future, these experts see the perfect opportunity to deploy new systems that otherwise might be too expensive or disruptive to build.

The result, they say, could be a bonanza of higher technology at lower prices for businesses and consumers, more robust emergency-responder systems and an ability to provide high-speed Internet access to poorer segments of the population often left off of the information highway.

"The area ought to be a beacon for 21st-century communications in the United States," said Rey Ramsey, chief executive of One Economy Corp., a nonprofit organization that helps bring high-speed Internet service to inner-city communities. "We ought to go state of the art, and state of the art with a purpose."

Ramsey, who also is chairman of Habitat for Humanity International, said recreating New Orleans as a technology and communications mecca could be a key to its revival, drawing back shuttered businesses that are considering relocating and attracting new ones.

In addition, he said, "there needs to be an intentional effort to make sure that these benefits extend to poor people directly."

DOJ_NMG_0006307

The Federal Communications Commission yesterday announced a series of steps and proposed funding to help get the region's system running again.

And a broad hurricane-relief bill being drafted by Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) would earmark money to help low- and middle-income residents and businesses buy or lease computers and get access to high-speed Internet access at affordable prices.

But for several executives and analysts in the telecommunications world, that would be just a small beginning, though they acknowledge that their ideas are best-case and might never be enacted.

Sky Dayton, who founded Internet provider EarthLink Inc. and more recently has focused on wireless ventures, said the area need not bother reconnecting all its downed lines and should instead rely on existing cellular networks and additional systems known as WiFi and WiMax, which provide high-speed Internet access.

Dayton said the cost of such a network would be relatively low -- "a rounding error in the context of rebuilding a city." A series of small, electronic devices on top of buildings or lampposts and take signals from central towers and push them around to houses, offices or other "hot spots."

Such networks can also deliver Internet-based telephone service.

Several municipalities around the country have launched, or are considering building, government-owned or -operated wireless-Internet networks, so lower-income citizens can access the Internet more affordably. Those efforts have met with fierce opposition from the major telephone companies, which have successfully lobbied in several states for laws prohibiting governments from operating such networks if they compete with private industry.

Dayton, who heads a consortium between Earthlink and SK Telecom Co., a leading mobile-communications firm in South Korea, said municipal wireless-Internet networks should be public-private partnerships.

Jeffrey A. Citron, chief executive of Vonage Holdings Corp., a leading provider of Internet phone service, sees an opportunity built less around alternative technologies and more around opening up competition.

"I'd come up with a plan for a trenching system" for major thoroughfares in New Orleans while the city is largely empty and undergoing repairs, he said. High-speed, fiber-optic cables are hugely expensive to lay, so the dominant phone companies have typically been the only ones to do so.

Citron said the city could dig the trenches and make them available, for suitable fees to help cover construction costs, to any carrier that wanted to lay cables to provide services -- including voice, digital television and Internet access.

With more companies potentially competing, Citron said, prices would come down.

Bill Smith, chief technology officer for BellSouth Corp., the Gulf Coast's primary phone carrier, paused for several seconds when presented with this idea.

"I would say that might not make sense for us" if too many competitors meant the percentage of the pie for each was too low, he said.

Smith said BellSouth is committed to rebuilding with an eye toward providing state-of-the-art technology that is largely Internet-based.

The company hopes, for example, to one day let consumers set their home video recorders from their cell phones.

Alexander H. Good, chief executive of Mobile Satellite Ventures LP of Reston, said satellite technology, in addition to other systems, would provide a more disaster-proof communication system for emergency responders, including police, fire and medical personnel.

He said his company is readying two new satellites with new capabilities. Although the satellites service the entire country, they could be pointed to a particular area in an emergency to provided expanded service.

Anthony Townsend, research director at the Institute for the Future in California, pointed out that many of those high-flown ideas could run up against a fundamental problem: The services rely on electricity, which often goes out during such disasters. The nation must focus on finding more flexible ways of distributing power, he said.

Mississippi Sues To Make Insurers Pay Flood Claims (WSJ)

By Theo Francis, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood filed suit against five big insurers in that state yesterday, unleashing protest throughout the industry as he seeks to force the companies to pay for flood damage from Hurricane Katrina despite flooding exclusions in standard homeowners' policies.

The suit, filed in state court in Jackson, seeks to override the exclusions. It comes as tens of thousands of Gulf Coast property owners struggle with the cost of rebuilding homes damaged by the wall of water that surged with the hurricane Aug. 29. Standard homeowners' policies typically cover wind and other storm damage, but not flood damage. Flood damage is covered by a government-backed flood-insurance program, but fewer than one in four Mississippi properties in areas most at risk of flooding are insured through the federal program.

"You can't provide free flood insurance by rewriting contracts," said Jane Boisseau, a New Orleans native and co-chair of the insurance practice for law firm LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae LLP in New York, which represents many insurers. A spokesman for State Farm Mutual Insurance Cos., the nation's largest home and auto insurer, said the attorney general's move "threatens the foundation of the economy of the state" by attempting to undercut legal contracts. The insurers maintain they never collected any premium money from customers to cover flood damage.

Still, fighting the suit could be a public-relations problem. The U.S. insurance industry is in robust financial health, with more than $400 billion in capital. Also, the industry is legendary for lobbying clout and has a track record defending its contracts, which are approved by state regulators.

The lawsuit throws into sharp relief concerns that have increased as the extent of Katrina's destruction -- estimated at as much as $125 billion, with up to $60 billion covered by insurance -- has become clearer. Homeowners without government flood insurance typically must rebuild on their own or with low-interest government loans and limited grants. Complaints that smaller insurers are delaying and denying payments have begun mounting.

Besides State Farm, Mr. Hood's lawsuit names as defendants units of Allstate Corp., Mississippi Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance Cos., United Services Automobile Association, and Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co. The companies together last year wrote about 70% of Mississippi homeowners' policies. Companies that could be reached for comment yesterday generally said they hadn't seen the lawsuit but expected to prevail.

The suit seeks to void flood exclusions, arguing they are "unconscionable," unreasonably favorable to insurers and a "violation of the public policy of Mississippi."

The suit argues that policyholders bought insurance to protect property against hurricanes with the "reasonable expectation" it would cover flood and other water damage. It accuses insurers of deceptive trade practices. The suit argues that Mississippi law and court precedent require insurers to pay according to the original cause of damage, and that flooding from Katrina was caused by the storm and its high winds.

The suit argues the policies deprive policyholders of "meaningful choice."

Language in policies excluding flood and water damage is typically broad. One Gulf Coast policy form excludes coverage for "water damage," defined as "flood, surface water, waves, tidal water, overflow of a body of water, or spray from any of these, whether or not driven by wind."

Allstate's general counsel, Michael J. McCabe, said the company expects Mr. Hood's challenge to fail, in part because state regulators approved the contracts, "but while it's being adjudicated, it will delay and complicate the process." He said Allstate is paying covered losses "fairly and as swiftly as humanly possibly." Of the insurers sued, only Allstate is publicly traded; the rest are owned by policyholders.

A spokesman for Mississippi Farm Bureau called the suit "amazing" and said it "will take a long time to settle." Nationwide said that it is "deeply disappointed" by the lawsuit, and that voiding flood exclusions would hurt policyholders nationally.

A spokesman for USAA said that, while sympathetic to Gulf Coast residents who didn't buy flood insurance, "we cannot compromise the interests of our members who have covered losses by being forced to pay for uncovered losses."

Mr. Hood's lawsuit seeks to prevent any insurer from requiring policyholders to sign documents acknowledging flood or water damage to receive claim payments. In its statement, Nationwide said any suggestion that it had done this was "unfounded."

Mississippi Sues Insurers Over Damage From Storm (NYT)

By JENNIFER BAYOT

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

Mississippi sued the state's property-casualty insurers yesterday in an attempt to compel them to pay for a greater share of the damage wrought by Hurricane Katrina, firing a legal salvo that could drive away insurance providers even as it gives hope to homeowners displaced by the storm.

In a civil complaint filed in Chancery Court in Jackson, the Mississippi attorney general, Jim Hood, accused insurers of selling confusing policies that fell short of homeowners' reasonable expectations of coverage.

Mr. Hood argued that because property owners "purchased these policies for the primary purpose of insuring against any and all hurricane damage," insurers should be liable for property damage caused by flooding - a hazard long excluded from traditional homeowner policies.

DOJ_NMG_0006309

He is seeking a temporary restraining order to prevent companies from denying or reducing coverage based on water exclusions, or from asking property owners to sign documents stating that their loss was caused by water rather than wind. He said that people were being offered $3,000 in living expenses if they signed such forms.

"If they sign this form," Mr. Hood said, "they are giving up their rights. What the insurance companies are trying to do is lock them into saying it was flood damage."

Insurers said yesterday that the lawsuit threatened the viability of insurance coverage in Mississippi because it suggested that contracts were perpetually open to revision. They also protested that they were being asked to cover damage for which they had never collected premiums.

"Basically, it's changing the rules of the game during the game - after the game has been agreed to and approved by the state itself," said Michael J. McCabe, Allstate's chief legal officer.

Richard Ludke, a spokesman at State Farm, said the lawsuit threatened "to undermine the insurance industry's financial stability, and its ability to respond not only to its obligation rising out of Katrina but its ability to respond to other claims."

He added, "In essence, the attorney general is challenging the validity of contracts in Mississippi."

Strictly speaking, only the relatively few homeowners who bought separate flood policies from the federal government are entitled to such coverage. In Harrison County, Miss., where Gulfport and Biloxi were leveled, fewer than one in 12 homeowners did, according to federal data.

The Mississippi lawsuit seeks to turn that arrangement on its head at a time when far more policyholders appear to have been affected by flooding than after previous hurricanes. Storm surges like those that overwhelmed Gulfport and Biloxi are typically considered flooding rather than wind-driven; the flood damage in New Orleans has yet to be assessed.

Flood insurance for homeowners has been handled by the federal government since 1968, and several lawsuits since then have made arguments similar to Mr. Hood's and failed, said Mitchell L. Lathrop, of the law firm of Duane Morris, who specializes in reinsurance and insurance law.

"I think he's absolutely wrong because the flood exclusion has been a prominent part of property policies since at least the 1980's," Mr. Lathrop said.

Richard Scruggs, a Mississippi lawyer who played a leading role in a $250 billion settlement against the tobacco industry, said that he planned to file suits on behalf of thousands of Gulf Coast residents, demanding that insurance companies pay for flood damage. He said he already had 200 to 300 homeowners as clients and planned to file individual lawsuits next week.

Pension Plan Rules Relaxed

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 (Dow Jones) - Companies that sponsor 401(k)'s and similar retirement plans can make loans and other "hardship distributions" to Hurricane Katrina victims, the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service said Thursday.

The statement came as the House and the Senate passed tax-relief legislation for victims of the storm, which will allow penalty-free withdrawals from individual retirement accounts.

The Treasury and the I.R.S. said employees with 401(k) accounts as well as those at public schools and tax-exempt groups with 403(b) tax-sheltered annuities might be eligible for streamlined loan procedures and liberalized hardship distributions from their retirement plans.

These advantages may also apply to state and local government employees with certain "457 deferred-compensation plans."

The loans or hardship withdrawals must be made by March 31, 2006.

Joseph B. Treaster contributed reporting for this article.

Lawsuit Accuses Insurers Of Excluding Storm-surge Coverage Policies Unclear Sometimes (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood sued five insurance companies Thursday to force them to pay for storm-surge damage related to Hurricane Katrina.

The complaint, filed in Hinds County Chancery Court, claims that Allstate, State Farm, Nationwide, USAA and Mississippi Farm Bureau policies “attempt to exclude coverage for storm-surge damage” caused by the hurricane.

This is “an unfair or deceptive trade practice” under state law, Hood says. Hood also asked for a temporary restraining order to prevent insurers from paying policyholders to get them to sign waivers saying they have flood damage.

Homeowners' policies typically cover wind and sometimes wind-driven rain damage. Government-issued insurance covers flood damage. What's unclear is whether hurricane-caused storm surges are covered by homeowners' policies.

Insurers are expected to pay up to $60 billion in hurricane damages, with total economic damages likely exceeding $125 billion, Risk Management Solutions says.

Insurers say storm-surge damage is the same as flood damage. “Insurers have never collected a penny in flood-insurance premiums,” says Robert Hartwig of the Insurance Information Institute, an industry trade group. “If they're forced to pay, it could quite possibly be destabilizing and lead to the insolvency of smaller insurers in the area.”

Hood's move is unusual because it is out of step with the Mississippi Insurance Department. George Dale, the state's insurance commissioner, has warned insurers that when it's unclear how the damage was caused, the decision should favor policyholders. But he stopped short of saying insurers should cover hurricane storm-surge damage.

For years, insurance companies have said flood damage isn't covered under their policies, even if it results from an insured event such as a hurricane. A typical homeowner's policy, provided by the Mississippi Insurance Department, says this is the case “regardless of any other cause or event contributing concurrently or in any sequence to the loss.”

Hood says insurers don't mention storm surges. “I'm not going to allow an insurance company to bankrupt half of the families, businesses here … by pointing to the fine print that says that they should have known that our hurricane policy doesn't cover storm surge.”

State Farm says the lawsuit threatens to undermine the industry's ability to meet its Katrina obligations and respond to other claims in Mississippi and elsewhere. Allstate says it's “unfortunate that a lawsuit has been filed so early in the recovery process.” Nationwide says it's “deeply disappointed.” USAA says it can't let its members pay for “uncovered losses.”

The Louisiana attorney general's office says it's not planning a lawsuit. In Alabama, the attorney general's office says it's “premature” to talk about a lawsuit.

Programs Retrain Displaced Workers Hurricane Survivors Are Being Matched With New Jobs (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 16, 2005

JACKSON, Miss. — Thousands of workers displaced in the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast are being retrained in new programs stretching from Louisiana to Texas and Mississippi.

The programs are designed to find jobs for those forced to relocate or whose employers suspended operations, say state officials in Louisiana and Texas.

Many of the job seekers are likely to be placed in fields such as construction, health care, energy and cleanup, says Barton Smith, director of the Institute for Regional Forecasting at the University of Houston. Because many of them previously worked at casinos, retail shops and logging companies, they need to be trained, he says.

Community and technical colleges in Louisiana this week started a job-training program to match and prepare evacuees with jobs in construction, plumbing, welding and hazardous waste removal.

“We need as many people as possible to help rebuild the New Orleans area and at the same time get them work,” says Jim Henderson, senior vice president of workforce development and training at the Louisiana Community & Technical College System.

The federally funded program will probably operate out of 10 community and technical colleges, adult-education centers and mobile computer centers, Henderson says. Under the program, individuals are initially trained for a few weeks before receiving on-the-job training and apprenticeships.

“We'll work in any area that helps rebuild the city. I'll pick up the trash,” says Michaela Reid, 32, a former tour guide in the French Quarter. She, husband Andrew, 36, and their two children are staying in Austin but plan to return to New Orleans next week. The couple would like to train for jobs in computer science and law enforcement.

The city of Houston, a major gathering spot for evacuees, on Monday announced a major job fair to connect hurricane victims with local employers in the health care and energy fields, among other industries. An estimated 10,000 to 20,000 of the evacuees are likely to look for jobs in Houston, says the University of Houston's Smith.

The Texas Workforce Commission says it will receive a $75 million emergency grant from the U.S. Labor Department to help fund job-training and relocation programs.

Here in Jackson, state officials are offering job-placement services through the Workforce Investment Act, a 7-year-old federal program. A partnership with local employers provides on-the-job training, says Ross Tucker, vice president of MetroJackson Chamber of Commerce.

Many of the displaced are from storm-damaged towns on the Gulf Coast and in southern Mississippi, 150 miles to 200 miles away, and need jobs. And most of the jobs here are in government, health care and automotive — a far cry from the coast, where gaming, tourism and timber are the big industries.

Meanwhile, local businesses are hiring and training. D&D Construction in nearby Ridgeland, Miss., has hired a handful of people to build homes. Those without experience will be taught on the job, owner Daniel Phillips says. "This doesn't take a college degree."

In their haste to find work for the displaced, state officials say they must carefully balance their needs with those of the unemployed already in their regions.

"It's difficult to give one person an advantage over another because they were displaced by the hurricane," says Angela Griffin, branch director at Jackson Main Job Center, a state agency assisting the displaced. "Someone locally may have lost their job, too, because their business shut down because of the hurricane."

Displaced Health Care Workers Being Courted Areas With Shortages Advertising To Hire (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Displaced health care workers from New Orleans and the Gulf Coast are being lured with signing bonuses, relocation assistance and other perks by hospitals, doctor offices and clinics nationwide.

Classified ads in Gulf Coast newspapers and on websites encourage nurses, therapists, doctors and other health care workers to consider new jobs, either permanently or temporarily.

A shortage of medical workers in many parts of the USA almost guarantees that workers who leave the hurricane-battered areas will find work.

What's more difficult to know is whether the health care workers who accept new jobs will return.

"Recruiters are swooping down on Louisiana," says William Schumacher, who runs a Louisiana-based firm that provides medical staff to hospital emergency departments and is trying to keep doctors in the state. "My fear is that we are going to wake up three months from now when all the volunteers are gone, and there won't be enough staff."

The choice is tough for health care workers. Many are without jobs or income. Recruiters say they are helping, not poaching.

"Even if we didn't exist, these nurses and health professionals would go somewhere else because they have to," says Alan Braynin, CEO of Access Nurses, a San Diego-based staffing agency.

Braynin says temporary nursing positions, which generally last 13 weeks, are ideal for displaced workers.

"We can make the process simple for them to leave, but also to come back," says Braynin.

Some placement firms and companies seeking workers are offering only temp jobs; others are flexible.

San Luis Valley Regional Medical Center, a 59-bed hospital in rural Colorado, is advertising for nurses, physical therapists and radiation technicians for either permanent or temporary positions.

"This is our way we can help those people who have had so much devastation in their lives," says hospital spokesman Leonard Snow. "If they want to stay one month or four months, we'd be happy to accommodate them. If they like it here, we'll help them stay."

For some, the first question is: Should they leave? Amy Grace, an obstetrician/gynecologist who finished her residency and joined a five-doctor practice in New Orleans two months ago, is undecided. She doesn't know when she can return to the city or how many patients will come back. Yet, if she moves to another state, it could take her three to six months to get her license.

"My mind changes from hour to hour," says Grace, who is staying with family in Birmingham, Ala. "One minute I say, 'Yes, I'm going back.' And the next, I think, 'What happens when the next hurricane comes?' "

Katrina's Unsung Victims (WP)

By Jennifer Moses

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- I keep seeing pictures of the president with his shirt-sleeves rolled up, surveying the damage to New Orleans. But I wonder if he has any idea just who the folks are who have been displaced by Hurricane Katrina. I ask because here in Baton Rouge we keep hearing about the desperately poor, and sometimes criminal, hordes Katrina has washed up on the shores of decent, hardworking, middle-class America: the (mainly black) gangs from the projects who, even during normal times, wreaked havoc on their fellow citizens, not to mention the merely poor -- teen mothers, drug addicts, the chronically unemployed.

DOJ_NMG_0006312

But the shelter in which I've been volunteering tells a different story. At the convention center downtown, where the Red Cross is serving hundreds of evacuees, public schoolteachers sleeping in Area 2-C tutor the children of their "neighbors" in 2-B; teenage boys in high-tops and low-riding pants bring snacks to the people in wheelchairs; and, last Sunday, men whose paths had never crossed before sat huddled together watching giant television screens, rooting for the Saints and trading jokes.

Indeed, an aura of normality and order pervades even this bizarre community, built of rows and rows of folding canvas cots, donated bed linens and garbage bags filled with other people's castoff clothing, and peopled by the young and old, black and white, American-born and foreign-born: a United Nations of languages, a stew of stories.

The good news is that, aside from chronic shortages of underwear and canvas bags, people's physical needs are being taken care of, thanks largely to the thousands of Red Cross volunteers and others from all over the country and the world. We have one such volunteer, from London, staying at our house through October. Yet once the immediate crisis ends, "our" volunteer, and others like her, will be going home, as will the hundreds of journalists who, since Katrina hit, can boast that they can locate Baton Rouge on a map.

But what's Mike going to do? Mike is a fifth-generation Cajun New Orleanian. He's worked on the river barges his entire adult life. "I rode out Hugo," he said as he sat on his cot, an expression of pure bewilderment on his deeply lined face. "And I rode out Andrew, and both times we got back on our feet, but this time things is different." His house, his car and all of his belongings are gone; worse, he has virtually no savings and only the most minimal insurance.

And then there's Lydia, a middle-aged black woman who told me that just before the storm hit, the youngest of her five children graduated with honors from the University of New Orleans, joining her four older siblings in the ranks of college graduates. Lydia has worked as a special education aide in the New Orleans public schools for 25 years and two weeks, and so far this month she hasn't seen a dime from either the state or Uncle Sam. Her house? Underwater. Her savings? Nonexistent, all her extra pennies having gone toward her kids' educations.

John is a young man with striking, movie-star looks who arrived at the shelter alone, as his wife had died in the storm. He cried in my arms. Bruce is a retired professor of comparative literature. Randolph is a cook who'd worked for decades at the New Orleans fairgrounds and then at Mike Anderson's, a popular seafood restaurant. Barry and Sylvia had a landscaping business.

Not one of them has a home to go back to, investments to fall back on, or much in the way of savings or insurance. No pension funds; no IRAs; no stocks or bonds or country club memberships or family compounds in Maine or vacations in Europe or facelifts or Pilates classes or an opportunity to go back to school and finally get that doctorate in philosophy or the history of art.

What I'm learning in the shelters is that it's not just the poor who have no place to go and no place to fall back on; it's also ordinary working people who in better times might have been counted as part of the middle class, too.

Where are my new friends going to go?

New Orleans Residents Return Home (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper, Shawn Young, And Betsy Mckay, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Some New Orleans residents returned to their homes and businesses to begin cleaning up the damage left by Hurricane Katrina, and Mayor Ray Nagin said large swaths of the city would be reopened starting tomorrow.

Yesterday's announcement by the mayor amounted to an abandonment of efforts to persuade thousands of holdouts still in the battered city to leave. A New Orleans police spokesman said no one hunkered down in a home nearly three weeks after the storm hit would be forced out despite the lack of power and drinkable water in many parts of the city.

It isn't clear how many of the 180,000 residents -- roughly a third of the city's population -- allowed to return to their New Orleans neighborhoods will want to endure unpleasant living conditions ranging from piles of rotting food to a dearth of basic services. New Orleans public schools remain closed, and the school system has run out of money to pay teachers beyond the day before Katrina hit.

Still, Mr. Nagin's declaration showed that New Orleans is starting to recover much sooner than expected. Signs of recovery were evident yesterday throughout the French Quarter, where residents piled garbage along streets and said they were able to proceed through checkpoints without showing identification or special permits issued by city officials.

Business owners will be allowed to return to the French Quarter, central business district and other sections of New Orleans starting tomorrow. Algiers, a neighborhood of about 50,000 across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter, will reopen to residents Monday, followed later next week by areas that include the historic Garden District. French Quarter residents will be allowed to return Sept. 26.

In an interview, Mr. Nagin said he has "the final say" in deciding when it is safe for residents to return. "The health people are saying they are not seeing any significant risks."

The influx of returning residents worries some federal public-health and environmental officials, who have found high levels of lead in the water and sewage-related bacteria. Air-quality tests have found no significant levels of contaminants, according to the Environmental Protection Agency.

City's Coming Back, But Not To Normal Life (USAT)

By Laura Parker And Alan Levin

USA Today, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The city of New Orleans will reopen four unflooded neighborhoods, including the bawdy, historic French Quarter, to businesses and residents beginning this weekend.

"It is a good day in New Orleans. The sun is shining. We're bringing the city of New Orleans back. This is the first step," Mayor Ray Nagin said. "The city of New Orleans … will start to breathe again."

The death toll from Hurricane Katrina in five states stood at 794 people, 558 of them in Louisiana.

Although nearly half of New Orleans is still flooded, Nagin said he was allowing people to return over the coming week to large sections of the city that are dry. Nagin said about 180,000 people could return home to a city that held about 460,000 before Katrina hit.

"We will have life," he said. "We will have commerce. We will have people getting into … the rhythm that makes this city so unique."

The Army Corps of Engineers said that, barring rainfall, the city will be drained by Oct. 2.

Most of the city has electricity. But city water is largely undrinkable, schools remain shut, and thousands of waterlogged homes need to be pulled down and rebuilt. Levees need repairs, and a nighttime curfew will be in effect to hold down crime.

Those who return should not expect much, city officials said.

"Just because the electricity is going, it doesn't mean that all the gas stations are open," mayoral executive assistant Greg Mefert said. "The residents need to have very realistic expectations of how the city is functioning, and they can't expect complete normality and to go about their normal day."

Meanwhile, Mississippi was struggling to deal with the needs of hundreds of thousands of people whose homes were devastated by Katrina. FEMA said two-thirds of the homes in six coastal counties are uninhabitable. Mississippi sued insurance companies to force them to pay for storm-surge damage; many policies include provisions that exclude losses from floods.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration said Thursday that its analysis showed Katrina was the most destructive storm ever to strike the USA. Its maximum winds of 175 mph were slightly lower than Camille in 1969, but the huge size of Katrina made for much worse destruction.

The Coast Guard said Katrina may have spilled 7 million gallons of oil from facilities in southeastern Louisiana — two-thirds the amount spilled from the Exxon Valdez in Alaska 16 years ago.

'We Will Have Life,' Mayor Promises (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 -- The city of New Orleans will begin to reopen this weekend, Mayor C. Ray Nagin announced on Thursday, the first step toward reversing the unprecedented evacuation and closure of a modern American city.

The city has been largely shuttered, abandoned and militarized since the floods from Hurricane Katrina, but by the weekend, owners of shops, restaurants and other businesses may return to the portions of New Orleans that remained relatively dry, Nagin said. And by Monday, the first residents may begin to filter into the city neighborhood known as Algiers. Residents of Uptown and the French Quarter will follow.

The reentry plan will repopulate areas that, before the storm, were home to 182,000 people, or about a third of the city's residents.

"We will have life, we will have commerce, we will have people getting back into their normal modes of operation and the normal rhythm of the city of New Orleans that is so unique," Nagin said.

Formidable challenges remain, however, even for that third of the population that may return.

Authorities warned residents not to drink or bathe in the water in most of the city because contaminated floodwaters are seeping into waterlines through major breaks. The 911 emergency-call system is not fully operational. Even in the least affected areas, thousands of homes are without power, and the lack of traffic lights has led to accidents among some of the emergency vehicles rolling through city streets.

Asked whether the reentry plan may be premature, Nagin said, "I'm getting all kinds of push that I'm moving a little too slow."

Some residents have already begun sneaking into the city to assess the damage or retrieve clothes. A few have been pleasantly surprised.

Amanda Zirkenbach, 28, returned to her "shotgun double" home in the Mid-City section of New Orleans. With its fancy porch and balustrades, it is typical of many older homes in a city where as many as 37,000 buildings are in historic districts. It is also raised about five feet above the ground.

"The water just came up to the top of the front steps," she said of the home once occupied by her grandparents. "Those old architects knew what they were doing. They built them up higher because they didn't have the modern levees to protect us."

The news could be worse for other portions of the city, some of which may remain underwater until early October, authorities said. Of the 160,000 homes in the city, it is not known how many were destroyed by the flooding.

Nagin said he estimates that about 60,000 may be beyond repair. That could leave tens of thousands of former residents in shelters far away from home for months and possibly longer.

Viewed from the street, hundreds of homes that had been underwater and have since dried show little damage aside from the mud and a waterline. Elsewhere, old wood-frame houses apparently floated in the flood, smashed into one another and splintered. Experts say the structural integrity of many homes may have been undermined, and officials note that the worst damage may be in those homes that have been inundated for two weeks or more.

An official of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers said on Thursday that downtown New Orleans will be clear of floodwaters by Oct. 2, and the eastern part of the city by Sept. 30 -- which is a week earlier than previous estimates. Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes south and east of the city are also expected to be clear of floodwaters by the end of this month, earlier than predicted.

Col. Duane Gapinski said pumps are removing about 7 billion gallons of floodwater a day, although about 45 percent of the city remains inundated. Another official said the Corps has removed 240,000 cubic yards of debris.

Unsure whether businesspeople will return in large enough numbers to serve the residents, Nagin said he has contacted three major businesses about the possibility of temporarily setting up shop in the city's Convention Center and providing food and other necessities.

Health care is another concern, with floodwaters containing dangerous amounts of bacteria.

Nagin said Children's Hospital will be open for emergencies. But Brian Landry, a hospital vice president, said it will likely be a couple of weeks before the Uptown hospital could open its doors.

Landry said staff members who had evacuated will have to be brought back.

Aside from worries that damaged homes could collapse on returnees, another key concern for city officials is law and order.

Nagin touted the fact that, with the emptying of the city, it is "crime-free and drug-free" for the first time in years. "The bad guys have been rooted out," he said.

Authorities said they will do what they can to keep out the criminals who had plagued the city for years. They said the city will initially be under a dusk-to-dawn curfew.

Even though the New Orleans police force has dwindled from 1,750 to 1,350 officers since Hurricane Katrina, Police Superintendent P. Edwin Compass III expressed confidence Thursday that the diminished force could handle the task. "We have a much smaller city to police," he said.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration said Thursday that Hurricane Katrina was the most destructive storm to strike the United States, the Associated Press reported. State and local officials said the death toll as of Thursday was 558 in Louisiana and 218 in Mississippi.

Mayor Announces Plan To Allow Residents To Return (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi And Ashley Powers, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Declaring that his flood-scarred, depopulated town "will breathe again," New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Thursday that the city's historic French Quarter, downtown business district and other viable neighborhoods would reopen under a phased plan starting this weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0006315

Defying predictions that the city would stagnate for months until essential services were restored, authorities decided to allow residents and businesses to begin returning to their homes under a staggered resettlement plan.

As many as 180,000 residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina will eventually be allowed to move back into homes and apartments that escaped overwhelming flood and storm damage, the mayor said.

"It is a good day in New Orleans," Nagin said during a televised news conference. "The sun is shining. We're bringing New Orleans back. This is our first step. We are opening up this city and almost 200,000 residents will be able to come back and get this city going once again."

The move will quickly revitalize many of the city's iconic, picturesque sections: the iron-gated balconies and neon-lit strip joints of the French Quarter, the whitewashed Civil War mansions of the Garden District and the hotels and office towers of the Central Business District.

But even as he hailed his city's semi-return, Nagin also acknowledged that dwellings that housed half of the city's 450,000 residents will have to be razed. "Most of the homes that were flooded that stayed in the water for a number of weeks will most likely be destroyed," Nagin said.

Under a plan approved by Nagin and by state and federal officials, business owners will re-enter this weekend. Residents will follow, returning to lightly damaged west bank and central city neighborhoods next week and then to the French Quarter a week from Monday.

"We will have life," Nagin said. "We will have commerce. We will have people getting into their normal modes of operation, and the normal rhythm of the city of New Orleans."

The decision to open large swaths of New Orleans followed the rapid retreat of floodwaters that still cover 40 percent of the city, and swift progress by repair crews in restoring electricity and water service.

The tipping point, Nagin said, was good news that came in a recent round of government-conducted environmental tests. The results showed that remaining floodwaters still contain dangerous bacteria and chemicals, but that the city's air is safe to breathe.

The water, Nagin said, is "not good for you to drink or bathe in, just for flushing and firefighting. We're working feverishly to make sure the water quality gets better. We still have a couple of major breaks and contaminated water that is seeping in through the leaks."

Nagin gave a nod to state officials and to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, whose officials he had blasted a week before for failing to move quickly to aid the city. At his side Thursday was Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, who took over the federal relief effort from former FEMA director Michael D. Brown, who resigned on Monday.

"There has been an uncommon display of unity among federal, state and local folks to put together a re-entry plan," Allen said.

Nagin acknowledged that the city's returning population will not surpass 250,000 until the city replaces thousands of flooded and water-eroded homes -- a massive project that planners and officials say could take years.

A woman who identified herself as a resident of the Lower 9th Ward stepped up and asked Nagin when she could return to her neighborhood, where floodwaters receded only in the last several days.

"Water was up to the roof (in that area) up until three days ago," Nagin replied. "That's most likely the area that will be opened up on the back end" of the city's rebuilding effort.

In Baton Rouge, New Orleans evacuee George Richardson, 40, brightened at the thought of returning home. "Like in `The Wizard of Oz,' if I could clap my heels, I'd be home. If I had three wishes, that'd be one of them," said Richardson, a pathologist who has been sheltered since the flood at the Baton Rouge River Center.

Those returning to their homes in the next several weeks will do so at the risk of new flooding, a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers director said Thursday. Multiple breaches of the levees guarding Lake Pontchartrain will not be completely repaired until next June, said Daniel Hitchings, a regional business director for the Corps' Mississippi Valley Division.

Riccardi reported from New Orleans and Powers from Baton Rouge. Times staff writers Stephen Braun in Washington, Tony Perry in Houston and Ralph Vartabedian in New Orleans contributed to this report.

New Orleans To Open Some Neighborhoods (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 15 - More than two weeks after Hurricane Katrina devastated this city and prompted a mass evacuation, Mayor C. Ray Nagin announced a plan on Thursday for as many as 180,000 residents and business owners to return - at least during the daylight hours.

DOJ_NMG_0006316

Mayor Nagin, emphasizing that city services are still minimal, said that residents in certain areas could return to collect belongings and assess damage to their property but that they would be asked to leave at the end of each day.

The tentative re-entry plan calls for residents to be allowed into the Algiers neighborhood by the weekend. Uptown would be accessible by the middle of next week and the French Quarter on Sept. 26. The city's downtown and the other three areas will be open to business owners over the weekend. All are areas that suffered less damage from the storm. But, city officials said, the schedules may change.

"Our strategy is to repopulate the city in the safest areas first and to get enough critical mass going so that the economics of this center city start to flow," Mayor Nagin said. "Then, simultaneously, we will be involved in probably the biggest urban reconstruction project in the country's history."

But the mayor and other officials conceded that the details of how the plan would work remained unclear.

City Attorney Sherry S. Landry acknowledged that some residents might try to stay, and she said those who were out on the streets after dusk might be escorted from the city by military personnel.

Mayor Nagin said he hoped to have a computer system at entry points to track re-entering residents by Social Security number, date of birth and address. "Everybody's going to want to come," he said.

On Thursday, as the death toll from the storm statewide rose to 558, few traffic lights were working. Most water was undrinkable. A makeshift 911 system was still being run by the military. Floodwaters and sludge remained a health risk.

Power was being restored in some areas that are part of the plan, but not in others.

Still, the tentative re-entry plan was one of several signs that conditions were improving. In Houston, the Astrodome, which on Sept. 4 housed 17,500 evacuees, was vacated on Thursday. Many of its remaining 779 inhabitants were moved a short distance across a parking lot to Reliant Arena, part of the same complex. Other evacuees were moved out of the complex to residences.

The people remaining in another part in the complex, Reliant Center, are to be moved on Friday into the Arena, officials said.

In New Orleans, Mayor Nagin said that as many as half of the city's 160,000 homes might have to be destroyed, but that electricity is being restored rapidly to areas that can be saved, and minimal hospital and emergency services will soon be available.

The re-entry announcement came as officials of the Army Corps of Engineer warned that even in a moderate storm the repaired levees might not prevent new flooding.

Daniel Hitchings, regional business director of the Mississippi Valley Division of the Corps of Engineers, said the levees would be repaired to their prestorm standard by next June - in time for the 2006 hurricane season.

Mr. Hitchings said that water might breach some levees during a new rainstorm but that the flooding would not be "life threatening." Some houses in New Orleans, he pointed out, flood even "in a two-inch storm."

Mr. Hitchings said that Mayor Nagin had been briefed about the possibility of new flooding. Rainfall has been uncommonly low since the storm, allowing the Corps of Engineers to drain floodwaters faster than it expected.

Experts have met in Vicksburg, Miss., to consider how to armor the city against any hurricanes that might head for the damaged city.

One stopgap measure mentioned by some in the Corps of Engineers would create a wall atop the earth levees by driving corrugated metal into the soil and then capping the protruding metal with concrete.

After residents move into less damaged areas, Mayor Nagin said, those from heavily damaged areas, like the Lower Ninth Ward, will be given first preference to return. The government will "make sure that there are places for them," he added.

While returning residents may find a city vastly different from the one they fled, crime is now essentially nonexistent, the mayor said. "This city for the first time that anyone can probably imagine is drug free and violence free, and we are intent on keeping that way," the mayor said.

Parts Of New Orleans Will Be Reopened (WT/AP)

By Brett Martel, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- Mayor C. Ray Nagin yesterday said large parts of the city will reopen in the next two weeks, including the French Quarter, a plan that would allow about 38 percent of the population to return beginning Monday.

"We will have life. We will have commerce. We will have people getting into their normal modes of operations and the normal rhythm of the city of New Orleans that is so unique," Mr. Nagin said.

The return of residents to areas that suffered little or no flooding and were among the least-damaged parts of the city will mark the beginning of what federal officials predict will be the biggest urban reconstruction project in U.S. history.

"I imagine building a city so original, so unique that everybody's going to want to come," said Mr. Nagin, who predicted that half of the city's nearly half-million population would return in the next three to six months.

President Bush, several hours later in a prime-time address from the French Quarter's Jackson Square, vowed to rebuild the Gulf Coast, primarily with federal money, estimated at $200 billion or beyond.

"This great city will rise again," Mr. Bush said.

The re-population of the city would proceed by ZIP code, starting Monday in the Algiers section, a Creole-influenced neighborhood across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter. The city's Uptown section, which includes the Garden District's leafy streets and antebellum mansions, will open in stages next Wednesday and Friday.

The French Quarter -- the very heart and soul of the city's rollicking tourism industry -- will follow on Sept. 26.

"The French Quarter is high and dry, and we feel as though it has good electricity capabilities," the mayor said, "but since it's so historic, we want to double- and triple-check before we fire up all electricity in there to make sure that, because every building is so close, that if a fire breaks out, we won't lose a significant amount of what we cherish in this city."

The announcement came amid progress in restoring power and water service and the day after the release of government tests showing that the floodwaters still contain dangerous bacteria and industrial chemicals, but that the air is safe to breathe.

Mr. Nagin said there should be power in areas where people will be allowed back, an area where about 182,000 of the city's 485,000 residents live. But the water will be good only for flushing toilets, not for drinking and bathing, and there will be a dusk-to-dawn curfew.

Major retailers will use the city's convention center, where people fleeing floodwaters endured days of despair before help arrived, as a makeshift mall to sell returning residents food, wood and other things they will need.

Despite the good news, large sections of New Orleans remained accessible only by boat, and corpses could still be seen out in the open. In flooded streets near the University of New Orleans' campus along Lake Pontchartrain, two bodies were seen floating facedown, and the decomposed corpse of one woman was sprawled on the top step of a church, her skin wrinkled and leathery, her cane lying beside her.

Across five Gulf Coast states, the death toll from Katrina stood at 794, led by 558 in Louisiana.

In the hard-hit Ninth Ward, National Guard Col. Michael Thompson said his troops have seen the bodies of several people who had been killed.

"I've got a lot of police officers on my staff, and they recognize the signs of it. You'd see the entry wound of the bullet and the exit wound," Col. Thompson said. "So it was obvious that something had taken place other than natural death."

He said the two biggest challenges facing his troops were aggressive dogs and poor sanitation. He said pit bulls left behind by evacuating residents have formed packs and were attacking soldiers. One soldier was forced to shoot a dog that attacked him, he said.

Meanwhile, the Army Corps of Engineers said it is getting water pumped out of eastern New Orleans and nearby parishes faster than expected, and most of the area should be dry by the end of this month -- about a week earlier than estimated.

Tourism brings $10 billion to New Orleans annually and accounts for about 15 percent of the city's jobs. The city relies heavily on the dollars that tourists and conventioneers spend in the French Quarter's cafes, strip bars, jazz clubs, restaurants and stores. The dollars also feed the Quarter's cast of characters -- the street musicians, mime artists, palm readers, hot dog vendors, street artists.

Word of the reopening raised spirits in the neighborhood.

"There's no reason why this area shouldn't have been taken care of already -- it's where the money is," said Frank Redmond, who helps run a small French Quarter bar called Evelyn's Place. "If you want to get people back to work, get this area open, and the tourists, the curiosity-seekers, will want to come back and see what happened."

In other developments:

·Mr. Nagin asked mayors across the United States to take censuses of displaced New Orleans residents so the city knows where they are and can communicate with them about reconstruction.

·A total of 482 trailers have been delivered to chemical, natural gas and oil refineries in southwestern Louisiana, authorities said. Workers will live in them while they get the equipment running again.

·Thousands of hurricane survivors who took shelter in the Houston Astrodome packed their possessions yesterday and moved to the Reliant Center, a smaller building, where officials sought to consolidate the dwindling number of refugees who still don't have permanent housing.

About 3,600 remained in Houston's four main shelters, down from a high of 27,100.

Some Of The Uprooted Won't Go Home Again (WP)

HOUSTON, Sept. 15 -- Fewer than half of all New Orleans evacuees living in emergency shelters here said they will move back home, while two-thirds of those who want to relocate planned to settle permanently in the Houston area, according to a survey by The Washington Post, the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation and the Harvard School of Public Health.

The wide-ranging poll found that these survivors of Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath remain physically and emotionally battered but unbroken. They praised God and the U.S. Coast Guard for saving them, but two weeks after the storm, nearly half still sought word about missing loved ones or close friends who may not have been as lucky.

Most already know they have no home left to return to. The overwhelming majority lack insurance to cover their losses. Few have bank checking accounts, savings accounts or credit cards that work. Still, nearly nine in 10 said they were "hopeful" about the future. And while half said they felt depressed about what lies ahead, just a third said they were afraid.

"I'm setting goals for myself, and I'm ready to conquer them," said Lakisha Morris, 30, who was plucked from her roof and spent two nights outdoors on an interstate highway before boarding a bus for Houston. She said she wants to start her own business in this city, possibly day care for the children of fellow evacuees.

The poll vividly documents the immediate and dramatic changes that Hurricane Katrina has brought to two major American cities. It also suggests that what may be occurring is a massive -- and, perhaps, permanent -- transfer of a block of poor people from one city to another. That may have social, economic and political consequences that will be felt for decades, if not generations, in both communities.

Forty-three percent of these evacuees planned to return to New Orleans, the survey found. But just as many -- 44 percent -- said they will settle somewhere else, while the remainder were unsure. Many of those who were planning to return said they will be looking to buy or rent somewhere other than where they lived. Overall, only one in four said they plan to move back into their old homes, the poll found.

Some cannot wait. "Every morning I wake up and pray for them to say we can go back to New Orleans," said Lynette Toca, 26, a homemaker with two young sons who had never been outside her city before they drove to Houston the Saturday before the hurricane swept through on Aug. 29.

According to the poll, most of those who did not plan to go back to New Orleans are already living in their new hometown. Fully two in three of the 44 percent who will not return said they plan to permanently relocate in the Houston area, the city that now is home to about 125,000 New Orleans evacuees.

A total of 680 randomly selected evacuees living temporarily in the Astrodome, Reliant Center and George R. Brown Convention Center, as well as five Red Cross shelters in the Houston area, were interviewed Sept. 10 to 12 for this Post-Kaiser-Harvard survey. More than 8,000 evacuees were living in these facilities and awaiting transfer to other housing when the interviewing was conducted.

More than nine in 10 of these evacuees said they were residents of New Orleans, while the remainder said they were from the surrounding area or elsewhere in Louisiana. The margin of sampling error for the overall results is plus or minus four percentage points. Potential differences between these evacuees and those not living in shelters or those who lived elsewhere in the affected Gulf Coast region make it impossible to conclude that these results accurately reflect the views of all Gulf Coast residents displaced by Katrina.

The Post-Kaiser-Harvard poll suggests these evacuees will start their lives with virtually nothing. Seven in 10 currently do not have a savings or checking account. Just as many have no usable credit cards.

Missing, too, from their lives are the vital support networks of relatives and friends that have temporarily absorbed the bulk of those who fled the Gulf Coast storm zone: Eight in 10 said they have no one that they can stay with until they get back on their feet.

The poll suggests that the story of these evacuees is not merely about how little they were left with -- it is also about how fragile their lives were even before the storm hit. Together, the findings suggest the long-term challenges posed by the evacuees to local and state governments already cutting back services to their neediest citizens.

According to the poll, six in 10 evacuees had family incomes of less than $20,000 last year. Half have children younger than 18. One in eight was unemployed when the storm hit. Seven in 10 said they have no insurance to cover their losses. Fully half have no health insurance. Four in 10 suffer from heart disease, diabetes, high blood pressure or are physically disabled.

When illness or injury strike, they were twice as likely to say they had sought care from hospitals such as the New Orleans Charity Hospital than from either a family doctor or health clinic -- needs for costly services that now will be transferred to hospitals in the Houston area or wherever these evacuees eventually settle.

This survey suggests some of these emergency shelters may be forced to shelter evacuees for weeks and months, or perhaps longer. While half expected to be relocated to an apartment, house or with a volunteer family within a few days, one in five expected to be living in an emergency shelter for at least a few more weeks. Indeed, Houston officials said this week that they have delayed their goal of emptying the temporary shelters by this coming weekend, in part because so many of the remaining evacuees lack resources to set up households on their own.

The survey also provides disquieting clues as to why so many residents remained in New Orleans to face Hurricane Katrina despite orders to evacuate. A third of those who stayed said they never heard the mandatory order to evacuate issued by the mayor the day before the storm hit. Somewhat fewer -- 28 percent -- said they heard the order but did not understand what they were to do. Thirty-six percent acknowledged they heard the order, understood it but did not leave. In hindsight, 56 percent said they could have evacuated, while 42 percent said it was impossible.

Bad decisions, bad luck or sheer stubbornness kept many in town. More than a third said the single biggest reason they did not leave was that they thought the storm would not be as bad as it was, or they decided too late to flee. One in 10 simply did not want to leave. Slightly fewer stayed behind to protect their homes from damage or theft. A handful said they did not want to leave pets.

Angie Oneal, 44, a housekeeper from the Sixth Ward, heard the warnings to leave on her radio. But she stayed to protect her belongings.

"I said to myself, if we went through Bessie, I thought we could go through Katrina," Oneal said. "I thought it was just going to pass over." She worried about the new TV, computer and bedroom set she had just bought.

The days immediately after the storm but before they were evacuated to Houston were filled with terror, pain and uncertainty.

A third of the interviewees said they had been trapped in their homes and had to be rescued; four in 10 said they spent at least a day living outdoors on the street. Four in 10 were rescued by the Coast Guard, the National Guard, police officers or firefighters. Still, half said friends or neighbors helped them to safety (25 percent) or they managed to reach safe havens on their own (24 percent).

A majority said there was a time when they were without food or water. A third were trapped in the city without their prescription drugs. One in five managed to survive the storm, only to be threatened or assaulted by other survivors in the chaos that followed Katrina.

Religious faith has sustained the respondents through their worst days in New Orleans and now during their time in Houston. Eight in 10 said their faith was very important during the past two weeks. Remarkably, 81 percent said the ordeal has strengthened their belief, while only 4 percent said it weakened it.

"We say, God did this for a reason, to clean up the shootings and murders that have become New Orleans," said Dorothy Stukes, 54, a school security officer from Jefferson Parish who said she spent "four days of hell" in the Louisiana Superdome. "Ninety-five percent of us are good people, but now God is going to take care of those that are not."

While the hurricane drew most New Orleans evacuees closer to God, it further estranged many from their government and political leaders. Three-quarters agreed that the response was too slow "and there's no excuse." Seven in 10 disapproved of the way President Bush has handled the recovery effort. But majorities were also critical of Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (58 percent) and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (53 percent). Overall, six in 10 said the initially sluggish government response has made them feel that "government doesn't care" about people like them, according to the poll.

For Evacuees At Shelter, An Uncertain Next Step (WP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

DALLAS, Sept. 15 -- The Dallas Convention Center has been a strange but comforting replacement neighborhood for those whose real 'hoods were drowned by Katrina. Here, the miserable and the hopeful, thrown together by common circumstance, have been trying to sort out their futures.

The sorting has taken place in a gigantic parking garage-turned-shelter run by the American Red Cross. Many of the evacuees who have been living under bright fluorescent ceiling lights, their belongings stacked on cots and air mattresses, have never faced so many life choices so fast. Do I stay in the Dallas area or leave? If I take this apartment, will I be able to afford it in five months? If I take a job in the suburbs, how difficult will it be to get to work and back?

"It's like we-the-people versus an unknown," explains Melvin Hewitt, a Service Employees International Union rep from the Gentilly area of New Orleans.

The enemy is now the unfamiliar, the struggle one of the mind. Some evacuees are restless and desperate to construct new lives, and others are still processing the tragedy -- five days on an overpass, three days on a roof, alligators in the water, bodies floating by. They need a much longer respite from worry so they can heal.

DOJ_NMG_0006320

Peggy Lodge, who was folding donated clothes one late afternoon, separating summer from winter garments, said she wouldn't mind staying at the convention center for a year. "See, I got flashbacks now," said Lodge, a janitor on disability.

She was rescued by helicopter from the balcony of her mid-city New Orleans home, and now the sounds of a whirring chopper spook her. A helicopter sighting outside the convention center the other day spurred her to run back inside. "I can't deal with helicopters no more," she said, her voice cracking, her mama sitting nearby. "They came too late for us, they came too late."

Texas officials estimate their state has absorbed more than 200,000 Gulf Coast hurricane survivors, the majority of whom have scattered to apartments and hotels, churches and private homes. But approximately 20,000 remain in convention centers and sports arenas, the last resort for those who had nowhere else to turn or haven't yet decided where they belong.

In Dallas, however, time is running out for shelter residents. A coalition of city, church and business leaders is working furiously to implement an ambitious plan to place all of the convention center's inhabitants in housing by Sunday, to be celebrated by a Mardi Gras-style festival downtown. As of Thursday, the convention center's shelter population had dwindled to 200, from 1,500 a week earlier. Bishop T.D. Jakes, one of the nation's most prominent ministers and a key organizer of the effort, is calling it "Project Exodus."

The plan was hatched last week over a dinner at the home of Dallas Mayor Laura Miller. Among the guests were Jakes and New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin. Under the plan, shelter residents would be provided two months' free rent -- including utilities -- in an apartment or single-family home. They would be relocated close to public transportation and be given a package of basic household items -- pots and dishes, linens and towels. A host family would be assigned to ease their transition. 7-Eleven is selling Mardi Gras beads for a buck to raise money for the relocation. Kroger, the grocery chain, has agreed to donate gift cards.

But many shelter residents aren't so eager to go, as Project Exodus volunteers are discovering. The volunteers, in their hot-pink T-shirts, set up a table at the shelter but encountered some trepidation: Where exactly is Duncanville? What's it like in Pleasant Grove? Thus, some evacuees are simply being transferred to another shelter down the street. In fact, the shelter population at Reunion Arena, the city's indefinite way station, has doubled in two days -- from 300 to 600.

"They coming up with everything trying to get us out quick," said Debra Johnson of Uptown New Orleans who is traveling with two children, a husband, a sister-in-law and three nieces. "I don't know nothing about Dallas." Even though she's uneasy, she's willing to give Project Exodus a shot. "I feel like we came here from the Superdome, we've recuperated and it's time to move on," she said. "If I can survive the Superdome, I can survive anything."

What distinguishes the denizens of the shelter from other evacuees is they set up a community of their own in a building. There were hair-braiding sessions and card games, and one man even organized an outdoor barbecue. Informal leaders emerged to challenge the elected ones. When Nagin showed up at the shelter last week, it was union rep Hewitt who asked him some tough questions.

It's a surreal little world, though, living in a space roped off by yellow police tape, the living quarters marked by numbers on pillars, the pillars serving as de facto addresses, as in: I'm staying up at pole 82. Come check me out. Showers were taken outside, by schedule, in a hazmat decontamination tent. A line the length of two city blocks sometimes formed for a grilled-chicken dinner.

A social structure formed around six big-screen television sets. One TV was reserved for news, another for cartoons and other children's programming. The shelter's teenagers and twentysomethings commandeered another set -- must keep current with their pop culture, meaning must see the new videos of Kanye West and Omarion.

Gilbert King, a teacher's aide from St. Bernard Parish who was frustrated with the programming choices, tried unsuccessfully for several days to get a cable line run to a TV that was donated to him. "A lot of these people want to watch all this foolishness," complained King, who wanted to watch more public affairs programs. Nonstop movies were shown on a couple of the other televisions. The other day a bootlegged DVD copy of the recently released "Hustle & Flow" surfaced, to the screaming delight of evacuees.

They had everything they needed in this 200,000-square-foot parking garage -- from grief counselors to computers with Internet access. Just no privacy. Public address announcements were constant, as if you were living in an airport terminal. Police officers, Texas National Guardsmen, Red Cross and Federal Emergency Management Agency officials, medics, clergy and an army of volunteers all invaded the evacuees' limited space.

And don't forget the stars. Colin Powell came and so did Jamie Foxx, who served food in the chow line. Mary Hart of "Entertainment Tonight" arrived with a truckload of kiddie surprises from Toys R Us.

Separate from the shelter is a FEMA-run disaster recovery center housed in another hall of the convention center. This is where evacuees come to do serious business. FEMA gives them a checklist with 21 services and agencies to access -- from setting up a post office box to getting free bus passes, from obtaining food stamps to applying for a low-interest federal loan.

DOJ_NMG_0006321

National Travel Systems will arrange for a one-way plane or bus ticket to anywhere. The Internal Revenue Service hands out information about how to amend your 2004 tax return to claim hurricane losses and possibly get a refund.

These large shelters were never intended to be long-term solutions, merely a bridge. But in Dallas, at least, the bridge is about to shut down, forcing some instant decisions by people who are still contending with the awfulness of the past three weeks.

This internal struggle -- What to do? How to feel? Where to go? When to leave? -- was on display the other afternoon in a wandering conversation outside the men's bathroom of the shelter. The two Tyrones -- acquaintances in New Orleans, cot mates in the shelter -- took a squat in a couple of folding chairs.

They had been through the same experience but are of different minds about it.

Tyrone Horton, 39, a forklift driver back home, is focused on finding a job but is proceeding methodically. He has a work prospect in the suburban city of Irving, but he wonders how difficult it will be to get back and forth. He pulls from his pocket a business card from an AmeriSuites representative who offered a free two-week hotel stay.

It was a tempting offer, he admits, a chance to kick back in a real bed with a color television and a private shower. But then what? Without a car, Horton is hesitant to act too fast, feeling like he needs more knowledge of the city first. And yet he recognizes that he needs to get settled somewhere, for his own sanity. "Personally, I just want to get employed. I don't want an idle mind. Sometimes if you don't keep busy, that ain't too good."

The other Tyrone, Tyrone Jenkins, is in a different state -- dispirited, broken. He just sits while Horton is talking, stripping the label off a plastic bottle of Ozark water and then crushing it in his hands. Jenkins, 31, was a construction worker in New Orleans. "I lost a $15,000 car. I lost over $9,000 worth of clothes. I lost $20,000 cash. Now, I ain't got nothing." Jenkins pauses. "I want my car back. I want my clothes back. And I want my cash back."

Jenkins has a mouth full of gold teeth and no smile. He bears a slight resemblance to Mike Tyson. He is wearing Rocawear jeans and a blue-and-gold Rocawear hat, slightly tilted. Most of the clothes he lost in the storm were Rocawear, the hip-hop fashion line associated with rap powerhouses Jay Z and Damon Dash, and that's at the heart of how bummed he is.

But losing $20,000 in cash? That's the most curious of his losses. Jenkins explains that he doesn't believe in banks and had his cash stashed in a big brown grocery bag, hidden in his 2002 Buick LeSabre. Horton listens to Jenkins's story, his eyes conveying the look of utter disbelief. Twenty grand in a brown paper bag? Jenkins goes on: He has a brother on drugs and had to hide his money; otherwise it would've been stolen.

Horton interjects with a dose of common sense. "To say, 'I lost $20,000 and I want it back,' FEMA ain't giving you that back just because you from New Orleans and a victim of the hurricane."

Jenkins is too morose to respond. He has been wearing the same clothes for a week, and when it's suggested that free clothing from the Salvation Army is available, he just scoffs. "How I look walking around in some clothes from the '70s, looking like a hobo?"

Horton, an imposing dude clad in ordinary khaki shorts and a black pullover, has had enough of Jenkins's whining.

"Man, you fault everything," he chides. "Nothing come good from negativity. If you don't have patience, you going to end up at the Dallas County jail -- with no patience."

No response, so Horton tries humor.

"You'll be all right, brother, once you get those Rocawears back. You'll be like Superman."

But Jenkins clearly isn't in a playful mood.

"All jokes aside," Horton says, "we be thankful people. You got people who didn't make it, bro. People in the water. C'mon, man, it's bigger than that."

Jenkins concedes Horton has a point. But that's all he'll say. He just keeps crushing that Ozark water bottle.

New Orleans Neighbor Defends Closing Bridge To Evacuees (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2005

GRETNA, La. -- Little more than a week after this mostly white suburb became a symbol of callousness for using armed officers to seal one of the last escape routes from New Orleans -- trapping thousands of mostly black evacuees in the flooded city -- the Gretna City Council passed a resolution supporting the police chief's move.

"This wasn't just one man's decision," said Mayor Ronnie Harris on Thursday, as controversy continued about the move. "The whole community backs it."

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Gretna officers blocked the bridge over the Mississippi River that connects their city to New Orleans, exacerbating the sometimes troubled relationship with their neighbor.

DOJ_NMG_0006322

Gretna (pop. 17,500) is a stubborn blue-collar city, two-thirds white, that prides itself on how quickly its police respond to 911 calls; it warily eyes its neighbor, a two-thirds black city that is also a perennial contender for the murder capital of the United States. .

Deprived of power, water and food for days after Katrina struck, Gretna was suddenly flooded with thousands of people fleeing New Orleans. The smaller town commandeered buses and moved more than 5,000 to a food station miles away. As number of evacuees spilling into Gretna grew, tensions rose. After arsonists set the local mall on fire, Police Chief Arthur Lawson proposed the blockade.

"I realized we couldn't continue, manpower-wise, fuel-wise," Lawson said Thursday. Armed Gretna police, helped by local sheriff's deputies and bridge police, stood guard and turned hundreds of men, women and children back to New Orleans.

Gretna is not the only community that views New Orleans with distrust. Authorities in St. Bernard Parish, to the south, stacked cars to seal the roads from the Crescent City into their parish. But Gretna's decision has become the symbol of the ultimate act of a bad neighbor, gaining notoriety partly from of an account in The Socialist Worker by two San Francisco emergency workers and labor leaders who were part of a crowd turned back by Gretna police.

Gretna officials have been deluged with angry e-mails, accusing them of racism. On Thursday, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Gretna officials "will have to live" with their decision.

"We allowed people to cross ... because they were dying in the convention center," Nagin said. "We made a decision to protect people. ... They made a decision to protect property."

Paul Ribaul, a 37-year-old engineer for a New Orleans television news station and Gretna native, said that residents of Gretna and other suburbs ringing New Orleans share much in common.

"We say we're from New Orleans, but we're a suburb," he said. "The reason we don't live there is we don't like the crime, the politics."

Ribaul and many other Gretna residents praised the decision to close the bridge. "It makes you feel safe to live in a city like that," he said.

Critics have detected a racial motive, heatedly denied by most Gretna residents and city officials. Some residents say privately they're glad the city kept blacks out. Blacks in Gretna say that, though they get along with most of their white neighbors, a few harbor strong prejudices.

Still, Gretna's black residents are also wary of people from New Orleans.

"We don't have as much killing over here as in New Orleans," said Lesley Anne Williams, 42. Williams' mother, a lifelong Gretna resident, nonetheless disapproved of the Police Department's decision.

"They probably had a better chance of survival over here," she said of the refugees who were turned back, "especially with all that shooting" in New Orleans.

When Katrina hit Gretna, about 4,000 to 5,000 of the town's residents did not evacuate. Like New Orleans, Gretna lost power and water after Katrina hit. City officials pleaded for help from the state and FEMA but got no response.

Harris said Thursday he was satisfied that the refugees were turned back and that the bridge stayed closed for several more days.

"We didn't even have enough food here to feed our own residents," Harris said. "We took care of our folks. It's something we had to do."

Vietnamese Lose All, This Time To Katrina (USAT)

By Aimee Phan

USA Today, September 16, 2005

After years spent working and sacrificing to build a home and community in the USA, many Vietnamese-Americans have become refugees again. For these Vietnamese, this is the second major displacement within their lifetimes. For older people who escaped in the 1954 flight from the north to the south in the war against the French, this is their third mass evacuation.

While most Americans are still grappling with the chaos in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, Vietnamese-Americans have firsthand experience with such catastrophic loss. The almost unbearable prospect of being uprooted to an unfamiliar place, living in detainment camps, starting over from nothing, is all too familiar.

In the early '80s, Vietnamese refugees started settling into enclaves around New Orleans, Biloxi and Mobile, attracted by the familiar humid climate and seeking to earn livings as fishermen and shrimpers. They learned English and passed citizenship requirements. They worked multiple jobs, put children through school and saved money to buy homes. They established businesses, temples and churches. According to the 2000 Census, more than 25,000 Vietnamese lived in Louisiana, nearly 6,000 in Mississippi and about 5,000 in Alabama. They considered these places home when Katrina destroyed everything.

One advantage in being a former refugee is understanding when help is needed. As news of Katrina's devastation spread, Vietnamese-Americans across the country rallied to contribute to relief efforts. With the help of Vietnamese-language radio stations, newspapers and religious organizations, they donated money, food, supplies and even their homes to evacuees.

About 15,000 Vietnamese have fled to Houston, but instead of heading to the Astrodome, many have sought refuge in Asian-American community centers, churches and temples, straining their resources. Thousands more are expected. There is concern the community might be trying to do too much on its own and that evacuees need government help.

The news media coverage and critique of Katrina response have largely been a black-and-white issue. But the recovery of the Vietnamese-Americans is important too, given their long history of displacement. Their experiences and successes should not be forgotten just because they need to be repeated.

The destruction of 20-30 years of work and progress is still devastating. Starting over from scratch takes time, patience and energy, which right now seems impossible to those still exhausted from Katrina. Still, in the following years, it will happen. Vietnamese-Americans have already proven it's possible.

Accidents, Infections New Worry, Clinics Say (USAT)

By Anita Manning

USA Today, September 16, 2005

CHALMETTE, La. — Hurricane Katrina hasn't brought widespread epidemics to the region, officials with the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention say. “What we've seen is what we would expect,” says Ali Khan, who is directing the CDC's operation in the New Orleans area.

The complaints include accidental injuries and skin or respiratory infections. “Infectious disease outbreaks are not common following hurricanes,” Khan says, and so far, there have been none.

Nevertheless, “The challenge is a lot bigger than in other disasters,” Khan says. “We don't have a lot of experience evacuating a large city with this kind of infrastructure damage.”

Previous hurricanes, however, taught health officials the value of tetanus vaccination and careful hygiene in shelters.

Immediately after Katrina, only three of the 16 hospitals in the New Orleans metropolitan area remained open. With transportation and communications wiped out, medical workers did what they could. Emergency “clinics started to pop up in elementary schools, halls, other stable locations,” CDC epidemiologist Ryan Novak says.

This week, a team from the CDC in Atlanta visited a clinic here in St. Bernard Parish, which Hurricane Katrina hit hard. The clinic is one of 17 such emergency clinics and five hospitals the agency is working with to track trends.

Emergency medical specialist Ken Iserson and a Disaster Medical Assistance Team from Arizona arrived a week after the levees broke. The team of about 30 brought reinforcements to a group of local doctors who had set up a makeshift clinic in a building owned by ExxonMobil. The disaster shut down the company's refinery.

Now, in the midst of the ruined community here, they are serving 20-30 patients a day offering emergency care, immunizations and a pharmacy.

Patients who need more specialized care are airlifted out.

Doctors also care for members of the National Guard, rescue workers, police and firefighters, contractors and ExxonMobil employees.

More than 1,000 shots for hepatitis A, hepatitis B and tetanus have been administered, says Iserson, who is professor of emergency medicine at the University of Arizona Health Sciences Center in Tucson. Patients also come in for medicines for chronic diseases, such as high blood pressure or diabetes.

“We're starting to see our first wound infections,” Iserson told the CDC team of Novak, Micah Milton and Dawn Tuckey.

One surprise for CDC workers, Khan says, is how quickly the city is recovering. Officials expected it would be three to six months before businesses and residents returned, but that process is starting in some areas this weekend.

Among the health concerns returnees may face are molds, which can be harmful to people with weak immune systems or lung problems, and tap water that is contaminated and shouldn't be used for drinking, cooking or bathing. Other risks include gas leaks, live electrical wires and carbon monoxide poisoning caused by improper generator use.

Just over a quarter of those who have been treated in hospitals and clinics have suffered injuries, says Carol Rubin, co-leader of the CDC response.

“For the most part, (the injuries were sustained by emergency) responders, and they're trained,” she says.

When residents start to return to their homes, “we'll definitely see more injuries, with people using chain saws, falling off ladders, getting up on roofs,” Rubin says.

Hope Turns To Anguish At Intensive-care Unit For Some Severely Ill, There Was No Escape (USAT)

By Robert Davis

USA Today, September 16, 2005

The intensive-care unit at Lindy Boggs Medical Center in New Orleans was devastated. Just 48 hours after Hurricane Katrina struck, the hospital's generators had failed. There was no blood for transfusions and very little medication besides morphine.

One floor below the ICU, a plea had been written on a piece of cardboard: "Patients dying; please be respectful."

Today, the 187-bed hospital is empty; 19 bodies have been removed. But the story of the struggle to stay alive there in the dark days after the hurricane underscores the chaos, anger and desperation that overwhelmed the city.

"You think of a hospital as a place that gives treatment. But it had become kind of a medieval nursing facility. We were just providing comfort to the dying. That's what we were doing," says anesthesiologist James Riopelle, the last of the living to leave. "There was no good solution. There were only bad choices."

What happened on Wednesday, Aug. 31, in the hospital's intensive-care unit — recounted to USA TODAY by the relatives of two transplant patients and two of the last doctors to leave — reveals the horrifying choices and conflicting realities faced by those who stayed, or were left, behind.

For the two critically ill transplant patients and their families, hope quickly turned to horror when they learned that the rescue boats would be evacuating others instead. Ultimately, the two patients did get out after other patients had been evacuated by firefighters. They made it out thanks to two family members who refused to leave them and to a doctor who returned to ferry them out himself with a stolen boat.

"The whole thing," Riopelle says, "was just a big nightmare."

Inside Lindy Boggs that day, doctors began to prepare patients for evacuation, placing cards on each one with one of three letters: "A" meant they could walk out on their own; "B" meant they had medical problems that needed attention; and "C" was condition critical.

Those who got C's — the most desperate for care — were told they would be sent out first.

That all changed, the doctors and family members say, when firefighters from Shreveport, La., arrived and gave hospital staff members new rules for the rescue. The healthiest of the hospital's 120 patients would be evacuated first, the firefighters declared. The most ill or infirm — the C's — would have to remain. For how much longer, no one knew.

"Firefighters are used to trying to save everybody," Shreveport Fire Chief Kelvin Cochran says. "In this case, they were directed to save only those who had a chance of living. In some cases, that meant people who were breathing and had a pulse were left behind because in the assessment of their doctor, they wouldn't make it.

"That was what made it very difficult for the firefighters emotionally."

Thiagarajan Ramcharan, a transplant surgeon, knew that two of his patients, Laticia Young, 28, and Carl LaSalle, 32, had suddenly been moved from the top to the bottom of the evacuation list.

Both were critically ill. LaSalle was recovering from a liver and kidney transplant. Young, who had suffered from an autoimmune disease since she was 12, was considered too sick at that moment to survive a transplant operation, but doctors were trying to stabilize her so she could get a new liver.

"I had to tell them what the situation" was after the evacuation orders changed. "It was the worst thing," says Ramcharan, 35. "Both of these patients were awake. I can't imagine how I told them. I felt bad, and I didn't have an option."

Young's mother, Elaine Bias, and LaSalle's wife, Jessie, refused to leave the patients' rooms. "I said, 'This is wrong,' " Bias says. She had brought her daughter to the hospital and had no intention of leaving her there to die. But Ramcharan told her, "This is out of my hands. There's nothing I can do."

"I was going crazy because I felt that was wrong," says Jessie LaSalle. Looking back, she says, her husband wasn't being treated like he was human.

Bias and LaSalle were connected by fate before Katrina hit. Both were in the intensive-care unit playing the role of patient advocate for their daughter and husband, respectively. Both patients were under the care of the transplant team.

As the storm battered the city on Aug. 29, emergency plans kicked in at area hospitals. Generators powered breathing machines, and plans called for the sickest of the sick to be evacuated first.

Downstairs from the Lindy Boggs ICU, in the hospital's hospice ward, patients with cancer and other terminal diseases were already dying, most of them from heat and dehydration, according to Ramcharan. "Those patients did not have a chance for life at all," he says. He believes the hospice patients account for the bulk of the deaths at Lindy Boggs.

The hospice patients probably died by Tuesday, Aug. 30, Ramcharan says, within 24 hours after the storm knocked out power and sent temperatures in the hospital rising to nearly 100 degrees.

“They never knew what happened, and they would not have known what was going on,” he says. “They didn't suffer.”

But when the flood walls broke and the waters continued to rise Tuesday, the staff grew alarmed. Rescue crews were busy across the city plucking people in danger of drowning from trees and rooftops. There was no way for hospital staff to call for help, and no help came.

“I don't know if people were aware that there were so many people inside (the hospital),” Ramcharan says. “Every time we stepped out, the water was rising.”

Inside Lindy Boggs, the hospital began to slowly shut down as power, water and replenishments of medical supplies were cut off. “It became a trap,” Riopelle says.

The pharmacy was locked, Ramcharan says, as part of standard evacuation procedure. So the only medication available to the doctors was a stash of morphine that Riopelle says was left available so that pets — about 45 dogs, 15 cats and a pair of guinea pigs brought by staff and patients to ride out the storm — could be euthanized if that became necessary.

Riopelle, 56, chose to care for the pets instead of putting them down, and most of them were rescued alive days later.

But by Wednesday morning, with generators failing and patients facing their third day without medication, blood or basics such as clean sheets, one of the elderly patients in the ICU died.

For Bias and LaSalle, it seemed as if death was creeping toward them. “I saw them body-bagging people,” LaSalle says.

There was one “old patient and I don't know what the problem was,” Ramcharan says. “The morgue in the basement was flooded, so we could not take the patient away. He was there for a while.”

When firefighters in boats arrived at the hospital Wednesday afternoon, the plan was to move some of the patients to a dry spot where helicopters could land. But the Shreveport firefighters said those who were likely to die anyway had to stay behind.

Worse, “they said there was a good chance they would not show up tomorrow depending on orders from higher up,” Ramcharan says.

Doctors and hospital staffers huddled and decided that several of the patients in the ICU, among them Young and LaSalle, would be left behind. LaSalle and another patient were on ventilators to help them breathe. The firefighters said they could not take anyone who could not breathe on their own. Young was bleeding internally.

At one point, Riopelle says, he offered Bias morphine for her daughter in case she was in pain. Bias refused the offer. She and LaSalle say they worried that the morphine might have killed their loved ones.

Riopelle and Ramcharan say the dosage was small and would have caused no harm. But both understand why the women might have feared otherwise. Having already been passed over and with no rescue in sight, the families believed they had been left there to die.

By Wednesday night, with the hospital largely emptied and the air heavy with what LaSalle describes as an “odor of death,” the two women clung to the hospital beds in fear.

“I didn't want to leave him because I knew something bad was going to happen,” LaSalle says of her husband. “I was scared, but I knew the Lord was with us. I kept praying and finally he answered our prayers.”

On Thursday, Sept. 1, Ramcharan and other hospital staffers “borrowed” a boat, siphoned some gasoline from abandoned cars and returned to the ICU to get the patients.

When Ramcharan walked into the intensive-care unit about 11 a.m., LaSalle says, “he told us it was time to go.” The two transplant patients were carried downstairs — with LaSalle, 24, ventilating her husband by squeezing air into his lungs with a plastic bag — and placed into the boat.

Bias realized she had left her Bible upstairs. She asked the rescuers to wait and ran back up to the ICU. As she passed the room where the remaining patient lay, the woman reached out for her.

“It broke my heart,” she says. “If my daughter had been strong enough to walk, I could have carried that old woman out. But I just couldn't. I hated to leave her.”

Ramcharan and the other staffers delivered the patients and their relatives to a dry piece of ground near the local post office that was being used as a helipad.

The doctor took his sick patients to the front of the line. “In the end, he stood by us and got us out of there,” LaSalle says.

The patients landed in Dallas at Baylor University Medical Center, where Carl LaSalle Jr. is now awake and breathing on his own. His condition is improving. Jessie LaSalle says her husband still thinks he's in Louisiana. She blames his disorientation on the trauma of being left to die. They have a daughter, Alicia, who turned 5 on Sept. 6.

Laticia Young is still struggling to survive. Her mother fears she won't live for long without a new liver. Her three children, ages 9, 7 and 6, are staying with other relatives.

The doctors say Elaine Bias and Jessie LaSalle saved the lives of their loved ones by refusing to abandon them.

“I hate to use the word ‘abandon,' but that is what it was,” Ramcharan says, still shaken. He says he has had trouble sleeping since he got out of Lindy Boggs.

DOJ_NMG_0006326

"That was the worst night they ever had, and it was the worst night I had ever faced, too. I was absolutely stunned. Like Laticia's mom and the LaSalles, just like them, I was completely stunned."

Katrina's Impact On The Economy Comes Into View (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Hurricane Katrina's broader impact on the economy is becoming more apparent.

Thousands of individuals displaced by the storm have already filed for unemployment benefits and thousands more are expected, according to a Labor Department report. Meanwhile, gauges of manufacturing activity far from the Gulf of Mexico showed softening early this month, and economists and executives expressed concerns about rising energy costs.

Largely because of gasoline-price increases before Katrina, the Labor Department's latest consumer-price index rose 0.5% in August, pushing it up 3.6% from a year ago, the largest increase in four years. More than 90% of the prices used to compile the report were gathered before the storm struck, meaning steeper increases are likely to come.

Outside of energy, however, prices were up modestly; 0.1% for the month and 2.2% from a year earlier. Excluding both food and energy, the so-called "core" rate of inflation was up a modest 0.1% in August from the month before. Medical-care prices were unchanged, the first time they hadn't risen in nearly 30 years, largely because of a puzzling drop in the price of hospital services.

Taken together, the reports underscored the economy's turbulence since the storm hit at the end of last month. Energy-price increases hadn't been feeding broader inflation before the storm, though pressures seemed to be mounting.

That leaves officials at the Federal Reserve in a challenging spot heading into their meeting next week. They can raise the short-term federal-funds rate, the rate charged on overnight bank loans, for the 11th time in 15 months when they meet on Tuesday to forestall incipient inflation. Or they can pause to further assess the damage left by the storm.

First-time jobless claims rose 71,000 to 398,000, after seasonal adjustments, in the week ended Sept. 10, the Labor Department said. It was the highest level in two years. The department estimated Katrina accounted for 68,000 claims -- and that number is likely to be an underestimate, a department statistician said.

"We know there have been much more claims filed at the state level," he said. The filings were hard to count because of the "unprecedented" volume and "unconventional methods" used by the states to collect layoff claims, he said.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York said their indexes of manufacturing activity in the Northeast softened in early September, though they still showed the sector was expanding.

The Philadelphia's Fed index dropped to 2.2 in September from 17.5 in August. In September, 24.4% of the manufacturing executives surveyed in the region said business activity was increasing while 22.2% said it was contracting; the difference of 2.2 percentage points is the basis of the index. The New York Fed's index of manufacturing activity dropped to 17 in September from 23 in August. Projections of activity six months hence also declined, a possible sign of declining confidence, while estimates of the prices paid for materials surged.

In the Philly Fed survey, 86% of those surveyed said energy prices were having a negative effect on orders and production. Just 6% described the effect as "significantly negative." Meanwhile, economists surveyed by the National Association for Business Economics listed soaring energy prices as the nation's top short-run economic problem.

Storm Might Be a Factor as Fed Ponders a Rate Rise (NYT)

By EDMUND L. ANDREWS

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - At least so far, Hurricane Katrina does not appear to have blown the Federal Reserve off course.

As policy makers gear up to decide on interest rates on Tuesday, they are confronting a big short-term shock to the economy but most of the same long-term economic trends that existed before the hurricane.

The economic data for the period before the storm suggested that consumer spending held up despite rising gas prices, that companies were still hiring and that inflation pressures remained a cause for worry.

Many economists expect that trend to resume after a predictable drop in growth as a result of hurricane-related disruptions. On top of that, the Bush administration and Congress are about to rev up the economy with a staggering amount of federal money for relief and reconstruction.

DOJ_NMG_0006327

Many lawmakers are now predicting that the federal cost of Katrina could hit $200 billion - more than 10 times the amount for any other natural disaster. None of that spending, or the tax cuts being rushed through Congress, is likely to be offset by reduced spending in other areas.

It remains possible that the Federal Reserve will refrain from raising short-term interest rates next Tuesday, which would be the first time in 11 meetings that it held rates steady. The best reason to do that would be to wait for more evidence of the impact from the hurricane and the spike in gasoline prices in the last two weeks.

But that would be little more than a pause. Fed officials are likely to repeat past declarations that their policy is "accommodative," meaning that interest rates are still below normal and need to go higher, and they are likely to repeat their desire to raise rates at a "measured" pace.

"The main point is that when they sit down, they will conclude that what we want to do is to continue to remove the accommodative policy," said Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America.

Several pieces of new data on Thursday offered the Fed reasons to tread carefully.

Two surveys of manufacturers, by the Federal Reserve banks of Philadelphia and of New York, showed a big drop in new orders and expectations for the months ahead.

The surveys suggested that higher energy prices had begun to reduce expectations.

Asked by the Philadelphia Fed about the impact of energy prices, 58.1 percent of companies said they had had a slightly negative effect and 22.6 percent said they had had a moderately negative effect.

"The manufacturing executives who responded to the survey were significantly less optimistic about future growth this month," said Michael Trebing, a senior analyst at the Philadelphia Fed.

But Mr. Trebing cautioned that the surveys provided limited guidance, noting that the Philadelphia barometer plunged in June and bounced back in July and August.

In a separate report, the Labor Department reported Thursday that the underlying rate of inflation was surprisingly mild in August. Consumer prices jumped 0.5 percent, mostly because of gasoline prices.

The core rate of inflation, excluding food and energy, was only 0.1 percent in August, and those prices were up only 2.1 percent for the year.

Fed officials tend to view jumps in energy prices as one-time events rather than a source of permanent inflation, and a low rate of core inflation is normally a cause for relief.

But many economists predicted on Thursday that high energy prices would lead to higher prices generally, and that core inflation was likely to be much higher in September.

Fed officials were already worried about other sources of inflation, like rising wages and slowing productivity growth, and several policy makers have expressed concern that high energy prices could lead to expectations of higher long-term inflation.

"Rising oil prices, like other unfavorable price shocks, can also feed through and raise underlying core inflation," Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, warned on Sept. 7. "So there is also a risk on the inflation front, and the risk is higher now than it was a year ago."

Ben S. Bernanke, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers and a former Fed governor, predicted on Thursday that Hurricane Katrina would lead to only a temporary slowdown in economic growth and employment.

"Katrina's effects may reduce growth in the short run, but the longer-term growth trajectory remains in place," Mr. Bernanke said in a speech to the National Press Club.

The problem for Fed officials is that the data so far provide no conclusive evidence about the full economic impact of Katrina and the energy price shock.

If the impact on growth is small, a decision to keep interest rates low could aggravate inflation. If high energy prices pinch spending and shatter confidence, higher interest rates could add to the problem.

But as one analyst pointed out, there is nothing the Federal Reserve can do to speed the repair of oil refineries along the Gulf of Mexico or to accelerate job creation for people evacuated from New Orleans.

Gov't Credit Cards For Katrina Draw Fire (AP)

By HOPE YEN, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers and watchdog groups worry that allowing federal employees to charge up to $250,000 on their government-issued credit cards for Hurricane Katrina-related expenses will lead to a repeat of past abuses.

Some of the cards in the past were used to pay for prostitutes, gambling activity, even breast implants, government audits have shown.

DOJ_NMG_0006328

"People are concerned this is a risk," said Greg Kutz, managing director of special investigations at the General Accountability Office, which conducts audits at the request of Congress.

About 250,000 federal employees have government credit cards, which typically have a purchase limit of $2,500. At the request of the Bush administration, Congress increased the credit line to $250,000 as part of a massive Katrina recovery bill approved last week. The aim is to make it easier to speed aid to victims.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said the "outrageous increase" was "slipped" into the bill. He is seeking to insert language in a Katrina health bill that would reduce the limit in most cases to $50,000.

Responding to initial criticism, the White House issued new guidelines this week saying agencies must designate in writing which of their staff will receive the new spending privileges. Purchases of more than $50,000 must be preapproved by a senior manager.

"Substantial financial controls already exist but we are currently looking at what additional protections might be useful. If in working with Congress, agencies, and state and local leaders it is determined that additional safeguards are required, then we'll put them in place," Alex Conant, spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, said Wednesday.

Critics say the additional oversight is needed because the cards offer special opportunities for abuse.

Purchases are billed directly to the government, making it difficult to recover losses from wayward federal employees intent on fraud because of the time lag from the purchase date to subsequent billing.

Cronyism also is a danger, as officials have more leeway under the higher limit to purchase more expensive supplies from politically connected companies without the benefit of open bidding and competition. Even if they're detected, time-strapped agency directors often don't pursue disciplinary action, according to audit reports.

In recent years, several GAO audits found hundreds of thousands of dollars of improper expenditures at the Pentagon and other agencies, from purchases of remote control helicopters and airline tickets to Palm Pilots and $2,500 flat-panel computer monitors. Someone even bought a dog.

Navy personnel also in 2002 used separate government travel cards to hire prostitutes at brothels, gamble and attend New York Yankees and Los Angeles Lakers games. One civil employee ran up nearly $35,000 in personal expenses over two years, including breast enlargement surgery for his girlfriend.

The GAO has noted improvements in agency oversight since then, including reducing the number of government cards from more than 500,000 to 250,000 to limit the potential for fraud from lower-level government employees. The Pentagon also has said it installed software to help track when potentially suspect purchases are made.

But as recently as last year, the GAO cited continuing oversight problems at the Veterans Health Administration and said it had no way of knowing - without conducting specific audits - whether improvements at other agencies are actually in effect and working.

The concerns prompted Grassley, as well as Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, the top Democrat on that committee, last week to urge congressional leaders to officially lower the cap to $50,000 to ensure full compliance.

Collins has also signaled separately she might consider creating a special inspector general to monitor spending and no-bid contracts.

"Imagine the fraud we could see," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the watchdog group Project on Government Oversight, noting that recent abuses involved cards with much smaller purchase limits of $2,500.

"For bigger purchases involved in the rebuilding effort, that should involve competition and serious planning. Instead we have far too many people with far too much access to money without any organization or effective oversight," she said.

Civil Rights Group Urges Freeze On Mortgage Foreclosures For Hurricane Victims (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

Find Law, September 16, 2005

(AP) - WASHINGTON-As Hurricane Katrina brought into focus the financial plight of many blacks along the Gulf Coast, a leading U.S. civil rights group urged lenders to freeze mortgage foreclosures and suspend late fees on loans for people affected by the hurricane.

"There are a few steps that can and should be taken by all financial institutions to ensure that the people of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and the other areas affected by Katrina are not further victimized and do not suffer further losses," Hilary Shelton of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said Wednesday.

Speaking to members of a House Financial Services subcommittee, the director of the NAACP's Washington bureau Shelton, said the civil rights group also was concerned about predatory lenders who "must be circling some of the worst-hit areas, salivating at the potential for abuse" of Katrina's victims.

Alabama Congressman Spencer Bachus, the panel's chairman, said federal banking regulators need to help banks in the disaster zones by relaxing some rules.

The storm's devastating impacts on the poorest communities in the Gulf Coast starkly illustrated the differences in how minorities and whites are treated by banks.

Many poor people lost their cash savings, much of it stashed under mattresses and in teapots. Around the country, many low-income minorities shun banks, have never used an ATM machine or applied for a home mortgage. Often, they turn to storefront payday lenders, which charge high interest.

At all income levels, blacks are far more likely to be given high-cost, "subprime" mortgages than whites, according to a Federal Reserve analysis of home lending data.

Most banks and mortgage lenders in the affected areas are letting customers postpone payments on consumer, commercial and mortgage loans.

In a related development, two key Republican lawmakers announced they had drafted a legislative change that would require some of the profits of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to go to financing housing for low-income people in areas hit by Katrina as well as in those where survivors now live. The proposal by Congressmen Michael Oxley of Ohio, and Richard Baker of Louisiana, was being included in legislation before the House to tighten government oversight of the two companies, which together finance more than three-quarters of the home mortgages in the country.

Studies in recent years have shown that a much larger share of black and Hispanic homeowners pays higher interest on their mortgages than do whites in similar circumstances.

The studies have found that disproportionate numbers of blacks and Hispanics have subprime mortgages, which are high-interest loans to homeowners deemed riskier because of tarnished credit histories or other factors. Such home loans are said to be concentrated in minority communities at far higher levels than in white neighborhoods.

The Fed report released Tuesday reviewed home lending data for 2004. It found that percent of blacks and 20 percent of Hispanics got high-interest loans, compared with 9 percent of non-Hispanic whites.

The data did not necessarily indicate widespread discrimination against minorities, the Fed analysts said. The study did not take into account borrowers' credit ratings. Still, even after adjusting for differences in income and location of homes, it found that blacks are nearly twice as likely as whites to get more expensive mortgages.

Bankers from Louisiana and Mississippi who testified at Wednesday's House hearing laid out a list of requests for action by Congress. It included a fund that would allow the government to buy loans of borrowers affected by Katrina who are unable to make payments on them.

A few banks may need direct government aid in addition to remain in business, C.R. "Rusty" Cloutier, president and chief executive officer of MidSouth Bank of Lafayette, Louisiana, told the subcommittee.

"Community banks will be essential to the survival of communities in the affected areas," Cloutier said. "Small businesses will only be able to rebuild if community banks are healthy and able to respond to their needs."

Officials of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. have said there could be problems for banks in the region whose customers are unable to repay loans, but the effect would be mitigated when disaster relief kicks in. The banks in the area generally were in a strong financial condition before Katrina hit, regulators and bankers say.

La. Frees Prisoners To Ease Crowding (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 16, 2005

BATON ROUGE — Kevin Dunkley and Ernest McFadden waited to board a Greyhound bus to Dallas and start a new life.

The two men are among about 1,000 inmates released in the past week by the Louisiana corrections department to ease crowding caused when two large prisons flooded.

All the released inmates had been in a 90-day prison program — suspended last week — for parole- and probation-violators who get extensive counseling while incarcerated. None has a record of violent or sexual crimes, said Cecil Goudeau, program manager for the Louisiana division of probation and parole.

“These were minimum-security people,” Goudeau said. The released inmates will remain on probation or parole and be tested for drug use.

“They were just released to the streets a little earlier,” Goudeau said.

Dunkley, 26, and McFadden, 20, are cousins who have spent their lives in New Orleans. Their nearest relative is in Dallas.

The two men were released Monday from the state prison in Angola, where they had been taken after Hurricane Katrina flooded the prison in New Orleans.

About 8,200 inmates from New Orleans and nearby Jefferson Parish were moved to other state and local prisons.

DOJ_NMG_0006330

McFadden and Dunkley said they began the 90-day prison program after they failed drug tests — a violation of their parole for drug dealing.

The two men rode a bus Monday to Baton Rouge with a dozen other released inmates, Dunkley said. They have form letters explaining their release "due to exigent circumstances created by Hurricane Katrina" and a $10 check from the state.

After they spent Monday night at a Red Cross shelter, a priest bought them bus tickets. The parole office gave them approval to leave the state. If they want to stay beyond 30 days, the Texas parole office will have to agree to supervise them, Goudeau said.

Dunkley never wants to see New Orleans again: "I want to try to do something different."

White House Backs NASA Plan For Vehicles (New York Times)

By William J. Broad

New York Times, September 16, 2005

The White House has approved NASA's plan to replace the nation's aging fleet of winged spaceships with a new generation of vehicles meant to carry human explorers back to the Moon and onward to Mars and beyond, aerospace experts said yesterday.

The new rockets and spaceships are a radical departure for the space program, rearranging the components of the space shuttle into a new design expected to be more powerful that the shuttle but also safer. The shuttle has had two fatal accidents in 114 missions.

"It's a thumbs-up for NASA to pursue the shuttle-derived vehicle," said John M. Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University and an adviser to the NASA initiative. "The question is the schedule, not the basic approach."

Other experts, who refused to be identified because the space agency will not formally announce the proposal formally, also spoke about the plan yesterday.

The redesign proposal was first reported in August by agency officials and private experts. Unlike the shuttle, the new vehicles would separate the jobs of hauling people and cargo into orbit and would put the payloads atop the rockets - as far as possible from the dangers of firing engines and falling debris, which were responsible for the accidents that destroyed the Challenger in 1986 and the Columbia in 2003.

But by making the rockets from shuttle parts, the new plan would draw on the shuttle's existing network of thousands of contractors and technologies, in theory speeding its completion and lowering its cost.

The plan has been ready for unveiling for roughly six weeks but was held up because of delays in White House approval.

Yesterday, the aerospace experts said Michael D. Griffin, NASA's administrator, met with White House officials on Wednesday and won a preliminary approval for the project despite continuing questions about how to pay for it.

One problem is that the existing shuttle is still consuming a large share of the agency's budget. A complicating factor, they added, is growing fiscal pressure on Washington because of the government's unexpected need to help rebuild New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

The Bush administration has called for the shuttles to be retired by 2010. Dr. Griffin had wanted the first of the replacement vehicles to be ready to fly by 2011. But the experts said yesterday that the earliest conceivable date for the first flight of the replacement was now 2012.

The smaller rocket, for carrying people, would still dwarf the shuttle, which stands 184 feet high. The larger one, for lifting heavy cargoes and spaceships but not people, would rise to a height of some 350 feet, rivaling the Saturn 5 rockets that sent astronauts to the Moon.

In theory, the cargo hauler would have its first test flights in 2016 and 2017 and first hurl people toward the Moon in 2018, the experts said.

Social Security Legislation Could Be Shelved (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds will recommend to the House Republican leadership that the party drop its effort to restructure Social Security, at least for this year, House Republican aides confirmed yesterday.

Reynolds's move, first reported yesterday on the Web site of the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call, is fresh evidence that Hurricane Katrina is having a dramatic impact on the GOP's agenda. House and Senate leaders had already pushed off consideration of cuts in taxes and entitlement spending until the end of October. President Bush's tax reform panel has delayed release of its recommendations.

Now, Social Security legislation, which already faced a steep uphill climb, might be shelved indefinitely. Senate Republican leaders had decided they could not move on Social Security until the House did. But with the Senate at a stalemate, House political strategists want to pull back as well.

"With everything else that Congress has to deal with, from Katrina to immigration to . . . who knows, there's just so much on the plate, never mind that the Senate is bogged down in [Supreme Court] confirmation hearings," said a House GOP strategist, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the full House leadership has yet to render a final decision. "Why would you want to make vulnerable members take a vote on something that's not going anywhere? You could make the case that it would be suicide."

Reynolds (R-N.Y.) made his stand in a showdown with House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), according to two witnesses. At a committee luncheon Wednesday, Thomas told panel members he was pushing forward with broad retirement security legislation that would include measures to strengthen private pensions, promote personal savings and add private investment accounts to Social Security.

Reynolds then stood to say he would recommend to the leadership that it do no such thing.

Thomas would not comment on the events. "I don't talk about closed-door meetings or what went on in closed-door meetings, and if someone who was in a closed-door meeting did, they're doing a great disservice to their colleagues," he said.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said he could not confirm the events either. Until Reynolds makes his agenda recommendations to the full GOP leadership, Forti said he would not discuss Reynolds's views on Social Security.

But he did not deny the report.

"It's more than just Katrina," said a different House Republican aide, pointing to sky-high gasoline prices, anger over the war in Iraq and President Bush's sagging approval ratings.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee pointed out other factors: Republican lawmakers' own low approval ratings and continuing struggles with ethics questions.

David John, a proponent of Social Security private accounts at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said Reynolds's views are well known but hardly the last word. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the previous NRCC chairman, was also a vocal opponent of Social Security legislation, arguing that it could be politically disastrous.

"This is pretty much business as usual at the NRCC," he said.

Health Premiums Rise 6.6% (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

Health insurance premiums for federal employees and retirees will rise an average of 6.6 percent next year, the lowest increase in nine years, the Bush administration said yesterday.

Still, an official with one federal employee union branded the increase "outrageous," noting that average employee contributions to their health premiums will rise faster than the portion paid by the government.

Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, which oversees the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, said the government has consistently provided workers more health care options while doing its best to hold down costs.

"[W]e are maintaining a high-quality health-care program that provides excellent benefits at a reasonable cost," Springer said in a statement.

Next year's increase will be the government's smallest since 1997, when average premiums rose 2.4 percent. Independent studies predict a 10 percent increase in health insurance premiums for private sector employees next year, OPM officials said. Federal employees will have 279 health care plans to choose from, up from 249 this year.

An employee with the standard family coverage under Blue Cross and Blue Shield -- the most popular plan, covering more than half of all participants -- will pay $17.53 more in premiums every two weeks, bringing the biweekly cost to $135.59. Standard coverage for an individual will rise by $7.36, to $58.07 biweekly.

Across all plans, a federal worker with family coverage will pay an average of $12.79 more in premiums every two weeks, for a total biweekly cost of $130.17. At the same time, the government will contribute $16.83 more toward that worker's health coverage, for a total biweekly cost of $306.82. The worker's portion of the premium will rise 10.9 percent, compared with a 5.8 percent boost in the government's portion -- the disparity that rankles the union.

DOJ_NMG_0006332

"Federal workers are once again being short-changed," said Enid Doggett, a spokeswoman for the American Federation of Government Employees.

Similarly, for an individual, the average will rise $5.30 every two weeks, for a total biweekly payment of $57.66. The government's contribution for that individual's coverage will rise $7.71 every two weeks, for a total biweekly payment of $134.98. That is a 10.1 percent increase in what the individual pays, and a 6.1 percent increase in what the government pays.

The program provides health insurance coverage to about 8 million government workers, retirees and their family members worldwide, including many in the District, Maryland and Virginia.

Staff writers Stephen Barr and Eric Yoder contributed to this report.

Nationwide Survey Includes Data on Teenage Sex Habits (NYT)

By TAMAR LEWIN

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

The National Center for Health Statistics released the government's most comprehensive survey of American sexual practices and reproductive health yesterday, delving for the first time into such sensitive areas as the prevalence of oral sex among teenagers and same-sex activity among adults.

Oral sex among teenagers has in recent years become a topic of rampant speculation and little solid data, apart from a 1995 Urban Institute study of adolescent boys. The new statistics confirm that study's findings that oral sex is very much part of the teenage sexual repertory. According to the survey, more than half of all teenagers aged 15 to 19 have engaged in oral sex - including nearly a quarter of those who have never had intercourse.

Among the findings in the new study, "Sexual Behavior and Selected Health Measures," were the following:

¶Men age 30 to 44 have had a median of six to eight sexual partners in their lifetimes; women's median was about four.

¶Among both men and women age 15 to 44, about two-thirds have had only one sexual partner in the last year. Ten percent of the men and 7 percent of the women have had three or more partners in that time.

¶About 4 percent of men and women described themselves as homosexual or bisexual, but in a finding that surprised the researchers, 14 percent of the women aged 18 to 29 reported at least one homosexual experience, more than twice the proportion for young men.

The report offers new information about homosexuality in the United States. Among adults ages 15 to 44, almost 3 percent of men and 4 percent of women reported having a sexual experience with a member of the same sex within the past year, and over their lifetimes, 6 percent of men and 11 percent of women had such experiences. About 1 percent of men and 3 percent of women had had both male and female sexual partners in the previous 12 months.

Nearly 6 percent of all men ages 15 to 44 reported having oral sex with another man at some time in their lives, and nearly 4 percent reported having anal sex with another man.

The data comes from the 2002 National Survey of Family Growth, a survey of 12,571 men and women ages 15 to 44. The survey contractor was the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research, which trained more than 200 women to collect the data by having the subject answer sensitive questions on a computer, without revealing the answers to the interviewer.

Although the National Center for Health Statistics has periodically conducted that survey among women for 32 years, the 2002 version was the first to include both sexes, and to move beyond fertility and child-bearing into broader questions of sexual behavior and sexual orientation.

The new findings on teenagers and oral sex have been of special interest to health experts.

"After years of provocative headlines and breathless stories based mostly on anecdote, we finally have some solid data," said Sarah Brown, director of the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy. "The news is probably not as bad as adults might have been led to believe, but it is likely not as good as most parents might wish."

The proportion of teenagers who have given or received oral sex was slightly higher than the proportion who have had intercourse, the survey found, with 55 percent of the boys and 54 percent of the girls having given or received oral sex, while 49 percent of the boys and 53 percent of the girls have had intercourse.

"One thing that surprised me is that we expected, based on anecdotal evidence, that girls might be more likely to give oral sex and boys more likely to receive it, but we didn't find that at all," said Dr. Jennifer Manlove, of Child Trends, which, like Ms. Brown's group, released an analysis of the data, "There's more gender equality than we expected."

The government data does not provide any indication of the age at which oral sex first occurred, how often it occurred, or how many partners a teen had had. But the survey found that nearly all teenagers who have had sexual intercourse have also had oral sex: 88 percent of the boys and 83 percent of the girls.

"A very significant proportion of teens has had experience with oral sex, even if they haven't had sexual intercourse and may think of themselves as virgins," Dr. Manlove said. "We're not sure whether these teens who have not had sexual intercourse are engaging in oral sex because they view it as a way to maintain their technical virginity or even because they regard it as an easy method of birth control."

While many of the findings in the government report parallel those of the last large-scale study of American sexual behavior, a 1992 study of 18- to 59-year-olds by the University of Chicago's National Opinion Research Center, the lead author of the new study said it found a new and unexpected increase in lesbian activity among young women. It may not be such a surprise among those of college age, who speak of LUG's - lesbians until graduation.

"There are signs of change among 15- to 29-year-old women, a group of women too young to have been be included in the 1992 study," said William Mosher, the lead author.

When asked, "Have you ever had any sexual experience of any kind with any female?" 14 percent of the 18- to 29-year-old women said yes, compared with slightly under 10 percent of the 30- to 44-year-olds. That difference was surprising, Dr. Mosher said, since on questions about lifetime experience, older people usually report more than younger ones.

The study also asked about sexual attraction. Among men 18 to 44, 90 percent said they thought of themselves as heterosexual, 2 percent as homosexual, 2 percent as bisexual and 4 percent as "something else," findings similar to those in 1992.

Among women, 86 percent said they were attracted to only men and 10 percent "mostly to males." In the 1992 survey, only 3 percent said they were "mostly" attracted to males.

Ophelia Inches Along The N.C. Coast Storm Pounds Outer Banks (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 16, 2005

ATLANTIC BEACH, N.C. — Hurricane Ophelia's soaking crawl through this state seemed unending on Thursday as it battered beach towns up and down the coast.

From Atlantic Beach north to Cape Hatteras and Nags Head, Ophelia whipped rain, wind and surf hour after hour. Even seasoned hurricane hands marveled at the storm's endurance.

A weakened Ophelia could smack Massachusetts' Cape Cod this weekend. Tropical storm watches have been issued there. And North Carolina will still feel its winds today.

“I've been through five hurricanes, and this is the worst,” said Linda Massengill, 42. “That was the longest night of my life. We're talking about high winds for 18 hours, and between 1 and 5 this morning, the whole house was shaking. I won't do this again. I'll leave.”

Damage was significant because the storm stalled off the coast. Rather than a brief lashing, people withstood hours of a relentless 80-mph blast.

The storm gnawed siding from homes, pulled down power lines and peeled off the roofs and smashed signs of several businesses elsewhere in town. The surf hurled rocks the size of basketballs onto a parking lot. Traffic lights, blanked by power outages, dangled in the wind.

Ophelia spared some of the more populated tourist towns of the Outer Banks, such as Nags Head, from major damage. But the Cape Hatteras National Seashore took a pounding. Ophelia spun just off Cape Hatteras with sustained winds of 75 mph and barely moved at a speed of 3 mph.

Bad luck for Ginger Pharr and Kat Clewy. The two had come to Atlantic Beach to train for a triathlon. They spent the night with their dog, Bella, listening to Ophelia howl.

“It was such a slow mover, that made it seem a lot worse than it was,” said Pharr, 48.

State Highway 12, the two-lane road that runs down the narrow spine of the Cape Hatteras Seashore, was mostly deserted late Thursday.

Squalls battered the island. Sand, blown from towering seaside dunes, covered the road like a fresh coat of gray and beige snow. In spots, it drifted several inches deep.

Not enough to deter Matt Krieger. He and Ellie, a golden retriever-Labrador mix, sloshed in the surf at Oregon Inlet. Baitfish banged their snouts on the side of a bucket at his feet.

Krieger, 43, of Virginia Beach, Va., monitored Ophelia's plodding pace and direction on The Weather Channel and decided that Thursday looked like a fine day for fishing.

“I've been through so many of these,” he said. “The worst is definitely over.”

Ophelia Brings N.C. Heavy Rains, Minimal Flooding (WP)

By Alan Cooperman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BUXTON, N.C., Sept. 15 -- After lashing the North Carolina coast for two days and testing the post-Katrina readiness of disaster agencies, Hurricane Ophelia appeared on Thursday to be weakening and heading back out to sea.

Although the Outer Banks islands of Ocracoke and Hatteras were still in danger of heavy winds and surging water, the hurricane's slow and meandering path spared most coastal areas of the severe flooding that had been predicted.

By evening, its winds were blowing about 75 mph, just enough to earn Ophelia classification as a hurricane. Authorities blamed one death on the storm, from a rain-slicked traffic accident inland near the state capital of Raleigh.

A hurricane warning for North Carolina's coast was scaled back to a tropical storm warning, which extended north to Cape Charles Light, Va., including the mouth of Chesapeake Bay. With the storm tracking to the north, a tropical storm watch was issued for southeastern Massachusetts, including Cape Cod, Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard.

But here on the Outer Banks, residents were breathing easier: Ophelia turned out to be more like a drunken sailor than a belligerent one, bumping and bruising the coast before staggering off in circles.

Watching its movement on weather radar was like "watching someone make a funnel cake, just dripping the batter all around," said Tony Spencer, emergency management director for North Carolina's coastal Hyde County.

Determined to avoid a repeat of the response to Hurricane Katrina, federal, state and local authorities had gone into high gear early in the week.

They positioned five swift-water rescue teams, each made up of 50 National Guardsmen, a few miles inland along the state's entire coast. They ordered evacuations in dozens of low-lying areas, bringing 2,000 people into 45 shelters at schools and community centers Wednesday night, according to Bill Furney, spokesman for the state Division of Emergency Management.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, still under fire for its response to Katrina, stationed 250 workers along the coast and put Coast Guard Rear Adm. Brian Peterman in charge of the federal response to the hurricane.

But as Ophelia stayed off the coast and slowly moved north, parallel to the barrier islands, coastal communities began cleaning up fallen debris and counting their blessings.

"All of our roads are passable. All our shelters are closed, and people have gone home," said Rose Faucette, an emergency worker in Beaufort County, which has been pummeled by past hurricanes, including Isabel in 2003. "We were very lucky."

State officials said Ophelia knocked out electricity to 240,000 customers on Wednesday. By Thursday morning, the number without power was down to 80,000, and utility crews were quickly restoring telephone and electrical lines.

The biggest remaining concern was an expected surge of water Thursday night from the Pamlico Sound across the southern Outer Banks, which officials feared could flood beach houses and cut off roads. "That's when you'll see most of the flooding," Gov. Mike Easley (D) said at a morning briefing.

Earlier, the hurricane's sustained winds had blown the water toward the mainland, exposing as much as a mile of sand on the bay side of Hatteras Island.

Despite a mandatory evacuation on Hatteras and Ocracoke, hundreds of local residents remained in their homes. Here in Buxton, a small town on Hatteras, Keith Gray, 40, put on an orange anorak and went scavenging with his son, Aaron, 16, for valuables in the exposed sand.

The wind blew out a side window of their pickup truck, but they pulled a claw hammer and some other tools from the empty basin of the Buxton Harbor Marina, where half a dozen boats were sitting on their exposed keels. They had to shout to be heard in the 60-mph wind.

"Is that a jet?" Aaron asked, looking up as a powerful gust swirled sand against his bare legs.

"Just the wind," his father said.

Severe Hurricanes Increasing, Study Finds (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

A new study concludes that rising sea temperatures have been accompanied by a significant global increase in the most destructive hurricanes, adding fuel to an international debate over whether global warming contributed to the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0006335

The study, published today in the journal Science, is the second in six weeks to draw this conclusion, but other climatologists dispute the findings and argue that a recent spate of severe storms reflects nothing more than normal weather variability.

Katrina's destructiveness has given a sharp new edge to the ongoing debate over whether the United States should do more to curb greenhouse gas emissions linked to global warming. Domestic and European critics have pointed to Katrina as a reason to take action, while skeptics say climate activists are capitalizing on a national disaster to further their own agenda.

According to data gathered by researchers at the School of Earth and Atmospheric Sciences at Georgia Tech and the National Center for Atmospheric Research, the number of major Category 4 and 5 hurricanes worldwide has nearly doubled over the past 35 years, even though the total number of hurricanes, including weaker ones, has dropped since the 1990s. Katrina was a Category 4 storm when it made landfall.

Using satellite data, the four researchers found that the average number of Category 4 and 5 hurricanes -- those with winds of 131 mph or higher -- rose from 10 a year in the 1970s to 18 a year since 1990. Average tropical sea surface temperatures have increased as much as 1 degree Fahrenheit during the same period, after remaining stable between 1900 and the mid-1960s.

Georgia Tech atmospheric scientist Judith A. Curry -- co-author of the study with colleagues Peter J. Webster and Hai-Ru Chang, and NCAR's Greg J. Holland -- said in an interview that their survey, coupled with computer models and scientists' understanding of how hurricanes work, has given the researchers a better sense of how rising sea temperatures are linked to more-intense storms.

"There is increasing confidence, as the result of our study, that there's some level of greenhouse warming in what we're seeing," Curry said. "Is it the whole story? We don't know."

Higher ocean temperatures result in more water vapor in the air, which, combined with certain wind patterns, helps power stronger hurricanes, Webster said. Small increases in sea temperature, he added, can "exponentially provide more and more fuel for the hurricanes."

Other studies and computer models also have pointed to an increase in storm intensity: Massachusetts Institute of Technology atmospheric scientist Kerry A. Emanuel wrote last month in the journal Nature that the duration and maximum wind speeds of storms in the North Atlantic and North Pacific have increased about 50 percent since the mid-1970s. The storms' growing violence stemmed in part from higher ocean temperatures, he concluded.

Some researchers, however, question the connection with more severe hurricanes and cyclones. Gerry Bell, the lead seasonal hurricane forecaster at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, said the rise in strong hurricanes reflects a natural weather pattern spanning several decades. Hurricanes in the Atlantic Ocean were more powerful in the 1950s and '60s, weakened in the 1970s, '80s and early '90s, and have strengthened again since 1995.

"It's not linked to global warming or anything like that," Bell said. "This is normal climate variability. It's just that this trend lasts for decades."

Florida State University meteorology and oceanography professor James O'Brien, who writes for the online free-market journal Tech Central Station, said his survey of government data on Atlantic storms between 1850 and 2005 shows that "there's no indication of an increase in intensity."

But both Emanuel and Gavin Schmidt, a climatologist at NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, said today's Science paper is important because it examines worldwide hurricane patterns.

"If you look at it on the global basis, it makes that signal of global warming easier to see," Schmidt said. "You have to be extremely conservative -- with a small 'c' -- to think [rising sea temperatures and stronger hurricanes] are not related."

And some hurricane experts who previously have questioned the influence of global warming now say the evidence is mounting that it has contributed to recent intense tropical storms.

Florida International University researcher Hugh Willoughby, who headed NOAA's hurricane research division between 1995 and 2003, said the recent two hurricane studies are "very persuasive" and helped move him "toward the climate corner" of the debate.

"It's really hard to find any holes in this, and I'm the kind of person who's inclined to look for holes," he said of the new study in Science. The arguments against the connection between climate change and more intense storms, he added, are "looking weaker and weaker as time goes by."

Katrina reanimated a transatlantic argument over global warming policy as critics of the Bush administration have seized on it to promote mandatory limits on greenhouse gas emissions.

"The American president shuts his eyes to the economic and human damage that the failure to protect the climate inflicts on his country and the world through natural catastrophes like Katrina," Germany's environmental minister, Jurgen Trittin, wrote in an opinion piece printed Aug. 30 in the Frankfurter Rundschau newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0006336

But Bill Holbrook, spokesman for Environment and Public Works Committee Chairman James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), said the senator has no intention of pushing for new emissions curbs.

"It is reprehensible for a politician to promote an agenda by twisting a tragedy Americans feel so deeply about, particularly when there is no merit to his ideas," Holbrook said of Trittin. "Policy decisions should be based on sound science, and the notion that Katrina's intensity is somehow attributable to global warming has been widely dismissed by scientific experts."

Arguing that the science of global warming remains uncertain, President Bush in 2001 disavowed the Kyoto treaty that sets mandatory targets for reducing greenhouse gas emissions, and he has pursued policies calling for more research and voluntary efforts to limit emissions.

Experts Assess Deregulation As Factor In '03 Blackout (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15 - Twenty-five months after a blackout darkened cities from New York to Toronto and Detroit, the Energy Department and its Canadian counterpart held their first public technical discussion on the episode Thursday to talk about one factor widely considered to have been behind it: the deregulation of the electric system.

Engineers, government officials and executives said at the meeting that amid its restructuring the industry needed further changes to reduce the frequency of blackouts as utilities that formerly generated power, transmitted it and delivered it were broken up into separate entities of competing businesses.

"The most serious mistake we can make is pretending that markets do things that they do not do," said Kellan Fluckiger, executive director of the electricity division at the Alberta Department of Energy. "Markets allocate risk, they allocate capital, they provide price signals. Markets do not have a conscience, they do not provide social policy, and they do not do things they are not paid to do."

For example, participants at the meeting said, utilities that once ran the system sometimes added transmission lines to increase reliability of electric power. When they did so, their costs would be reimbursed through the regulatory process; now there is less incentive to take on such efforts, and several participants pointed out that in fact investment in transmission had lagged.

The blackout of 2003 began on Aug. 14 and in some places lasted more than two days. A binational report issued three months afterward did not list deregulation as a cause, instead citing factors like failure to trim trees, train operators and install control systems that could have kept track of the status of all power lines and generators.

Much of the investigation leading to that report was managed by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the architect of utility restructuring in the United States. The report called for a separate study - it did not say by whom - on the role of deregulation in the blackout, but that study has never been done.

Experts at Thursday's meeting said the changes in the industry had had several adverse effects, including a loss of experience among personnel. One member of the panel, Jack Casazza, a 60-year veteran of the industry, said the changes had brought lawyers and M.B.A.'s to the head of these competitive companies, rather than engineers.

"They may be decent people, fine bankers, fine lawyers, wonderful golfers," Mr. Casazza said, "but they don't have the background."

He also said that while the old utilities had often maintained large reserve margins of electricity, to minimize the chance of shortages, some market participants now preferred lower margins, to drive up prices.

Others pointed out that information like a power plant's maximum capacity, and its state of repair on any given day, was now considered proprietary and so was not readily available to system operators, which manage regional power grids.

The North American Electric Reliability Council, whose members come from utilities, marketers, customers and federal agencies, said in a paper submitted for the meeting that the increased demands that deregulation's wider trading had placed on the transmission system "require the grid to be operated closer to its reliability limits more of the time than was the case in the past."

That requires better training and control equipment, said the group, which was founded after a vast blackout in the Northeast in 1965.

Still, not all the industry's changes have affected reliability adversely, participants said. In a paper written for the meeting, Dave Goulding, chief executive of the Ontario Independent Electricity System Operator, said "competition leads to trade and greater interconnectedness," which could increase reliability.

The energy bill signed into law by President Bush on Aug. 8 provides a mechanism for creating mandatory reliability rules. It allows the federal government to designate a private group, probably the North American Electric Reliability Council, as an official "electric reliability organization," with authority to set the rules. But that group pointed out in its paper that while the designated organization would assess the adequacy of the system, it would not have the authority to require anybody to build a generating station or a transmission line.

Soaring Natural-Gas Prices Point To Record-High Electricity Costs (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

While many consumers have focused in recent weeks on the high price of gasoline, utilities are grappling with enormous natural-gas bills that threaten to push another form of energy, electricity, to unprecedented price levels.

Even before Hurricane Katrina, the price of natural gas had doubled during the past two years. The storm's destruction has roiled energy markets, sending natural-gas and oil prices to record levels and foreshadowing eventual rate increases for electricity in the Southeast, where utilities must rebuild heavily damaged systems.

Now, as the winter heating season approaches for much of the country, consumers face a double threat. Many will see record costs on their bills for the natural gas that fuels their furnaces, stoves and clothes dryers. Consumers -- and businesses -- also will get hit with higher charges for electricity made by power plants that burn pricey natural gas.

Regulators and utilities are adopting a variety of approaches to deal with the surge in natural-gas costs, which coincides with record demand for electricity across the nation. Texas has imposed a moratorium on electricity-rate adjustments. Other states are trying to spread utility costs over more than a year or are offering discounts to ease the squeeze or encourage conservation. The high prices are getting special attention in Texas and California, the two most populous states and also the most dependent on natural gas for power generation.

Utility regulators can try to hold the line on electricity rates for a while, but they can't do anything about commodities markets. Natural-gas prices "are ground zero for us -- the hottest issue we face," says Susan Kennedy, a member of the California Public Utilities Commission in San Francisco. Unfortunately, she adds, "it's one expense we have no control over."

California went through an energy crisis in 2000-01 that was prompted by a surge in natural-gas costs and subsequent rise in electricity prices based on those costs. Natural gas in the state often was priced at levels three times as high as those nationwide. In June 2001, for example, gas cost $11.71 per million British thermal units, or BTUs, in Southern California and $3.56 elsewhere in the country.

Currently, power generators are being quoted natural-gas prices for this fall and winter that also look extremely high -- $11.34 for contracts on the New York Mercantile Exchange for October, $11.97 for November and $12.45 for December deliveries. All surpass prices for September that were less than $10. They translate into raw power prices, not adjusted for inflation, that are high even before adding regular utility costs that would push the retail cost up substantially.

Only about 20% of the nation's electricity comes from power plants fueled by natural gas. In most states, high prices for gas-fired generation are tempered somewhat by lower costs for nuclear and coal-fired plants or hydroelectricity, but the exception is in states with deregulated markets where the highest-priced form of generation typically sets the spot-market price.

That's the case for states in the Northeast, the Midwest and the mid-Atlantic region. The only protections consumers have in those states against high prices for spot-market natural gas and electricity are long-term arrangements that lock in lower prices or other hedging provisions.

PECO Energy, the Exelon Corp. utility that serves Philadelphia, has locked in prices for its electricity through 2010 under contracts with its power-generation affiliate. But most such arrangements, made when states first deregulated their markets in the late 1990s, are expiring. Customers of Commonwealth Edison in Chicago, another Exelon company, will be exposed to greater commodity risk after contracts there expire next year.

Texas utility regulators last week extracted a promise from utilities there not to raise electricity prices in response to natural-gas costs that have surged past $10 per million BTUs, five times the levels of a few years ago. Regulators "asked everybody to volunteer" not to change their prices before Oct. 1, said Chris Schein, spokesman for TXU Corp. in Dallas, the biggest electricity generator and seller in the state. The moratorium was premised on an assumption that "current prices are an anomaly associated with Hurricane Katrina," he said.

But many people are skeptical that natural-gas prices will ease much in October, and TXU's stock recently soared above $100 a share, up 66% so far this year, based on expectations of both higher electricity rates and increased sales of electricity due to the upwelling of demand from Katrina-related arrivals.

TXU agreed to make no change before Oct. 10, but it also has told state regulators it will implement a rate increase when the moratorium ends that will be based on a $9.74 price for gas -- around the levels before Katrina hit. Residential rates will be going up 12% in October, taking total increases to 65% since 2002.

Under Texas's deregulation law, utilities peg their power prices to the underlying cost of natural gas, the primary fuel used to make electricity there. The moratorium means that TXU's rate today is based on a natural-gas price, at $7.87 a unit, that's

31% below the prevailing market price for natural gas that the state uses, which is a 20-day rolling average. That's good for consumers. But it means that the utility's competitors, who try to keep their prices slightly below TXU's, also are suffering, in some cases finding themselves having to charge more than TXU, for the first time. That will put pressure on regulators to let costs flow through to consumers to prevent significant losses for electricity suppliers.

It takes a while for high fuel prices to work their way through the electric industry although the lag time has been getting shorter. Puget Sound Energy, in Bellevue, Wash., won the right to adjust rates quickly three years ago, and now is able to do so without going through a full-blown rate review, which usually takes a year. The company hopes to raise rates 4.4% for residential customers on Nov. 1.

Consolidated Edison, the utility serving New York City and environs, is able to reprice its electricity each month, based on fuel costs. Those costs made up 60% of its billed amount for September, versus 53% a year earlier. Overall, bills are up 8.4%, year over year.

Other states are looking for ways to soften the blow to consumers. FPL Group Inc.'s Florida Power & Light says its 2005 fuel bill, mostly for natural gas and oil, will be $770 million higher, or 19% more, than the $4.05 billion it had budgeted. Next year, it expects its fuel costs to top $6.2 billion with natural-gas costs averaging $10.09 a unit. That would represent a further 29% increase. High fuel costs will push up electric rates by 15% for many residential customers and by 20% to 36% for commercial and industrial consumers.

FPL plans to spread out some of the 2005 expense over two years, instead of collecting it all this year. It's also proposing to waive the higher fuel cost for residential customers using less than 1,000 kilowatt hours of electricity each month, hoping to encourage conservation.

Worried about the impact of high prices on industry, California regulators on Sept. 8 approved a two-tier rate structure that will give some business customers of PG&E Corp.'s Pacific Gas & Electric Co. unit and Edison International's Southern California Edison unit a 25% discount, declining to zero by the sixth year. Utilities pledged use these "economic development" rates only for new arrivals or to dissuade companies from leaving the state.

While the "economic development" rates will help some users, they may irk some existing customers who face higher costs next year. Pacific Gas & Electric said it will raise rates by about $600 million in 2006, mostly because of fuel costs, resulting in a 10.8% rate increase for residential consumers. Medium-size businesses, which bore a larger share of earlier increases, will see their cost rise more modestly, by 3.5%.

High fuel prices are straining deregulated energy markets in a way that hasn't been seen since the Western energy crisis. Until now, Texas officials have prided themselves on having market-based mechanisms that they describe as "symmetrical." That is, higher costs for fuel can be passed through to consumers fairly quickly. But the moratorium recognizes growing resistance to repeated increases.

Prohibiting utilities from passing higher costs through can present a problem, though. California did it in 2000 because it thought the costs were unfair to consumers. But the result was enormous utility losses that eventually drove Pacific Gas & Electric into bankruptcy proceedings, from which it has since emerged.

Many companies are exploring their options, too. Amy's Kitchen Inc., a natural-food maker in Santa Rosa, Calif., recently bought 50 acres near Medford, Ore., for a new processing plant. It wanted to expand in California, but couldn't get the rate relief it needed fast enough. "Short-term, our hands are tied," says controller Andy Kopral, adding that companies have to pay whatever they're billed. The quest, he added, "is to get help in the long term" -- even if that means moving.

Growing Fears Over Airline Pensions (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Concern about the impact of the bankruptcies of Delta and Northwest airlines on workers' pensions has led to urgent calls in Washington for immediate pension relief.

Harry Reid, Senate minority leader, said: “Congress has an immediate opportunity to pass legislation enabling both companies to keep pension plans for workers in place.”

Johnny Isakson, senator from Georgia, where Delta is based, told the Financial Times on Thursday: “We want to bring the bill to the floor as early as next week. The airlines stated they wanted to preserve their defined benefit plans and their ability to do that is tied to whether we can get pension reform passed.” On Thursday night Delta warned that it might miss pension payments for 3,500 retirees.

DOJ_NMG_0006339

The sense of urgency comes as the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, the federal agency that insures defined benefit pension plans, said it could assume liabilities of $8.4bn from Delta's pension plan if it was terminated. That would mark its biggest pension termination. Northwest's liabilities were smaller, at $2.8bn, the PBGC said on Thursday.

Lawmakers have proposed extending the time for companies with underfunded pension plans to make up the gap from four years. Mr Isakson has suggested 20 years. The Bush administration had backed seven years.

Delta has told lawmakers that the only way it can avoid an immediate termination is if the 20-year proposal is passed. That has the support of Northwest and American, but not Continental. Although support is building in the Senate, the proposals have had little backing in the House, according to one airline lobbyist.

A report from the Congressional Budget Office on Thursday underlined the risks the PBGC faces. The report estimates the PBGC's accumulated deficit could climb to $142bn over the next 20 years, if it is calculated in the way that a private insurer calculates risk.

While some analysts dispute that number, they agree with the Center On Federal Financial Institutions that without reform, such as changing the way the agency charges premiums to corporations, the PBGC will run out of money by 2022. Doug Elliott, the Center's president, said: “The real problem is a systematic imbalance for 30 years in the premiums they were allowed to charge and how Congress set up the funding and other rules. They are hitting a period when bigger companies are going under.”

Claims from failed pension plans reached $14.3bn in 2000-04, 18 times larger than the $783m in claims booked between 1995 and 1999. Airline pension failures would easily top those figures. United has already dumped $6.6bn of liabilities. If Northwest and Delta do so the total airlines' liability would hit $17.8bn.

Employees could also lose out. If the PBGC takes over a plan, it typically pays pensions up to a cap of about $46,000. That is far lower than a typical pilot's pension.

Coffee, Tea … Or Bankruptcy? (WSJ)

By Robert Crandall

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Delta and Northwest Airlines' bankruptcy filings are the latest consequences of the troubles afflicting the long-established, or "legacy," airlines. Inflexible work rules, above-market wage rates, under-funded fixed benefit pension plans, huge debt burdens, outdated business practices and high fuel costs burden the legacy carriers with enormous disadvantages relative to newer carriers who are flying by different rules.

To deal with these burdens, the legacy carriers have made dramatic changes. During the four years ending last December, they collectively reduced capital spending by 62% while simultaneously taking on $16 billion of new debt to cover losses; they cut annual labor costs by more than $6 billion and total annual expenses by more than $20 billion, and they eliminated more than 125,000 jobs. Despite these efforts, the industry recorded losses of more than $30 billion, is losing billions more in 2005, and seems poised for still more losses in 2006. Sisyphus wouldn't trade places with today's airline managers!

Sky-high fuel prices have recently made things worse, but lower fuel prices will not solve the industry's problems. In most industries, producers are able to pass on raw material price increases to their customers, as they are doing today. For a variety of reasons, including very intense competition which limits any one carrier's pricing power, the airline industry has consistently failed to earn adequate profits; cumulatively, the industry has lost money since its inception.

While analysts are closely focused on fuel prices -- and occasionally note the major cost differences between low-lost carriers and their legacy competitors -- little is said about the many unique burdens imposed on airlines by inappropriate laws and regulations. These include taxes and fees representing more than 25% of a typical ticket's purchase price; labor laws enabling unions to drive compensation far above the amounts paid in other industries for similar work; and continuing underinvestment in the operation and construction of the air traffic control system and aviation infrastructure.

Among the most egregious of these burdens are those imposed by the nation's bankruptcy statutes, which allow a failed carrier to use Chapter 11 to dramatically reduce its costs. In bankruptcy, airlines renegotiate aircraft and facility leases, disavow selected contractual obligations, revise or abrogate labor contracts, and even repudiate pension obligations -- all the while continuing to operate. Airlines often remain in bankruptcy for extended periods of time.

Chapter 11 also protects inefficient, unprofitable capacity, since aircraft are always worth more in the air than on the ground. Without Chapter 11, failed airlines might have to liquidate, selling off their physical and operating assets. This would remove capacity from the system and restore some measure of pricing power to the industry's remaining participants.

Chapter 11 also undermines responsible managements. In an intensely competitive industry providing a commodity product, the "dumbest competitor" -- unrestrained by fear of failure -- sets the standard. Thus, when irresponsible union demands are granted, or an improvident management adds unrewarding capacity or uneconomic service features, other managements are compelled to choose between matching the new "industry standard" and tolerating labor unrest and lost revenues. Since experience has established that matching irresponsibility is the better long-term business strategy, few managements have been able to resist the perpetual game of "follow the leader."

While few in either management or labor aspire to bankruptcy, the knowledge that liquidation is unlikely has unquestionably been a factor in encouraging excessive demands by labor and imprudent actions by management. But the probability of liquidation rather than reorganization would likely provide substantial incentives for more responsible labor-management relationships, more cost-effective labor contracts, and more carefully reasoned business plans.

Revising the bankruptcy laws would certainly cause hardship for the communities and employees most involved with failed airlines. On the other hand, revising the rules would offer expanded opportunities for new competitors and for legacy carriers whose managements, unions and employees are most willing to adapt to new realities. Since the U.S. badly needs a vibrant, growing and successful aviation industry, new policies are clearly in order.

To build a better airline industry we need bankruptcy laws designed to incentivize success and penalize failure. We need labor laws that better balance the power of unions and management. We need to recognize that travel drives economic activity of many kinds and benefits every community, and should revise the currently onerous structure of fees and taxes, which seems premised on the notion that only the airlines and their passengers benefit from the airline system. Finally, we need administration and Congressional support for legislation to provide the FAA with the resources to build and operate an aviation infrastructure consistent with both U. S. aviation leadership and growing consumer demand.

Come Fly With Congress (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

This week's bankruptcy filings raise the possibility that Delta and Northwest will join United Airlines and US Airways in dumping their pension obligations onto taxpayers. Members of Congress will howl, but it's time for the politicians to admit their own role in co-piloting the airline industry into Chapter 11.

The immediate causes of the Northwest and Delta filings are failed labor negotiations and bad luck. Northwest is struggling with striking mechanics who refused to join other unions in negotiating $1.4 billion in annual savings to prevent bankruptcy. Delta has its own high-cost union contracts and has long been bleeding cash. Hurricane Katrina and sky-high fuel costs were the tipping point.

But the root of the problem for these "legacy" carriers is the burden of pension costs. And one tantalizing option is to use bankruptcy to pass them off to the taxpayer via the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. (PBGC). Congress created this government-run insurance system in 1974, promising to "protect workers" when companies failed. But as always with such government guarantees, Congress only created a future "moral hazard" that is now coming due.

Management and labor would agree in flush times on big pension obligations because they knew the taxpayer was their safety net. The PBGC charges paltry premiums that in no way cover the huge liabilities rolling in from steel, airline and retail industries. Its current deficit exceeds $23 billion, while pensions nationwide are underfunded by an estimated $450 billion. Delta and Northwest alone could dump another $12.4 billion in unfunded liabilities on the agency, with other airlines likely to follow.

By the way, current airline management isn't the major villain here. Northwest CEO Doug Steenland has been warning about the pension problems for years, and has suggested sensible reforms that might have saved both retirees and Northwest. (See his op-ed on this page, November 16, 2004.) But Congress typically dawdled, and bankruptcy eventually became the better part of financial triage. Some of the biggest losers could be airline employees who'd receive only a fraction of their promised pension. So the PBGC is one more case of Congress writing checks it can't cover.

The feds have also burdened airlines in other ways. The Railway Labor Act discourages union compromise, taxes are piled onto ticket prices, foreign investment is all but prohibited, and the antitrust lawyers at Justice have blocked sensible mergers. (See Robert Crandall nearby.) In a classic case of the latter, Justice barred a US Airways and United merger on the ground of unfair competitive advantage, only to see them both go bankrupt.

One hopeful bit of speculation this week is that perhaps the Delta and Northwest Chapter 11 filings were coordinated. The two airlines have compatible routes that would make them ideal merger partners, and bankruptcy is a perfect place to deal with the pilot integration issues that are the biggest reason airline mergers can fail.

In any case, the presence of four airlines in Chapter 11 at the same time suggests that something's got to give. United is already struggling to get enough capital to emerge from bankruptcy, despite its pared down pension costs. Sooner or later one of these carriers will exit not as a going concern, but stage left, via Chapter 7 liquidation. Especially compared with that alternative, a Delta-Northwest merger would make sense.

The impulse on Capitol Hill will be to provide yet another bailout, hoping that Northwest and Delta can keep their pension plans. As if the politicians haven't done enough harm already. The Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pension Committee has already passed another "reform" that would give most companies 20 more years to get their pension plans in order, meaning 20 more years to grow the PBGC's future liabilities. If the Members really wanted to help, they'd leave the airlines alone and find a way to phase out PBGC guarantees.

Unions Struggle To Retain Strength (WSJ)

By Kris Maher, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

Union leaders expect the bankruptcy filings of Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines to increase pressure on other carriers to seek further cost cutting from their workers. The troubling reality for unions: There seems to be very little they can do to stop the trend.

Many workers -- like the mechanics at Northwest, who refused to make concessions and went on strike -- can be supplanted by replacement workers. Those like the pilots at Delta and Northwest who agree to concessions have found they weren't enough to avoid bankruptcy proceedings, where further erosion of benefits and pay are likely.

Union leaders expect the tough times to extend to other carriers, as airlines try to get unions to accept similar concessions to avoid being at a competitive disadvantage. "It sets a pattern which many companies not in crisis emulate opportunistically," says Ron Blackwell, chief economist for the AFL-CIO.

The latest round of airline woes has come as the labor movement's fissures have widened, raising questions as to whether some of organized labor's problems are self-inflicted. This summer's defections from the AFL-CIO by four major unions -- representing more than one-third of the labor federation's members -- highlight existing tensions among unions and unwillingness to back fellow unions during strikes.

The harsh challenges confronting unions in the airline industry, while more extreme than those in other corners of the labor movement, illustrate the problems facing all of organized labor as employers press harder to lower labor costs for active and retired workers in the name of being globally competitive. "Unions are in an environment of shrinking alternatives," says Marick F. Masters, a professor of business administration at the University of Pittsburgh. "There are just not many good options left at this time."

Strikes by some workers, especially pilots, could prove more difficult to deal with than the mechanics strike at Northwest, though such an action could only help to push an airline toward a bankruptcy filing in the current economic climate. Consumers and the public don't look as sympathetically on striking workers and are more willing to cross picket lines, making it easier for companies to withstand strikes. "You retain the right to strike on paper, but in practice what you have is the right to lose your job," says Harley Shaiken, a labor-and-economics professor at the University of California at Berkeley.

The concession option hasn't helped workers. Last year, pilots at Northwest agreed to $265 million in annual concessions for two years, while pilots at Delta agreed to $1 billion in annual givebacks for five years. Neither action was enough to offset other costs, such as rising fuel prices.

Labor leaders believe the real problem facing airline unions is the ease with which companies can seek and emerge from bankruptcy courts, free of labor-contract obligations abrogated by the court. "Most of our strategy has been trumped by bankruptcy law," says Duane Woerth, president of the Air Line Pilots Association, which represents 5,200 active pilots at Northwest and 6,500 active pilots at Delta.

Mr. Woerth, who blames management strategies for the airlines' troubles, said he believes pilots will be less willing to accept cuts in the future. "What I've heard loud and clear from workers is that they're done making concessions," he says. "When you're down to 1980s wages and you've lost your pensions, you're not willing to give any more."

AMR Corp., parent of American Airlines, which got concessions from its unions in previous years, said it will look for other ways to improve efficiency. "We can't predict the future, especially given fuel prices, but we're working hard together to do everything to increase revenues and reduce costs to better serve our customers," a spokesman said. A spokesman for Continental Airlines, another of the old-line airlines, said it doesn't intend to seek further labor givebacks after obtaining concessions earlier this year.

Some labor officials say it is important for unions to keep negotiating with management through bankruptcy proceedings. Candice Johnson, a spokeswoman for the Communications Workers of America, says the union was able to negotiate with US Airways through two recent rounds of bankruptcy proceedings. At one point, the company wanted 6,000 reservation agents represented by the union to take wage cuts of as much as 34%. The union negotiated 12.9% cuts. "Often we were up against draconian cuts," says Ms. Johnson. "It was very important to keep negotiating."

Mr. Woerth says the union will focus on organizing pilots at other airlines, such as JetBlue Airways, AirTran Airways and Spirit Airlines, in an effort to raise wages across the industry.

Iran Offers To Spread Nuclear Technology (USAT)

USA Today, September 16, 2005

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his country is willing to provide other Islamic nations with nuclear technology. Ahmadinejad made the comments after meeting Turkey's prime minister on the sidelines of a gathering of world leaders at the United Nations.

Ahmadinejad repeated promises that Iran will not pursue nuclear weapons, the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency reported. Then he added: "Iran is ready to transfer nuclear know-how to the Islamic countries due to their need."

Iran has said it is determined to pursue its nuclear program to process uranium and produce energy, despite European attempts to limit it. The United States accuses Iran of secretly seeking to develop nuclear weapons, a charge Tehran denies.

Meanwhile, talks in Beijing on North Korea's nuclear program came to a standstill as the communist nation continued its refusal to halt atomic bomb development until it receives a nuclear reactor to generate power.

Arrest warrant issued for Milosevic's wife

A judge ordered the arrest of the wife of former Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic for failing to attend her corruption trial in Belgrade. Mirjana Markovic has been in self-imposed exile in Russia since 2003. A previous arrest warrant was revoked in June after her lawyer, Zdenko Tomanovic, promised she would attend the hearing. Markovic left Serbia ahead of charges she illegally gave government-owned luxury apartments to her grandson's nanny and to officials from her JUL communist party. Milosevic has been on trial since 2002 at a United Nations war crimes tribunal in The Hague, Netherlands, for his alleged role in atrocities committed during the Balkan wars of the 1990s.

Fire sweeps fireworks stands in Mexico

A fire tore through Mexico's most famous fireworks market, setting off a chain of explosions that destroyed hundreds of open-air stands just ahead of the country's Independence Day celebrations. Mexico State Civil Defense Director Roberto Vazquez said dozens of people likely were injured in the blaze and explosions in Tultepec, a few miles northeast of Mexico City.

Vazquez said authorities were checking reports that someone had thrown a lit firecracker inside the San Pablito Market and it set off a chain of explosions. As many as 300 stands covering several acres in the market were destroyed, he said. Television images showed a tall plume of gray smoke rising from a broad, charred swath of gutted market stalls.

Tehran Offers Nuclear Expertise (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK -- Iran's president said yesterday that his country is ready to share its nuclear know-how with other Islamic countries, the latest setback to a U.N.-backed effort to halt Tehran's nuclear programs.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in his first foreign trip since his election in June, again denied Bush administration charges that Iran is secretly seeking nuclear weapons.

But after a meeting with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan on the sidelines of the U.N. summit here, Mr. Ahmadinejad, for the first time, offered to share the fruits of Iran's nuclear programs with other Muslim countries.

"The Islamic Republic never seeks such weapons of mass destruction, and with respect to the needs of Islamic countries, we are ready to transfer nuclear know-how to these countries," Mr. Ahmadinejad said, according to Iranian press accounts.

He repeated his denials of Iran's intent to make atomic bombs in a get-acquainted meeting with U.S. reporters and editors yesterday morning, saying such suspicions put a heavy burden on his country.

"How do you prove you are not a bad person?" he asked.

The offer to share nuclear technology prompted a worried U.S. reaction. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli told a briefing, "Iran, as its record demonstrates, has a long history of trying to develop weapons of mass destruction, supporting terror.

"We view with concern any suggestion that Iran would seek to contribute to very destabilizing and unhelpful international behavior."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had been trying to rally support for a vote next week by the United Nations' Vienna, Austria-based nuclear watchdog to refer Iran's nuclear programs to the Security Council -- a first step toward possible sanctions.

The tougher line had been backed earlier by European Union powers Britain, France and Germany, which have taken the diplomatic lead in an unsuccessful effort to resolve the standoff.

But Miss Rice conceded that the United States might not have the votes at what was supposed to be a climactic vote by the board of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0006343

"If we get a referral that will be good, but I think the issue of a referral is something we'll be working on for a while," Miss Rice said in an interview with the Fox News editorial board conducted Wednesday evening and released in full yesterday.

"I'm not so concerned about exactly when it happens, because I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to be [held] on September 19," she added.

Top French, German and English officials met with the Iranian president late yesterday after talks with Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and also signaled that any tough action against Iran would probably be delayed.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw declined to comment on the substance of a meeting between the three major European powers -- Britain, France and Germany -- and the recently elected Iranian leader.

"Our aim all the way through in this when we started these negotiations was to keep the matter out of the Security Council," Mr. Straw told reporters. "What we're going to do is to listen carefully to what the president is going to say on Saturday afternoon and we'll take it from there."

"We want to pursue the dialogue. ... We think there is still room for negotiations," said French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin before the meeting with Mr. Ahmadinejad.

U.S. and European officials had previously expressed hope that they could win at least a strong majority of the 35-nation IAEA board to refer Iran to the Security Council in Monday's vote. But China and Russia, who have Security Council vetoes, oppose the referral, and India has been cool to the idea as well.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei also favors delaying a vote, saying Iran should be given a deadline to reverse its decision to resume steps toward enriching uranium.

Enriched uranium can be used to fuel nuclear reactors or to make atomic bombs.

The Iranian leader's offer to share nuclear technology tracked past Iranian efforts to expand the IAEA negotiations to include other Islamic and regional countries.

The IAEA has rejected that suggestion, insisting that it is Iran's record and programs that are at issue.

Diplomats in Vienna have speculated that Iran benefits from any delay in the vote, as a new group of mostly nonaligned countries will be joining the U.N. agency board soon.

Russian President Vladimir Putin, who is expected to discuss the Iranian standoff in his White House visit with President Bush today, met Mr. Ahmadinejad yesterday and praised Russia's "long-standing and very close relationship" with Iran.

With the Russian president at his side, Mr. Ahmadinejad replied, "A powerful Russia is Iran's best friend, and a powerful Iran is Russia's best friend."

U.S. Agenda On Iran Lacking Key Support (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 -- Despite an intense lobbying effort at the most senior levels, the Bush administration failed to persuade three key countries Thursday to back the United States in pressuring Iran to give up sensitive aspects of its nuclear energy program, diplomats and officials said.

Russia, China and India either publicly or privately turned down U.S. requests to help report Iran's case next week to the U.N. Security Council, which has the authority to impose economic sanctions or an oil embargo.

The administration has the reluctant support of the European Union for the first time in more than two years, but that will not be enough. Without backing from one of the three others, U.S. officials indicated they were preparing to abandon, for now, a quest to move the matter into the council.

The decision left the administration scrambling for a Plan B, and U.S. and European diplomats said there were backroom negotiations, on the margins of a U.N. summit in New York, to forge a compromise among countries with influence on the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Some officials said they were considering the possibility of an IAEA resolution that would set a concrete deadline for Iran to comply with a series of measures. If Iran failed, the IAEA board would automatically take the matter to the Security Council.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who met with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh on Thursday and will meet with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov on Friday, acknowledged that Washington might lack a convincing majority if the IAEA votes on whether to refer Iran's case to the council when it meets Monday in Vienna.

"If we get a referralon September 19, that will be good, but I think the issue of a referral is something that we'll be working for a while," Rice told Fox News. "I'm not so concerned about exactly when it happens, because I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to be on September 19," she said.

Her comments were the strongest public indication yet that the administration was reversing course after expressing confidence, as recently as last week, that it was closer than at any time in the past to taking the matter to the Security Council.

U.S. and foreign diplomats said India, which recently forged a major new security and nuclear alliance with the United States, could not be persuaded to join the U.S. strategy. India, which has close economic, political and cultural ties to Iran, has said it supports Iran's right to a nuclear energy program.

India's position, which U.S. officials have said they had not anticipated, has been deeply embarrassing for the White House at a time when it is trying to win congressional support for the India deal. Some officials, who would discuss the diplomatic calculations underway only on condition of anonymity, said the administration preferred to give up the chance of winning a slim majority in the IAEA next week rather than seek a vote that India would publicly oppose.

Iran insists its nuclear efforts are aimed at producing nuclear energy, not bombs. The Bush administration has said that the energy program, built in secret over 18 years and exposed in 2002, is just a cover for a weapons program. Iran has built facilities to enrich uranium to fuel its energy program. But the facilities could produce bomb-grade uranium, and the Bush administration wants the Iranians to give them up.

While many countries appear to share U.S. suspicions about Iran's intentions, they have profound differences with the Bush administration over how to respond, and are apprehensive about the goals of a U.S. president who has said that "all options are on the table" in dealing with Tehran.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said the differences were tactical, rather than strategic, and that efforts were underway to "convince the Iranians to return to the talks" they started with the Europeans in the fall of 2003.

Iran bolted the talks in August after receiving European proposals that would have required Tehran to permanently give upmuch of the nuclear energy program it has already built. Burns said he would devote the next several days to working with the Russians on the Iran issue.

Even the Europeans, frustrated after two tumultuous years of negotiations with Iran over the future of its nuclear program, said they prefer to avoid going to the Security Council.

"Our aim all the way through in this when we started these negotiations was to keep the matter out of the Security Council," British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw told reporters after a half-hour meeting Thursday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. "What we're going to do is to listen carefully to what [Ahmadinejad] is going to say on Saturday afternoon and we'll take it from there."

Ahmadinejad, who has been holding his own round of talks with world leaders attending the U.N. summit, met with Straw and the French and German foreign ministers. The European ministers held an earlier 90-minute meeting with Iran's foreign minister and Ahmadinejad's national security adviser.

The newly elected hard-line Iranian president has little foreign policy experience. But he told reporters Thursday he plans to present new proposals to resolve the impasse when he addresses the conference Saturday. He said Iran's aims are peaceful and that "any improper use of production for nuclear arms should be prevented."

U.S. Report Says Iran Seeks To Acquire Nuclear Weapons (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

Iran is concealing many of its nuclear facilities from international controls and the activities show it is seeking nuclear weapons, according to a U.S. government report.

The computer slide presentation developed by the Energy Department for the International Atomic Energy Agency also shows that Iran's nuclear program closely resembles Pakistan's nuclear arms programs.

"Iran's past history of concealment and deception and nuclear fuel cycle infrastructure are most consistent with an intent to acquire nuclear weapons," the report said.

The report, first made public Wednesday by ABC News, states that Iran has a "confirmed record of hiding sensitive nuclear fuel cycle activities from the IAEA."

The presentation contains numerous photographs, including satellite imagery, showing that Iran built "dummy buildings" to hide an underground vehicle entrance and ventilator shafts at its Natanz facility.

Iran has violated IAEA safeguards and provided false information about centrifuge development, plutonium experiments and military involvement in nuclear activity, the 43-page report stated.

The presentation was shown recently at the U.S. mission to the IAEA in Vienna at a briefing for IAEA representatives. It was produced by the Energy Department's Los Alamos National Laboratory and Pacific Northwest National Laboratories.

Seven of Iran's 13 nuclear-related facilities were kept secret until 2002, including enrichment plants at Lashkar-Abad, Tehran, Natanz, and uranium processing at Adrekan and Gachin, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0006345

"Iran's nuclear program is well-scaled for a weapons capability, as a comparison to [Pakistan's] nuclear weapons infrastructure shows," the report said. "When one also considers Iran's concealment and deception activities, it's difficult to escape the conclusion that Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons."

The Bush administration is pressing the IAEA to refer the issue of Iran's covert nuclear program to the United Nations Security Council, after months of diplomatic efforts by the governments of Britain, France and Germany have produced few results.

The United Nations could then impose economic sanctions against Iran or possibly a future authorization for the use of force.

The report states that Iran's uranium ore resources are insufficient for Tehran to produce enough fuel for civilian electrical power generating reactors.

"However, Iran's uranium resources are more than sufficient to support a nuclear weapons capability," the report said.

For example, Iran's Gachin uranium ore mine is producing about 21 tons of ore annually, enough to produce about four nuclear bombs per year, the report said.

Satellite photographs included in the report show that Iran's gas centrifuge facility and its heavy water plants closely resemble nuclear plants in Pakistan. The report does not identify the country as Pakistan, but U.S. officials said the photographs show Pakistani nuclear infrastructure.

The report also includes a comparison of nuclear weapons delivery vehicles and shows how Iran's Shahab-3 missile closely resembles Pakistan's Ghauri missile. Both have a range of up to 930 miles. Both are based on North Korea's No-Dong missile.

The report notes that the Shahab-3 can carry a warhead weighing up to 2,200 pounds, and the Ghauri can carry a 1,540-pound warhead.

The report said that after Iran was caught with an "extensive concealment and deception record," the government in Tehran claimed that its nuclear program was for a peaceful nuclear fuel cycle.

However, the report said the lack of uranium ore reserves could not support nuclear power plants but "are well scaled to give Iran a significant number of nuclear weapons."

Iran Seeks Compromise In N-fuel Stand-off (FT)

By Our International Staff

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Iran is to propose international joint ventures in its nuclear programme as a means of providing an “objective guarantee” that it cannot be diverted to weapons use, senior Iranian officials have told the Financial Times.

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's new president, is set to make the new proposal on Saturday before the United Nations General Assembly.

“Iran will suggest international co-operation for uranium enrichment, and invite Europe, Russia, China and South Africa to joint ventures in which Iran keeps its nuclear fuel cycle while the international community can make sure there is no diversion,” said a senior official involved in two years of talks with the European Union on Iran's nuclear programme.

“The co-operation is not necessarily for new [nuclear] sites it can be in the sites we already have,” said Ali Agha-Mohammadi, spokesman for the Supreme National Security Council.

It is not clear whether Iran's suggestion would include the more sensitive sites in the country and European diplomats were sceptical that it would be acceptable to their governments.

Nicholas Burns, US undersecretary of state, also emphasised the US position that Iran should not be allowed to develop a nuclear fuel cycle capability.

The proposal could complicate the troubled attempt by the US and the EU to refer Iran to the UN Security Council over its nuclear programme, which Tehran insists is purely peaceful.

The US and the EU, which suspect Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, have been pushing to report Tehran to the UN for concealing elements of its nuclear programme in the past.

The central disagreement in the talks with Iran over its nuclear programme has been Europe's desire that Tehran give up uranium enrichment as the only “objective guarantee” that the programme is purely civil.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, will discuss the issue next week. But faced with opposition from China, Russia and India, diplomatic efforts have shifted to bring Iran back to the negotiating table and renew its suspension of fuel cycle development.

“We are waiting for a signal from Iran,” said Mr Burns.

"The issue of a referral is something that we'll be working for a while," Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, told Fox News yesterday. "I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to be on September 19."

Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA director-general, has already suggested giving Iran more time to meet international concerns.

"We have to think about the tactics for September 19 because the tactics we have followed so far have not borne fruit," added a European diplomat.

Iran Promises Proposals to End Nuclear Stalemate (NYT)

By STEVEN R. WEISMAN and WARREN HOGE

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran said yesterday that his country would present new proposals tomorrow to try to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear programs, but he provided no details.

European diplomats indicated that they might defer their effort to bring Iran to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive action if sufficient progress was made in talking with Iran's leaders.

At a breakfast meeting the Iranian discussed at length why his country needed nuclear power and insisted Iran would continue to pursue nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

At the United Nations last evening, Mr. Ahmadinejad also met with Secretary General Kofi Annan and the foreign ministers of Britain, France, Germany and the European Union and told them he would be making the details public in a speech to the General Assembly tomorrow.

Emerging from the evening meeting, Jack Straw, Britain's foreign secretary, said, "What we are going to do is to listen carefully to what the president says Saturday afternoon and take it from there."

The speech is expected to outline a proposal aimed at resuscitating the stalled negotiations over Iran's nuclear program.

As part of those talks, Iran had suspended certain uranium conversion activities, which the West believes were a precursor to making a nuclear weapon, but then resumed the uranium work last month, saying a European offer of economic benefits in return for a full cessation of uranium activities was inadequate.

In the past the United States and the Europeans have said they may turn to the Security Council for possible sanctions, although Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice indicated yesterday that such action might not be imminent.

"I am not so concerned about exactly when it happens," she said, according to the Fox News Web site, "because I don't think this matter is so urgent that it has to come on Sept. 19." That is the next scheduled meeting of the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency, which the United States and some European nations were hoping would refer Iran to the Security Council.

Secretary Straw said the session yesterday was "useful" because it offered the Europeans the first opportunity to meet Mr. Ahmadinejad, who was elected in June. Earlier in the day, the four Europeans met with Dr. Ali A. Larijani, Iran's new chief nuclear negotiator, for the first time.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, speaking to editors, reporters and television interviewers in the morning, described atomic energy as "a blessing given by God."

He said: "It's an opportunity. It is a clean energy. It is a healthy energy." He added that Iran needed nuclear energy because it could not rely forever on its oil resources.

Asked repeatedly whether Iran had not discredited itself by its failure to disclose past nuclear activities, Mr. Ahmadinejad said Iran did not have nuclear weapons and "there is absolutely no proof of a violation on the part of Iran" of its pledge to keep its nuclear program peaceful.

He was referring to a succession of reports by the International Atomic Energy Agency citing Iran's lack of cooperation in disclosing all its programs, but also noting that inspectors had no proof of an actual nuclear weapons program. Mr. Ahmadinejad displayed impatience over what he said was the difficulty in disproving an unfounded allegation, saying, "Usually, you cannot prove that sort of thing. How can you prove that you are not a bad person?"

Britain, France and Germany, along with India and several other countries, are trying to persuade Iran to once again suspend its uranium conversion program. Asked whether he would consider such a step as a gesture, Mr. Ahmadinejad avoided answering.

Wearing a tan windbreaker and an open-collar shirt, Mr. Ahmadinejad appeared relaxed as he held court at a large table at the Hotel Intercontinental in his first broad meeting with American news media.

Western diplomats have said for several days that they understood Mr. Ahmadinejad would offer proposals, but they did not expect anything different or new.

Iran, for example, has called on the Europeans to broaden the talks to include Muslim nations also interested in nuclear energy issues. European and American officials have rejected that idea and have been cool to other proposals, like one from South Africa in which Iran would be allowed to produce nuclear fuel but would have to send it to another country for enrichment.

Joschka Fischer, Germany's foreign minister, said after last night's meeting that "Europe's position is unchanged." He said there was a need to be "realistic" and not make threats.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said that Iran would continue to work with the International Atomic Energy Agency in allowing inspections, and that Iran would observe a rule requiring it to give 180 days' notice if it processes uranium to the next step, which would be enrichment, requiring the use of centrifuges.

At present Iran is converting raw uranium in a form known as yellowcake into a gas, which it could in theory enrich to weapons grade.

Mr. Ahmadinejad seemed comfortable with some of the technical details of the nuclear controversy, but he turned to his negotiator, Dr. Larijani, for the specifics in international agreements. Over all, Mr. Ahmadinejad accused the West of a double standard, wanting nuclear power for the West but not for Iran.

"There is some kind of inequality and injustice being created," he said. Anyone asking Iran to take conciliatory steps, like suspending its uranium conversion, should recognize that this work is legal under international agreements.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, a former mayor of Tehran, has traveled little outside his country, but expressed great admiration for the American people, American diversity and its great natural resources. "The capabilities of America can be beneficial for all other nations," he said.

Thus, he said, he was surprised at the initial American response to Hurricane Katrina. "We expected more," he said.

On other subjects, Mr. Ahmadinejad said that Iranians would have close ties with the Iraqis, but that the roots of the current insurgency lay with the American military presence. "Insecurity and the control of the occupation are linked to one another," he said. "After all, Iraq is an occupied country."

Iran's Leader Critical In First U.S. Visit (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 -- Newly elected Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, making his first trip to the United States, introduced himself to the U.S. media Thursday morning, displaying a dash of defiance at U.S. charges over Iran's nuclear program and a warning that the era of big-power dominance in international relations has ended.

Meeting over breakfast with about a dozen journalists in a Midtown Manhattan hotel conference room, Ahmadinejad blamed the Bush administration's policies for instability in Iraq. A veteran of Iran's war against Iraq, the president described the removal of Saddam Hussein as "necessary" but said the task should have been left to Iraqis.

"It is the occupiers who have responsibility for stability in Iraq," he said, adding later, "The root of the problem is the presence of foreign troops."

Ahmadinejad, who was an obscure provincial politician when he was elected mayor of Tehran in 2003, was the surprise winner in June's presidential elections. His anonymity outside Iran has helped keep alive accusations that he was photographed with American hostages at the U.S. Embassy in 1979, a charge repeated during his visit here and categorically denied by the president over breakfast.

Seeming relaxed in a tan sports jacket and open collar but initially almost timid, Ahmadinejad, 49, opened his session with journalists expressing condolences for the victims of Hurricane Katrina. He said he was puzzled by how the storm received its name. "The letter K," offered CBS News's Mike Wallace, launching a discussion of the idiosyncratic American practice of personifying some of the nation's most destructive natural disasters.

Later, Ahmadinejad returned to the subject of Katrina to poke at the Bush administration's response and perhaps draw lessons about solidarity among Americans. He compared the delivery of aid to victims in the Gulf Coast unfavorably with the response to natural disasters in the Islamic republic.

"When this hurricane occurred we were all were extremely sad," Ahmadinejad said, speaking through a translator. "We thought Americans would act more quickly and help their fellow Americans. We expected more." He added: "During the very first day of the hurricane, people could have brought more and limited the extent of the tragedy."

Perhaps the most contentious issue Ahmadinejad faces during this visit is continuing opposition from the United States and European Union to Iran's nuclear program. Iran insists the program -- developed in secret for 18 years -- is for peaceful energy use; the Bush administration charges a crash nuclear weapons project is hidden beneath the veneer of a peaceful program.

DOJ_NMG_0006348

The United States had hoped to win referral of the matter to the U.N. Security Council at next Monday's meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency, but U.S. officials failed to win broad support for such a move during talks here this week on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly.

Ahmadinejad said he had arrived with new proposals to resolve the impasse but declined to reveal them in advance of their public unveiling Saturday. He said Iran had no intention of building nuclear weapons but asserted that every nation had a right to develop nuclear power.

"We believe that atomic energy is a blessing given by God; it is an opportunity given to all nations," he said, adding that "any improper use of production for nuclear arms should be prevented."

During his discussions with other leaders here, Ahmadinejad has advanced the idea of transferring "nuclear know-how to the Islamic countries due to their need," according to the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency.

During the breakfast, Ahmadinejad said there is "no proof of a violation by Iran" of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, "just an allegation." He complained: "How can you prove you are not a bad person? You can't prove that."

Ahmadinejad's visit here has been dogged by protesters asserting that, as a student leader, he played a role in the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and seizure of U.S. hostages during the 1979 Iranian revolution. "This is an allegation that has absolutely no basis," he said. Alluding to the power of the media gathered at the breakfast, he added: "Sometimes I read rumors about the president of Iran -- and I laugh at them."

Asked his impressions of the United States, Ahmadinejad said it is a large, rich and diverse country but "the attitude of the American government has created problems with other countries." The United States "should not humiliate others, should not consider itself superior to others," he said. "We think the era of utilization of force and pressure in international relations has ended. Today, the will of the people will prevail, as it did in the election in Iran."

Bush To Pressure Putin On Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. In Washington And Greg White In Moscow, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

U.S. President George W. Bush hopes to persuade Russian President Vladimir Putin to toughen his stance on Iran, to further open his country's oil and gas reserves to foreign investment and to take steps to speed Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, when the two men meet at the White House.

Bush administration officials, in previewing Friday's one-day summit, described relations between Washington and Moscow these days as a mix of cooperation and tension, along with a dollop of indifference on the Russian side.

Much has changed from two years ago, when Mr. Bush used a Camp David gathering to praise Mr. Putin's Russia as "a country in which democracy and freedom and the rule of law thrive." Since then, the Kremlin has rolled back democratic institutions, used the tax and court systems to partially nationalize the country's largest oil company and jail its billionaire owner, meddled clumsily in the politics of its neighbors and cooperated with China in efforts to reduce U.S. influence in the strategic region of Central Asia.

Despite these setbacks, President Bush still puts much stock in his rapport with Mr. Putin, with whom he has met nearly 20 times.

The first item on today's agenda, U.S. officials say, will be to urge Mr. Putin to look more favorably on European and U.S. efforts to persuade Iran to give up its alleged nuclear-weapons ambitions.

The U.S., along with Britain, France and Germany, are threatening to take Iran to the United Nations Security Council unless it agrees to rules to prevent its civilian nuclear program from being used for military aims. But Russia and China, both of which have veto power within the council, oppose that idea. "This will be a major issue" in the summit talks, said one senior administration official.

Mr. Bush will also try to get a feel from President Putin on what transpired in his private talks at the U.N. on Wednesday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the official said.

On the energy front, the White House is pleased by what appears to be increased activity among Russian oil and gas companies to move more aggressively on new exploration and pipeline projects, including some with Western partners.

"I've noticed a definite change in the Russians' attitude toward our energy relationship" in the past few months, said one U.S. diplomat.

State gas titan OAO Gazprom was expected to announce on Friday its short list of foreign partners on a long-awaited liquefied-natural-gas project that would target the U.S. market. And Russia appears to be moving ahead with plans to build a new pipeline that would carry oil to the country's arctic coast, putting it within tanker range of U.S. ports.

Bush officials say that on the trade front, both sides must resolve a number of prickly issues within U.S.-Russian negotiations on Russian WTO membership, which could happen sometime next year. The toughest problems revolve around

Russian rules on energy services, bank subsidiaries, aviation and intellectual-property protections. The U.S. still hopes to wrap up the trade talks by the end of the year.

Some of the trickiest talk could focus on Moscow's influence over former Soviet republics, which Russia views as its turf. After popular revolutions brought pro-Western leaders to power in Georgia and Ukraine in the past two years, the Bush administration has come to see the region as a testing ground for its new focus on democratization around the world.

The U.S. also has begun to look with some alarm on the growing ties between Moscow and Beijing. China and Russia held joint military maneuvers last month.

Putin's Chosen 'Public' (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

MOSCOW -- Last month President Vladimir Putin's broadly televised public activities included flying a strategic bomber, driving an old Soviet-era Volga automobile, overseeing naval maneuvers on board a nuclear missile cruiser, inaugurating a highway tunnel and visiting a children's cancer hospital, where he had a friendly meal with a sick boy and ordered that a new, state-of-the-art ward be constructed without delay. He listened to the defense minister's report on Russian-Chinese military maneuvers and presided over grand celebrations of the 1,000th anniversary of the city of Kazan, attended by Russian regional leaders and presidents of most of the former Soviet republics. Western political scholars and journalists who met with him during the first week of September were nearly unanimous in their favorable impression of the Russian leader: "Energetic" and "confident" were the most frequent assessments heard from those who attended.

He looks, in fact, like a man interested in reelection. So much so that political commentators are once again guessing about whether he will stay in power beyond 2008, when his second -- and last -- term expires. To be sure, several loyal officials have suggested ways to overcome the constitutional obstacle to a third term. But with the next election still 2 1/2 years away, the Kremlin appears to remain undecided as to how to preserve the political status quo in Russia in 2008. Putin's heightened activity may just be a way of demonstrating that he is fully in charge and that he remains the ultimate decision maker on all important national issues, including the "challenge of 2008."

With the Kremlin's control over politics and society having tightened this past year, there is little for Putin to worry about from parliamentary factions, the media or outside opponents. While public opinion polls show unrelenting discontent with government policies, Putin's own approval rating, which had dropped somewhat, popped back up to 70 percent in August.

Even the smoldering youth activism that had caused the Kremlin concern -- some of the more radical groups were harassed and even prosecuted -- doesn't seem to pose much of a threat to the ruling elite. According to an August poll, 82 percent of young people share none of the ideas of these youth groups -- an apparent indication of a widespread rejection of activism as such.

With oil revenue growing steadily, the public generally apathetic, and the elites bought or intimidated into submission, Putin and his inner circle have reason to feel confident and high-spirited. But the Kremlin is still apprehensive about autonomous civic activism and won't ease its efforts to preempt any kind of genuine public initiative.

Sometimes this leads to peculiar political innovations. Consider the newly introduced representative body known as the Public Chamber. It was described by Putin as a "channel of influence of civil societies, of the citizens of the Russian Federation on the decisions made in the country."

Under the terms of the law establishing it, the Public Chamber will consist of Russians who "have done great service to the society and state." And who is to decide which honorable citizens are to be recognized by a grateful nation? The political style of Putin's Russia suggests the answer: The members will be handpicked by Putin himself, or nearly so. He will appoint one-third of the 126 Public Chamber members, and these core members will be the dominant force in selecting the remaining 84.

Putin has said that these people should be "politically maximally unengaged." The nomination process has so far been strictly secret (like all Kremlin decisions), but leaks and rumors have brought forth about a dozen names. Their main defining features are -- not unexpectedly -- their loyalty and special favors done for the Kremlin. At least two of the rumored candidates -- a famous female gymnast and a highly popular theater director -- are signatories to a recent collective letter supporting the conviction of Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the oil tycoon and potential political rival prosecuted by Putin's government. Others include a female college student from a provincial city who's also a commissar of Nashi, a government-sponsored youth movement masterminded by the Kremlin, and an unknown functionary of a government-sponsored association of journalists.

These are only rumors, of course, but whoever is chosen for the Public Chamber, this is not a body that will be doing much to channel public influence. The Kremlin would never risk granting real authority to anyone who has not proved his or her loyalty. If it is indeed concerned about feedback from the public, the concern has been overwhelmed by a far more important priority: the urge to keep society under control. The only question is whether Putin's regained political confidence will cause him to mistake the obliging recommendations of his loyalists for the actual voice of the people.

See Dubya Run To The WC (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

President Bush created a bit of a stir Wednesday when he inexplicably walked out in the middle of an important U.N. Security Council meeting on terrorism, right in the middle of a speech by the leader of Benin.

Delegates thought it was another example of American arrogance -- U.S. officials are notorious for leaving meetings in mid-session, especially at the General Assembly. Russia's Vladimir Putin , Britain's Tony Blair and China's Hu Jintao sat patiently through the less-than-riveting address.

But it appears that Bush meant no insult, judging from a note he handed to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice shortly before he left.

Bush, after waiting while a member of his security detail swept a nearby bathroom, used the facilities and return to the meeting a few minutes later.The Big Picture

Some people simply can't get with the program. Take Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), for example. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced Wednesday that he was sending a bipartisan House Appropriations Committee trip to New Orleans to check things out.

But Obey, the committee's top Democrat, demurred. "At this point, all efforts should be focused on helping those in need and recovering the dead," Obey said in a statement. "There will be plenty of time for politicians to play visiting fireman, but right now any congressional trip can't help but end up being a dog-and-pony show," he said, attacking a congressional tradition nearly as sacred as pork itself.

"I've seen congressional trips in these situations become photo ops that take time and energy away from emergency activities," continued Obey, a three-decade veteran of the committee. "We need to give emergency responders a week or so to do their work and stabilize the situation before we divert their attention by asking them to be congressional travel guides. Photo ops can come later. We have no business posing for them now. At this point, one of the watchdogs we may need is a watchdog to keep Congress from getting in the way of people doing real work."

Turns out the committee isn't likely to be going for a while, but an assorted bipartisan group of 20 House members is taking off this weekend.

The Senate, which, fortunately, values tradition, dogs and little ponies, would not be deterred.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) promptly announced yesterday that they would be leading a delegation leaving today on a one-day trip "to assess Katrina rescue and recovery efforts." The delegation "will hold . . . media availabilities" at Harrah's casino in New Orleans, in Pass Christian, Miss. and at the airport in Mobile, Ala., the announcement said.

The delegation includes the two leaders and GOP Sens. Thad Cochran (Miss.), Susan Collins (Maine), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), James M. Inhofe (Okla.), Richard C. Shelby (Ala.) and John W. Warner (Va.). The Democratic senators are Max Baucus (Mont.), Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) and Debbie Stabenow (Mich.).A Heck of a (New) Job

North Koreans Insist On Demand For New Reactor In Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By JOSEPH KAHN

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 15 - North Korea on Thursday refused to drop a new demand that the outside world build it a nuclear reactor before it dismantles its nuclear weapons, leaving six-nation negotiations here on the verge of collapse.

The United States and North Korea identified its demand for a light-water nuclear reactor as the main sticking point in the talks, which have continued fitfully over two years and failed to produce even a joint statement of principles. While this round will continue for at least another day, Christopher Hill, the chief American negotiator, made it clear on Thursday that the gap had widened over three days of talks. "The only thing North Korea is interested in discussing is a light-water reactor," Mr. Hill said. "No country is going to provide North Korea with a light-water reactor. So we have reached a bit of a standoff."

That leaves the Bush administration with an unhappy choice - go on indefinitely with talks that have produced no result, or seek a consensus to impose international penalties on North Korea against the wishes of most countries in the region.

One goal for the United States in these talks, analysts say, is to show enough sincerity and flexibility to convince Asian nations that fault lies with North Korea and that imposing penalties is the only viable option.

North Korea is eager to show that it wants to dismantle its nuclear arms program and would do so but for the unreasonable demands of the United States, which it accuses of having a "hostile policy" intended to overthrow its government.

Those competing agendas were on display on Thursday. The United States said the other four regional powers participating in the talks, South Korea, Russia, Japan, and the host, China, agreed that North Korea's condition that it receive a reactor before ending its arms program was impossible to meet.

North Korea said that the other parties had agreed that it was justified in requesting a light-water reactor and that only the United States had refused to discuss the matter.

Hyun Hak Bong, a spokesman for the North Korean delegation at the talks, said his government considered a new nuclear plant an essential gesture of good will from the United States. Mr. Hyun said Washington had not kept its word in the past, so the donation of the plant must precede any North Korean concessions.

"Providing a light-water reactor is a matter of principle for building trust," Mr. Hyun told reporters outside the talks in Beijing. "The United States says it cannot give us a light-water reactor no matter what."

"It is telling us to give up" the nuclear program "first without doing its part," he added.

Light-water nuclear reactors are not easily diverted to weapons use. North Korea was promised two light-water reactors to end its nuclear arms program in a 1994 deal reached with the Clinton administration. No plants were delivered and the deal failed in 2002, when the Bush administration accused North Korea of enriching uranium for atomic bombs.

Mr. Hill said North Korea's condition could not be met legally.

N. Korea Nuclear Talks Mired In 'Major Disagreements' (WT)

By Shigemi Sato And Jun Kwanwoo, Agence France-presse

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

BEIJING -- Talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear-weapons program are deadlocked due to "major disagreements" between the North and the United States, delegates said yesterday.

"There wasn't any progress today. ... We are in a bit of a standoff at the moment," U.S. envoy Christopher R. Hill told reporters after a day of meetings with his North Korean counterpart and other chief delegates.

Mr. Hill, an assistant secretary of state, said there were "major disagreements" between the United States and North Korea, echoing the assessments of Japan and host country China.

The dispute centers on the North's demand that the international community help it build light-water atomic reactors to generate electricity in exchange for ending its nuclear-weapons program.

The United States and Japan have refused, with Washington saying the cost and time frame are impractical and that the Stalinist state cannot be trusted to confine a reactor to civilian use.

"The differences of our positions are so great that the talks are stalemated," Japan's top envoy Kenichiro Sasae told reporters.

"North Korea's demand for a light-water reactor is strong. We are not in a position to accept it as it is. The prospect is bleak unless this question is resolved," Mr. Sasae said.

In an attempt to settle their differences, Mr. Hill and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Gye-gwan, held a 90-minute one-on-one meeting yesterday but failed to reach a compromise, with one official saying both left the session with "stiff faces."

A spokesman for the North Korean delegation agreed yesterday that the talks were "not making progress" due to the dispute over light-water reactors.

"While other participating countries expressed understanding on this issue, the United States unreasonably vowed not to provide light-water reactors," said spokesman Hyun Hak-bong.

Mr. Hill, however, rejected the North's claims that all parties except the United States were willing.

"No delegation was prepared to offer North Korea a light-water reactor," Mr. Hill said.

He urged the North to accept "a pretty good deal" he put on the table.

"The deal consists of really a lot of what the DPRK [North Korea] should want -- security guarantees, a recognition package, access to international financial institutions, a very serious energy package," he said.

The talks involving the two Koreas, Japan, Russia, China and the United States resumed on Tuesday after a five-week recess. Still, there was no sign they have broken down, with Mr. Hill and the North Koreans indicating they will continue discussions today.

DOJ_NMG_0006352

"Everybody has got an interest in solving this problem through diplomatic means. ... There will be a point at which we look at the deadline, but we are not at that point yet," Mr. Hill said.

The talks are aimed at persuading North Korea, which says it has nuclear weapons, to give them up verifiably and irreversibly in exchange for security guarantees as well as energy and economic aid.

But they have become bogged down by Pyongyang's insistence that its right to peaceful atomic energy be included in a statement of principles the six nations are trying to adopt to denuclearize the Korean Peninsula.

Differences of opinion between the six have became stark, with the United States and Japan insisting that light-water reactors were out of the question and South Korea saying they should remain an option.

China and Russia also have sided with North Korea on the nuclear-energy issue, though not as vocally as Seoul.

Mr. Hill said it would take up to a decade to build a light-water reactor and cost $2 billion to $3 billion; he urged the North to accept instead a South Korean offer to run power lines across the border.

Under a now-defunct 1994 agreement, two light-water reactors were to have been built by a U.S.-led consortium to replace North Korea's existing graphite-moderated reactors, which can produce weapons-grade plutonium.

But construction was suspended after the United States in 2002 accused the North of developing a secret uranium-enrichment program.

Failure to reach an agreement in Beijing could prompt the United States to take the issue to the U.N. Security Council and press for sanctions.

Talks Deadlock Over N. Korea's Demand For Reactor (WP)

By Edward Cody, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 15 -- U.S. and North Korean diplomats acknowledged an irreconcilable deadlock Thursday in long-stalled nuclear disarmament talks, casting doubt on the future of Chinese-sponsored six-party negotiations.

The stalemate, based on the North Korean demand that it be given a light-water nuclear reactor to produce electricity, brought the current round of discussions to a rancorous standstill after three days. Representatives of the participating countries, which also include South Korea, Japan and Russia, did not indicate they would abandon the negotiations, but none outlined a way to keep talks going.

"We're in a bit of a standoff at this point," said Christopher Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs and chief U.S. negotiator. "We'll have to see where this leads."

If the talks break down permanently, the Bush administration has suggested referring the issue of North Korea's nuclear weapons program to the U.N. Security Council for possible economic and other sanctions. Other participants in the talks, including China, which has veto power on the Security Council, have indicated they would not favor that course. North Korea has warned it would consider such a step tantamount to war.

Chinese diplomats, who sponsor and act as referees in the six-party talks, were meeting with their North Korean counterparts to explore salvaging the discussions.

Hill said he planned to meet with Chinese diplomats on Friday, but he made it clear that neither side seemed ready to budge. "I think it's fair to say we have a rather major disagreement on this point," he said.

A breakdown would represent a major setback for the Beijing government, which since August 2003 has taken a prominent leadership role in seeking a diplomatic solution to one of Asia's most intractable problems. Barring a dramatic turnabout by North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, however, it was difficult to see how the gap could be bridged, diplomats said.

"The talks are deadlocked," said the chief Japanese delegate, Kenichiro Sasae. "The differences between positions remain large and there are no prospects of agreement."

A North Korean spokesman, Hyun Hak Bong, said in a statement that his government's demand for a light-water reactor was a litmus test of whether the United States has abandoned hostility toward Pyongyang.

"Providing a light-water reactor is a matter of principle for building trust," the statement said. "The United States says it cannot give us a light-water reactor no matter what. It is telling us to give up the nuclear first without doing its part."

The Bush administration has demanded that North Korea relinquish not only its nuclear weapons program but also its ambition to build a nuclear reactor to produce electricity. Hill said the U.S. government believes that North Korea cannot be trusted on the issue, because it converted a research reactor in the 1990s into a source of weapons-grade plutonium.

Such a plant is out of the question, Hill said, because North Korea expelled U.N. weapons inspectors at the end of 2002 and, in January 2003, withdrew from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. The nation's energy needs can be supplied by a South Korean-proposed program that is included in the Chinese-drafted plan under discussion here, he added.

North Korea Poses Aid Puzzle (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

BEIJING -- The main market in Kang Chon Ha's hometown in North Korea is flush with illicit commodities: rice and corn donated by foreign governments to feed the impoverished country's hungriest and most vulnerable people.

"Senior officials sell it out the back door" of county warehouses, says Mr. Kang, a trader who supplied small vendors across North Korea before fleeing last year, and who uses a pseudonym because he fears retribution against relatives still there. "They'll do anything to make money."

The widespread availability of donated food in North Korea's booming markets shows how difficult it is for relief organizations to work with a government that, frustrated aid workers and others say, is often more interested in preserving its power than in protecting its citizens. Reports of diverted aid also are deepening mistrust of the government among other nations -- including those negotiating with Pyongyang over the future of its nuclear capabilities.

Yesterday, talks under way here since Tuesday remained at an impasse, the latest stumbling block being the North's demand for a light-water nuclear reactor in return for it abandoning atomic weapons. The U.S. long has said the world can't trust that Pyongyang won't convert a civilian nuclear program to military use.

It is impossible to know exactly how much aid is diverted -- to markets as well as to the military and other groups favored by the regime -- given tight North Korean restrictions on monitoring. But experts say it could be substantial.

A decade after the start of a famine that may have killed more than a million people, and despite massive deliveries of food aid, the situation remains precarious. Thirty-seven percent of all North Korean children are malnourished, as are a third of mothers, according to data from the United Nations' World Food Program. That makes it impossible to walk away, aid officials say.

"In North Korea, you have a ruthless government that is holding its own people hostage," says Marcus Noland, a Korea expert at the Institute for International Economics in Washington. "That is the basic ethical dilemma."

Now, North Korea says the crisis is easing and it wants to stop receiving emergency food shipments and instead get more extensive development assistance. Officials last week told Richard Ragan, the head of the World Food Program office in Pyongyang, that his organization -- which last year provided nearly 300,000 metric tons of grain to the North -- should make the shift by the end of the year.

Song Se Il, a diplomat at Pyongyang's United Nations mission, said his government has decided to "discontinue" emergency aid because the "the amount received is small" and the "prospect for future humanitarian assistance is not good." He declined to comment further.

WFP officials say the North Koreans told them they feared becoming too dependent on aid. But many experts say they believe Pyongyang is chafing at the conditions attached to help from the WFP. They say Pyongyang may assume, incorrectly, that development aid would come with fewer strings attached.

North Korean officials "complain that over the past several years, aid shipments have declined while conditions have increased," says Mr. Ragan. "You've got white vehicles everywhere and people pushing on monitoring, pushing on access. They don't like it."

But even after a lot of pushing, aid experts say, oversight remains relatively weak. Despite repeated requests over 10 years, North Korea has refused to give the WFP a list of all institutions receiving the food aid it supplies. WFP officials also must give several days' advance notice of inspection visits.

WFP workers aren't allowed to interview people who aren't already receiving aid, making it difficult to verify food is going to those most in need. And, with few exceptions, they also are barred from visiting markets, an increasingly important conduit for diverted food donations.

"We believe that the vast bulk of what donors provide goes to the people it is intended for," says Gerald Bourke, the WFP spokesman in Beijing. Mr. Bourke says the WFP's ability to monitor aid flows in North Korea has "gotten a lot better over time, but there's still a long way to go."

Mr. Ragan says he doesn't believe the North Korean government has a policy of diverting WFP aid to the military or to markets. But he says that, given the sheer amount of food the agency is moving, some is going to "end up going the wrong way."

Aid officials and experts say that efforts by the WFP and others to improve monitoring have been undercut by large shipments of aid and subsidized food from South Korea and China with relatively few conditions attached. South Korea recently agreed to send 500,000 metric tons of rice to North Korea this year.

DOJ_NMG_0006354

Seoul says it is planning 20 site visits to track the shipment. That compares with hundreds of site visits per month conducted by WFP officials on a smaller amount of aid. Also, South Korea is shipping rice, favored by the elite, and especially vulnerable to diversion, instead of less desirable grains more likely to be consumed by the truly needy.

South Korea's Unification Ministry says it has tried to "increase the transparency of food distribution" in the North. Han Ki Soon, director of the ministry's Cooperation Fund Division, dismissed criticism that Seoul's laxer standards could be detrimental to the WFP's efforts.

Defectors report seeing regular supplies of South Korean rice in markets, along with rice and other grains donated by the U.S., Japan and others. One man who fled North Korea this year says "aid rice is sold everywhere." In his town in the northeastern part of the country, white bags of donated food line market stalls.

Some aid officials say bags from aid deliveries are often being reused. But defectors say it is easy to tell the imported rice and other grains from those grown in North Korea, which tend to be of lower quality.

A video shot surreptitiously in July 2004 in a large market in Chongjin, a city on the northeast coast, and obtained by a Japanese nongovernmental organization, showed plentiful supplies of food in sacks from donor countries, including some marked with an American flag and others from South Korea.

Some argue that diversion of aid isn't an entirely bad thing. Lee Seung Yong, a project coordinator at Good Friends, a South Korean NGO, says, "it would be better if all the aid went to those who need it most," but that all aid helps "push the price of rice down, indirectly giving a benefit to the poor."

Flows of aid to the market clearly do help lower prices. The WFP says the mere announcement of South Korea's plans to make its large shipment of aid this year sent food prices lower. And that helps anyone who buys food in the markets, a common practice among North Koreans; government restrictions have loosened in recent years and a large amount of food goes through markets rather than the so-called public distribution system.

But, says Stephan Haggard, a professor at the University of California, San Diego, "there are serious questions in a situation like this, about whether the effects are trickling down."

Mr. Haggard, the author of a recent paper on food aid and human rights in North Korea, says that many disadvantaged people, especially children, the elderly and the growing number of people who have lost industrial jobs as a result of economic changes, don't earn the wages necessary to be able to shop in the market. That is why aid agencies have targeted them for assistance in the first place.

"People who don't have market resources, who can't command the resources to buy food in the market" are those being hurt most by the diversion, says Mr. Haggard.

Court Says West Bank Barrier Must Detour by 5 Arab Villages (NYT)

By GREG MYRE

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

JERUSALEM, Sept. 15 - Israel's highest court ruled Thursday that part of Israel's West Bank separation barrier had imposed major hardships on Palestinian villagers and must be rerouted. It was the second such decision by the court.

However, the nine judges on the High Court of Justice also said in their unanimous ruling that Israel could build the barrier inside the West Bank, provided the government did so for security needs and not political considerations.

They criticized an advisory ruling last year by the International Court of Justice in The Hague that said all sections of the barrier inside the West Bank violated international law and should be torn down. The Israeli court said the international court had failed to consider security needs.

The immediate impact of Thursday's ruling will be to require Israel to revise a small section of the barrier built near the Jewish settlement at Alfei Menashe, where more than 5,000 settlers live.

Five Palestinian villages in the area, with about 1,200 people, brought the petition, contending the barrier was illegal. They said it left them in a tiny enclave, making it difficult and sometimes impossible to reach jobs, schools, farm land, hospitals and commercial centers.

"The enclave creates a chokehold around the villages," the court ruled. "It seriously damages the entire fabric of life."

The villagers must have permits to live in their homes. To travel to other Palestinian areas, they go through Israeli-controlled gates that are currently open from about 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., residents said.

"With this decision, we will be connected to our brothers and relatives again," said Yassin Marabeh, 47, the mayor of one village, Ras Tira.

DOJ_NMG_0006355

The court said that Israel "must, within a reasonable period, reconsider the various alternatives for the separation fence route" and explore security options that "injure the fabric of life of the residents of the villages of the enclave to a lesser extent."

The court, while not specifying a new route, ruled that Israel could build the barrier in the West Bank, which the court described as being under "belligerent occupation," as long as Israel's security concerns are balanced with Palestinian needs and human rights.

The Palestinian leadership says Israel is free to build a barrier on the West Bank boundary, its pre-1967 border, which is often referred to as the Green Line. But Palestinians object to having the barrier inside the West Bank, on land they are seeking for a future state.

Israel's deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert, told Israel Radio on Thursday, "The importance is that the court made it legal for a fence beyond the Green Line and decided the World Court ruling is not binding."

Moshe Negbi, a prominent Israeli legal commentator, agreed that the Israeli government had won an important victory in receiving the court's blessing to build in the West Bank, even if some sections of the fence must be adjusted.

Thursday's ruling was quite similar to one handed down by the Israeli court in June 2004 in response to a petition by several West Bank Palestinian villages northwest of Jerusalem. Israel responded by rerouting that section of the barrier. It still runs inside the West Bank, though it places less land on the Israeli side than previously planned.

Israel says the barrier is essential to defend against Palestinian suicide bombings and other attacks. The number of suicide bombings has come down dramatically since Israel began building the barrier three years ago, as other security measures have also been put into effect. A truce between the two sides was declared in February.

Along Israel's planned route, the barrier is to stretch for some 400 miles, and about one-third has been completed. Under the plan, about 10 percent of the West Bank would be on the Israeli side of the barrier.

Most of the nearly 250,000 West Bank settlers would be protected by the barrier, as well as Israelis living in East Jerusalem, which has been annexed by Israel.

In the Gaza Strip on Thursday, Palestinian and Egyptian security forces tried but largely failed to impose some order along their border, where civilians have been going back and forth freely since the Israeli troops completed their withdrawal on Monday. The security forces restricted the number of people crossing for much of the day.

But on Thursday afternoon, large numbers of Palestinians overwhelmed the security forces and hundreds poured into Egypt in scenes familiar from recent days. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Court Orders Rerouting Of Barrier (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, September 16, 2005

TEL AVIV -- Israel's Supreme Court yesterday ordered the government to dismantle and reroute a portion of its West Bank security barrier, ruling on behalf of five Palestinian villages isolated by the obstacle.

But even as the 9-0 ruling opened future challenges to the two-year-old network of electronic fence and concrete walls, the judges for the first time confirmed the legality of erecting a separation barrier inside the West Bank to protect Israeli citizens.

The decision rejected the July 2004 opinion by the United Nations' judicial arm that the more-than 400-mile obstacle -- built to repel terrorist attacks against Israelis and one-third complete -- violates international law because it is built on territory under military occupation.

While the court criticized the International Court of Justice's sweeping rejection of building the security barrier in the West Bank, it ruled that the specific sections of the fence must not unreasonably hamper living conditions for Palestinians.

The court sided with a group of Palestinian villages near the West Bank city of Qalqilyah whose residents were cut off from relatives, mosques and social services in larger Arab towns after being closed inside an Israeli enclave created to protect the Jewish settlement of Alfei Menashe.

"The enclave creates a chokehold around the villages. It seriously damages the entire fabric of life," wrote Israeli Chief Justice Aharon Barak in the 66-page decision. "Based upon the factual basis as presented to us, the existing route of the fence seems strange ... We are by no means persuaded that there is a decisive security-military reason for setting the fence route where it presently is."

Israel's defense ministry now must consider alternatives to the path that separates about 1,200 Palestinians in five small villages from the rest of the West Bank. According to the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which brought the petition on behalf of the Palestinian villages of Wadi a-Rasha and Ras a-Tira, at least four more legal challenges to the fence's route in other areas are making their way to the Israeli Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0006356

The first third of the fence already has been completed around the northern hub of the West Bank, and another 100 miles are being built. The government shifted the planned path of the fence earlier this year after a June 2004 Supreme Court ruling forced the government to reconsider blueprints for a fence route in between the village of Beit Surik and the Jerusalem suburb of Mevasseret Tziyon.

The decision yesterday marks the first time the court has instructed the government to tear down a part of the fence that already has been built.

Dana Alexander, the head of the legal department of Association for Civil Rights in Israel, said the decision marks an important precedent.

"The court ordered the government to dismantle the existing fence," she said. "That means all the existing parts of the fence can be submitted to judicial review, and if they are found to violate Palestinian rights unjustifiably, the state can be ordered to dismantle the fence."

Sharon Tells U.N. It's Time For Palestinian Peace Steps (NYT)

By JOEL BRINKLEY

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 15 - Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel spoke Thursday to the General Assembly, a body he has long considered a tool of the enemy, and challenged the Palestinians to demonstrate their commitment to peace now that Israel has completed its withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

"The State of Israel proved that it is willing to make painful concessions in order to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians," he said, his tone confident and firm. "I call on the Palestinian leadership to show determination and leadership and to eliminate terror, violence and the culture of hatred from our relations."

The audience reaction was polite, as is the custom here, but even that might have been more than Mr. Sharon would have expected in the past.

Through several decades in public life, Mr. Sharon had never before spoken to the United Nations. Just a few months ago it might have seemed unthinkable that he would stand before the world forum that has tried to pass countless resolutions criticizing Israel and precious few aimed at the Palestinians, in the Israeli view.

But this week, he said, numerous world leaders, including some from Islamic nations, have approached him in the halls of the United Nations building, asking to shake his hand and congratulating him on Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. Mr. Sharon, in an interview later, said he was pleased by that reception, though he declined to name the other leaders.

Nonetheless, in his address, Mr. Sharon could not help but refer to Israel's sorry history with the United Nations.

He said Israelis had not forgotten "dozens of harsh and unjust decisions made by the United Nations over the years." Referring to Iran, he added: "We know that, even today, there are those who sit here as representatives of a country whose leadership calls to wipe Israel off the face of the earth. And no one speaks out."

In the speech and in the interview, he described the decision to withdraw from Gaza as painful - "very hard, very hard and complicated."

But to the United Nations, he insisted, "Now it is the Palestinians' turn to prove the desire for peace."

While Mr. Sharon's speech was more conciliatory toward the Palestinians than is his custom, he said little to suggest that Israel planned any more conciliatory moves toward the Palestinians right now, though he did say that following a path toward peace was "my calling and primary mission for coming years."

His remarks brought criticism from some of his right-wing opponents in Israel. Furthermore, unless Mr. Sharon announces new concessions to coincide with any serious actions toward peace that the Palestinians may take, he could find himself in conflict with the Bush administration.

In recent weeks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said several times that she expects Israel and the Palestinians to take simultaneous steps toward peace in the months ahead.

Israel, she said in an interview last month, should withdraw from more West Bank cities and loosen roadblocks and checkpoints that restrict Palestinian travel, while Palestinian authorities should disarm Hamas and other Palestinian factions intent on continuing the uprising and should work to govern Gaza responsibly.

In the interview, Mr. Sharon's voice turned hard as he said: "The focus should be on Gaza now. It is the time now for the Palestinians to take steps to show they can rule. We left Gaza. We are not there. They will be tested now. Can they run a country? Can they stop the violence?"

Mr. Sharon did reiterate that Israel "is committed to the road map," referring to the peace plan that the United States and its allies proposed in 2003, "and the Sharm el Sheik understandings" early this year. At Sharm el Sheik, an Egyptian city on the Red Sea, Israel agreed to release some Palestinian prisoners and to withdraw from five West Bank cities.

DOJ_NMG_0006357

In his speech, Mr. Sharon made no obvious effort to tailor his remarks to curry favor with the other leaders meeting at the United Nations this week. He did not back away from positions that many here oppose. He opened his address by noting, "I arrived here from Jerusalem, the capital of the Jewish people for over 3,000 years, and the undivided and eternal capital of the State of Israel."

Palestinians hope to establish the capital of their state in part of Jerusalem, and many nations represented here are sympathetic to that goal.

Nasser al-Kidwa, the Palestinian Authority's foreign minister, sat silently through the speech and at its end folded his arms and did not join in the applause. Later, Mr. Sharon offered a long and impassioned defense of Israel's security fence, which surrounds much of the West Bank and in many places cuts into it. Israel's high court ruled Thursday that Israel must reroute part of it.

"We will continue to build it until it is completed," he said, "as would any other country defending its citizens."

But in the end the prime minister returned to the difficulties that have prevented him from appearing here before now.

"I hope," he said to the General Assembly, "that the comprehensive reforms that the United Nations is undergoing in its 60th anniversary year will include a fundamental change and improvement in the approach of the United Nations, its organizations and institutions, toward the State of Israel."

Later, he said: "It was important for people to hear it. It was important that I say it clearly."

U.S. Renews Push On China's Yuan (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration is turning up the heat on Beijing to allow the Chinese yuan to rise against the dollar, reigniting an economic dispute that had appeared settled.

Treasury Department officials are disappointed that China's eight-week-old promise to let the yuan move with market forces has resulted in only a tiny increase in its exchange value. They warn that Beijing is courting a backlash from U.S. lawmakers who say China's undervalued currency is robbing American companies of business and American workers of jobs.

Treasury Secretary John Snow has invited the Chinese finance minister, Jin Renqing, to meet during a gathering in Washington on Sept. 23-24 of senior economic officials from the Group of Seven major industrialized nations. The Chinese have indicated they plan to attend, but haven't yet formally accepted.

"The secretary will emphasize the need for the Chinese to demonstrate that the regime they've put in place will allow for greater flexibility in the yuan," said a Treasury official. In essence, Mr. Snow plans to tell the Chinese that it's not enough to say that the yuan can rise; they must also allow it to do so in a significant way.

"There has to be movement," the official said, although the administration doesn't have a specific percentage figure in mind.

The yuan had been fixed at about 8.3 to the dollar for more than a decade when Chinese officials, facing intense U.S. and European pressure, announced on July 21 that the currency would be immediately revalued by 2.1% and allowed to move in a way that would reflect the dictates of supply and demand. Since then, however, the yuan has barely budged and the currency has climbed a total of just 2.37% since the announcement.

In public, Treasury officials diplomatically say they understand the Chinese need time to implement the new system. "We have been very supportive of the reforming of the exchange-rate regime, but implied in that support is taking them at their word that over time they'll achieve greater flexibility and an exchange rate that increasingly reflects underlying supply and demand," Timothy Adams, Treasury's undersecretary for international affairs, said in an interview. "We expect that to occur."

Congressional actions -- both past and prospective -- leave little time for patience. The Treasury Department is due to release on Oct. 15 a biannual report to Congress on international currencies, and Mr. Snow promised months ago that unless China implemented significant reforms the fall report would "likely" cite China for manipulating its currency to gain an edge in international trade. That would trigger a legal requirement that the U.S. initiate formal negotiations with China over the currency question.

Mr. Snow is scheduled to travel to China in mid-October, and Treasury is likely to delay release of the report until after his return, Mr. Adams said.

The renewal of the confrontation comes at a time of tension in a spectrum of U.S.-China issues, from textile trade to copyright piracy to Chinese bids for American companies. In a meeting in New York this week, Chinese President Hu Jintao told President Bush that he would address U.S. concerns about its $162 billion trade deficit with China and about Chinese intellectual-property violations, according to Mike Green, the White House China expert.

DOJ_NMG_0006358

Mr. Bush, who plans to visit China in November, also raised with Mr. Hu concerns about the yuan. "It's in China's long-term economic interests and the world's economic interest for China to make further moves toward a flexible and market-oriented exchange rate," Mr. Green told reporters after the two leaders met.

While monetary authorities rarely announce currency moves in advance, the Chinese appear to be signaling that they don't plan another revaluation soon. Yu Yongding, a member of the monetary policy-making committee of the People's Bank of China, told Dow Jones Newswires recently that the Chinese authorities "need another, say, four or five months" to evaluate the new currency regime before making any big moves.

"I don't know if there will be further revaluation in the short term," said Mr. Yu. "The authorities need time to observe the effect of the small revaluation on economic growth that itself is in the process of changing even without the revaluation."

Many U.S. manufacturers, represented by groups like the National Association of Manufacturers, are pressing their representatives in Washington to take stronger action against China. "We are very disappointed in the way the Chinese have actually put their new regime to use," said Frank Vargo, NAM's vice president for international economic affairs. "It looks a lot like the old regime, except 2% up, which is trivial."

At least two anti-China bills are looming in Congress. One, sponsored by Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) would impose a 27.5% tariff on all Chinese goods entering the U.S. to counterbalance the allegedly unfair advantage the yuan's weakness gives Chinese companies over their U.S. competitors.

The administration opposes that bill as far too sweeping a punishment, and after talks with Mr. Snow and Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan this summer, the sponsors agreed to hold that bill back in anticipation of what turned out to be China's July 21 announcement of its new approach to the yuan. The bill is likely to resurface, however, particularly if Sens. Schumer and Graham feel the administration isn't being tough enough on China, by, for example, failing to brand China a currency manipulator in the October report.

A separate bill, already passed by the House and awaiting action in the Senate, would allow the Commerce Department to impose import duties against Chinese goods to counter the effects of government subsidies to Chinese firms.

"Protectionist pressures are really there," said the Treasury official. "Aside from something Katrina-related, there would be no more popular bill on the Hill right now than something protectionist aimed at China."

The Chinese authorities "have to recognize that," the official said.

EU Trade Chief Dismisses Bush Trade Claim (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Peter Mandelson, European Union trade commissioner, on Thursday accused President George W. Bush of “playing to the gallery” by calling for the global elimination of tariffs and subsidies, saying US farmers would oppose such a sweeping measure.

Mr Mandelson's comments came just one day after he and his counterpart Rob Portman, US trade representative, launched the most serious effort yet to agree on an agricultural liberalisation package as part of the Doha Round of global trade talks.

Mr Bush, speaking at the United Nations on Wednesday, said the US was “ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to the free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same”.

US officials said the president's statement was intended only to reaffirm his strong commitment to a successful outcome of the Doha talks, which are entering a critical period in the run-up to a December meeting of trade ministers from 146 nations in Hong Kong.

But Mr Mandelson, in an interview with BBC radio, said that, while he welcomed such ambition, “it is easy to make these grandiose commitments.

“Some will say he is playing to the gallery, and some will say that he is making these sort of lavish promises in the almost certain knowledge that the rest of the world cannot or won't follow suit and therefore he will get a free pass.”

He added: “There will be very, very many American farmers who will be waking up to hear his words and choking on their cornflakes.”

The issue of agricultural tariffs and subsidies remains the most divisive one in the Doha talks. Mr Portman, in an interview on Wednesday with the FT, said he and Mr Mandelson were "working in a constructive way" to bridge their gaps. For instance, the two are negotiating over specific numbers for reducing tariffs on agricultural imports, rather than simply arguing over general principles.

“We were at loggerheads and now we're at the point where we're talking and talking specifics," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0006359

But Mr Mandelson's comments underscored how difficult those talks will be. The EU is insisting on maintaining high tariffs for a range of sensitive products, while Mr Portman said US farmers would support only a deal that promised substantial new market access and strictly limited the number of products excluded from deep tariff cuts.

Tony Blair, the UK prime minister who holds the EU presidency, said in a speech at the UN that he would do everything possible to avoid failure at the Hong Kong ministerial. “I am not prepared to have that at least, not without the most monumental struggle,” he said.

He said that too many countries were bluffing in the negotiations. “We need to start calling those bluffs and make people understand that if we do end up with failure that will echo right around the world.” Pascal Lamy, director-general of the World Trade Organisation, also said yesterday he would use a “hands-on” approach to try to prevent failure at Hong Kong. Earlier this week when he said a transatlantic rapprochement on agriculture was "urgent" for the rest of the negotiations to make progress.

“That sort of finger-pointing must be done carefully,” he said. “It's a bit of a risk but I came [to the WTO] with a bit of capital, a bit of trust, from the members and I think I have to spend it.”

US Says Venezuela Fails To Combat Drug Trafficking (FT)

By Andy Webb-vidal

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

The US on Thursday struck Venezuela off its list of countries deemed to be co-operating in the war on drugs, injecting a new source of tension into deteriorating relations between Washington and Caracas.

In a statement released by the White House, President George W. Bush said Venezuela, as well as Burma, had “failed demonstrably” to adhere to their international counternarcotics obligations during the past year.

Venezuela’s “decertification”, as the measure is called, had been expected in the wake of a decision by President Hugo Chávez last month to suspend a co-operation agreement with the US Drug Enforcement Administration. While Mr Chávez has accused the DEA’s officials of “spying”, US officials have alleged elements within the Venezuelan authorities have become complicit with drugs-trafficking groups.

As much as a third of the cocaine smuggled from Colombia, the world’s top producer, to the US and Europe passes through Venezuela, drugs experts calculate - a volume equivalent to about 165 tonnes.

Jose Vicente Rangel, vice-president, said Venezuela was unruffled by the decision. “We could also propose the decertification of the United States in its war against drugs-trafficking,” he said.

Despite the decertification, unusually the Bush administration has decided to continue some assistance, much of which is likely to be aimed at opposition-linked civil groups.

John Walters, director of US National Drug Control Policy, said: “While Venezuela will be subject to sanctions, the president determined it is in the vital national interests of the US to continue selected US assistance.”

It is possible selective sanctions might include an obligation on the US to vote against advancing loans to Venezuela in multinational lending agencies, such as the Inter-American Development Bank. But in practice some observers had suggested that economic sanctions on Venezuela as a result of decertification would have come to less than $1m, a negligible amount for oil-rich Venezuela.

Venezuela continues to maintain bilateral counter-narcotics agreements with the principal countries of Europe.

Merkel Tries To Retune Her Economic Message (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

FRANKFURT -- Just days before Sunday's German election, front-runner Angela Merkel is struggling to retune her message on the economy, which is supposed to be her strongest issue but has been weakening her lead in the polls.

Ms. Merkel's center-right coalition is still firmly ahead of rivals but polling just short of an absolute majority in Parliament. Calling on her supporters to give her an outright victory and a mandate for economic change, Ms. Merkel shuffled economic advisers and attempted to refocus attention on Germany's high unemployment and low growth under incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

German media have focused on her tax adviser, Paul Kirchhof, whose belief in flat-rate income taxes Mr. Schroeder has criticized heavily. Under pressure from within her own Christian Democrats party, Ms. Merkel has reduced Mr. Kirchhof's importance by inviting the party's most popular finance expert, Friedrich Merz, into the campaign. Mr. Merz fell out with Ms. Merkel last year.

"Given the condition of our country we need everybody who can help," Ms. Merkel said on Wednesday when accepting Mr. Merz back into the fold. In recent weeks Ms. Merkel has struggled to explain to voters that her legislative program wouldn't go as far as Mr. Kirchhof's radical ideas.

Pollsters say most voters view Mr. Kirchhof's advocacy of a 25% flat tax on all incomes as unfair on lower earners. Ms. Merkel hasn't endorsed a flat tax, but Mr. Schroeder's attacks on it, along with his personal popularity, have helped his party narrow the Christian Democrats' once-huge lead to about eight points. Mr. Kirchhof on Tuesday acknowledged the storm by saying he should play a "tandem" role with Mr. Merz.

"The Kirchhof debate has spread a strong uncertainty among the population about what would happen. Many voters fear the cutbacks to the welfare state could be deeper than expected," said Josef Esser, political-science professor at Frankfurt University.

While voters think the Social Democrats are stronger on protecting the less affluent, they give Ms. Merkel more credit for competence on cutting unemployment, boosting economic growth and balancing public finances, according to polling institute TNS Emnid.

Mr. Schroeder has been playing up themes other than unemployment, reminding voters that he firmly opposed the war in Iraq while Ms. Merkel was more accommodating of the U.S. position.

Underlining the German election's impact across Europe, EU competition commissioner Neelie Kroes caused a stir in Brussels on Thursday by endorsing Ms. Merkel, saying a female chancellor of Germany would be "a gift for Europe."

Members of the European Union's executive arm normally don't endorse candidates in national elections. Leftwingers in the European Parliament attacked Ms. Kroes, but conservatives backed her.

Mr. Schroeder's recovery appeared to level off this week among voters who expressed a preference. Germany's electoral system awards extra seats to the main parties when minor parties don't reach a 5% support threshold, and when their strength is concentrated within regions. Both factors could help give Ms. Merkel's party a clear majority.

The Front-Runner in Germany Runs Scared (NYT)

By MARK LANDLER

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

MAINZ, Germany, Sept. 15 - Three days before an election that has become unexpectedly suspenseful, Angela Merkel turned up on Thursday in this ancient city on the Rhine with a blunt message: Chancellor Gerhard Schröder has failed, and his government ought to be thrown out.

"A person who doesn't have the support of his own party can't put Germany on the right path," said Mrs. Merkel, who, as leader of the opposition Christian Democratic Union, is poised to achieve two firsts: the first woman to become German chancellor and the first former East German to lead the reunified country.

"He promised they would reduce unemployment by two million," Mrs. Merkel declared, recalling a target that Mr. Schröder set before his second term. "Instead it grew. That's the truth."

Her audience of several hundred cheered often, if not quite passionately. Orange placards with the name "Angie" bobbed above the crowd, as the afternoon sun dipped behind Mainz's red-stone cathedral.

Mrs. Merkel is not a feel-good politician. Her stump speeches are lengthy, serious and larded with details. She rarely smiles, and responds to hecklers with a curt tone. She does not look like an Angie.

Yet Mrs. Merkel's sense of grim purpose may suit the moment. After spending four months with a seemingly unassailable lead in the polls, she finds herself in a dogfight with Mr. Schröder.

Mrs. Merkel, 51, is still likely to become chancellor after the vote on Sunday. But her preferred coalition, with the Free Democratic Party, has been falling just short of a majority in the most recent polls. She may have to settle for leading a so-called grand coalition of her Christian Democratic Union and Mr. Schröder's Social Democratic Party.

Given the aura of political invincibility that has enveloped Mrs. Merkel since a weakened Mr. Schröder called for elections in May, that would be seen almost as a defeat.

The campaign has been bumpy for Mrs. Merkel, with a few missteps by her and more blatant gaffes by some of her allies. But what has made the real difference, political analysts say, has been a nimble performance by Mr. Schröder down the stretch.

He has achieved a sort of role reversal, putting Mrs. Merkel on the defensive for her proposals, while largely avoiding any discussion of his own government's record. "For months, the C.D.U. has been seen as representing a new government," said Gerd Langguth, the author of a biography of Mrs. Merkel. "Everybody is asking, 'What would Merkel do,' not, 'What has Schröder done?' "

DOJ_NMG_0006361

Mrs. Merkel has played into that strategy, with her penchant for offering detailed policy prescriptions. On Thursday, as she began an explanation of how her party's tax proposals would affect people in various income brackets, people began drifting away from the rally.

"We're telling you before the election what we will do after the election," she said. "We don't want people to be afraid, so that's why we're telling you in clear terms what we plan to do."

In his speeches, Mr. Schröder sticks to generalities about his efforts, while cheerfully ripping into Mrs. Merkel's proposals.

The Christian Democrats have given the chancellor some easy targets, starting with a plan to raise the value-added tax to 18 percent, from 16 percent. Mrs. Merkel said it was needed to plug Germany's ballooning budget deficit; Mr. Schröder said it would hurt lower-income people.

Then Mrs. Merkel appointed Paul Kirchhof, an academic who advocates a flat tax, as her economic adviser. She was initially praised for her boldness, but she has been forced to defend Mr. Kirchhof, to whom the chancellor derisively refers as "the professor from Heidelberg."

This week, under pressure from party leaders, she welcomed back Friedrich Merz, a party authority on budget matters, who had resigned his post last year after a clash with Mrs. Merkel.

Although she has a remarkable personal story - the shy daughter of a Lutheran minister in East Germany who rose to the top of a male-dominated West German party - Mrs. Merkel rarely invokes it.

To her supporters in the crowd in this historical German town, however, Mrs. Merkel's shortcomings as a candidate are less important than her message.

"She has so much courage," said Hanna Kaltenbach, 58. "Schröder is a media star, but he is shallow."

Andreas Baldauf, 22, a business student at the University of Mannheim, said: "Gerhard Schröder had seven years to fix the situation, and he didn't. It's time to give Angie a chance."

As Mrs. Merkel left the stage, "Angie," the 1970's song by the Rolling Stones, warbled from loudspeakers. It has become the theme song of her campaign, and the crowd did not seem bothered to hear Mick Jagger sing, "All the dreams we held so close seemed to all go up in smoke."

Germans Haven't Forgotten Schroeder's Unfulfilled Pledge (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

BREMEN, Germany -- When he took office seven years ago, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder made a big promise he didn't keep.

"My most important job is the fight against the scourge of unemployment," he declared in his victory speech after winning the 1998 election. During the campaign, he told Germany's 4 million jobless that he would slash unemployment. Voters should kick him out of office if he failed, he added later.

Today, Germany's jobless rate is worse than ever; the number of people out of work hit a post-World War II high this year. German voters haven't forgotten Schroeder's pledge, and polls suggest they are ready to depose him in Sunday's national elections.

Angela Merkel, the candidate of the Christian Democrats who wants Schroeder's job, and her allies have been relentless in their reminders. "You have spent seven years making empty promises," she said in Parliament last week, telling lawmakers that Schroeder was "a man who has had his chance."

The criticism rings familiar to Schroeder, 61, who defeated longtime German leader Helmut Kohl by harping on the same thing. He called Kohl "the chancellor of unemployment" and ripped him for not having done more to invigorate the economy.

Germany exports more goods than any other country and has the world's third-largest economy. But it has been dogged by high jobless rates and weak economic growth for the better part of two decades. An aging workforce, generous social welfare programs and a cultural resistance to change have stymied efforts by a succession of governments to fix the economic problems.

Schroeder's Social Democrats and their partner in government, the Greens party, were hobbled by large deficits stemming from the huge public investment to unify the country after the Berlin Wall collapsed. The coalition did trim social benefits and cut some taxes to encourage companies to hire more workers, but the strategy has not panned out. Many of Germany's biggest industrial companies remain profitable, but have shifted jobs to Eastern Europe and other regions where it is cheaper to operate.

"He really thought that curbing costs would improve the situation and reduce unemployment -- he really believed that," said Michael Vester, a professor at the University of Hannover, in Schroeder's home town. "But this was an error. It didn't work."

In addition to the worsening job climate, average personal incomes have stagnated on Schroeder's watch. That, in turn, has caused Germans to consume less, hurting economic growth.

Things got so bad that Schroeder decided in May to call new elections a year early. With many lawmakers in his own party abandoning him, he said German voters needed to decide whether the country should continue his policies. In public, he looked tired and beaten. Some analysts suggested that he had lost his enthusiasm for the job.

Since then, Schroeder has recovered some of his zest on the campaign trail. His coalition, known as "red-green" for the colors of its two parties, has gained in the polls by predicting that Merkel's Christian Democrats will shred Germany's social safety net and cut taxes for the rich. But he's offered few new ideas, and polls indicate he faces long odds to win another term.

At a rally in Bremen, a river port in northern Germany, about 4,000 people turned out in a drizzle Wednesday to hear Schroeder defend his record. He seemed to draw energy from the crowd as he pumped his fists in the air and thundered into the microphone.

He talked about climate change, the war in Iraq, health care, social justice, relations with Russia and automobile fuel standards. But he didn't say much about jobs or make any more promises. When he did talk about the economy, he accused the media of ignoring the good news, pointing to a World Bank study that ranked Germany fifth in business innovation.

"I am proud of this, I am proud of this!" Schroeder said. He acknowledged that more economic changes were necessary, but didn't go into detail. "They will be done -- by us -- so that the social justice in this country remains intact."

Several voters at the party-sponsored event said they would vote for Schroeder and the Social Democrats, but only reluctantly.

Bruno Schroeder, 54, a former financial adviser, said he would support the chancellor (who is no relation), mostly because he disliked Merkel more. He said he usually votes for the Social Democrats, but complained that Schroeder's performance "could have been better."

"He needed to do a better job showing the country the direction in which we need to go," he added.

Thorben Harleng, 26, a student, was also unenthusiastic. When asked what Schroeder needed to focus on, Harleng responded simply: "Jobs." But he said he would vote to reelect the chancellor, calling him a better choice than Merkel. "I don't think she could have done any better," he said.

That Schroeder has made the race close is a testament to his political skills. Though the polls show that Germans favor the Christian Democrats over the Social Democrats, on a personal level, Schroeder tops Merkel, who tends to be reserved and dour, in voter popularity. They think he outshined her last week in a one-on-one debate.

"What is Schroeder's trick in having the contour of 5 million unemployed people disappear in a campaign puff of smoke?" the Frankfurter Allgemeine newspaper said in an editorial this week. "It is the work of a great political illusionist."

Clinton Gathers World Leaders (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 16, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 15 -- The U.N. General Assembly may have failed this week to come up with a stirring plan to combat the world's ills. But there was former president Bill Clinton -- once said to have harbored an ambition to become secretary general -- assembling his own mini-General Assembly of presidents, prime ministers, kings and other pooh-bahs on Thursday to devise specific plans for addressing poverty, global warming, religious conflict and better governance.

The inaugural meeting of what he has dubbed the Clinton Global Initiative will stretch over three days of seminars and speeches, bringing together 800 movers and shakers who paid $15,000 each for a seat. If the opening session is any guidepost, the meetings resemble the gabfests at Davos, the annual global economic summit held in Switzerland, or the Renaissance Weekends that Clinton attended as president. But Clinton added a catch -- each of the attendees is required to commit to doing something to improve the world.

"This is more than a photo op, more than business as usual," Clinton said as he opened the session. "All of us come to meetings, we study issues, we say what we think, and too often we complain when the governments that we seek to influence ignore what we think is our sound advice."

So every person attending is required to make a commitment in writing. More than 50 commitments have been made, totaling more than $300 million. Clinton announced four specific commitments -- signed on the spot for the cameras -- which included a $100 million Africa investment fund and a plan to fight HIV-AIDS through micro-enterprise development. One commitment was made by the Clinton initiative itself -- a pledge that all of its activities would be "carbon neutral," promising to mitigate the effects of plane travel and conference preparation by financing renewable energy projects that replace fossil-fuel energy sources.

"What is happening here is the kind of intense dialogue between different people and cultures which should take place at the U.N. but can't anymore because of highly ritualistic structures, protocol and conflict avoidance," said Richard C. Holbrooke, a former U.N. ambassador under Clinton who made the HIV-AIDS commitment.

DOJ_NMG_0006363

The initiative, which will take up three floors of a midtown hotel and promises as many motorcade tie-ups as the General Assembly, is the former president's most ambitious attempt to define his post-presidency. Along with the heads of state, former senior Clinton administration officials packed the hall Thursday afternoon.

Organizational mix-ups also gave the event a touch of Clinton nostalgia, as scores of delegates discovered that their credentials were not ready and the meeting began 20 minutes late because people ignored pleas to sit down.

Clinton has strived to keep his project nonpartisan. He presided over an opening roundtable discussion that included King Abdullah of Jordan, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) participated in another panel.

Rice's attendance was noteworthy, coming after nearly 10 years of Republicans' often tough attacks on Bill Clinton's foreign policy. Her predecessor, Colin L. Powell, once told a friend that he had to cancel an appearance at an AIDS conference in Nigeria early in President Bush's first term after Clinton decided to attend. But Clinton and former president George H.W. Bush have worked closely together in the past year, raising money for victims of the Indian Ocean tsunami and Hurricane Katrina.

Clinton was clearly in his element during the roundtable discussion, as he moderated a broad-ranging and polite exchange between the young king, the seasoned British prime minister and the poised Republican secretary of state. He tossed around ideas -- such as an insurance fund for investors in the Gaza Strip -- and sprinkled a plethora of statistics and facts throughout his commentary. He steered clear of Iraq, the contentious issue that most consumes Jordan, Britain and the United States.

"I don't want to get too much in the weeds," Clinton said, but he bemoaned the expiration of something called the worldwide Multi-Fiber Arrangement , which he said hurt African nations. Lesotho, "with the third-highest AIDS rate in the world, they had 2,000 jobs [before passage of Clinton's Africa free-trade agreement] and 50,000 after, and now have lost 15,000 jobs." What, he asked, should be done about this?

Neither Blair nor Rice rushed to answer Clinton's question.

At another point, Clinton said he had not been away from politics long enough to force them to answer whether high oil prices made their lives easier, a reference to the growing attractiveness of alternative energy sources.

Thomas F. McLarty III, former Clinton White House chief of staff, said the diverse gathering was a "picture worth a thousand words," but he was especially amused that Clinton had enlisted former aide George Stephanopoulos to make a presentation. Stephanopoulos, now anchor of the ABC News program "This Week," earned Clinton's ire by writing a tell-all book. Clinton will appear on "This Week" on Sunday to promote his initiative.

This Conference Will Not Be Like So Many Before It (FT)

By Bill Clinton

Financial Times, September 16, 2005

Sixty years ago, the San Francisco Conference launched the United Nations, even before the second world war had ended. Ten years ago, after terrible bloodshed in the Balkans, the Dayton proximity talks brought long-overdue peace to Bosnia. I hope that future historians will also think of 2005 as another step forward in the not-very-advanced -science of conference-making.

This week, the inaugural Clinton Global Initiative (CGI), a three-day programme, is taking place in New York. More than 40 heads of state are joining me and a large number of participants from a broad swath of civil society: non-governmental organisation activists, legislators, policy experts, business leaders, journalists and writers from every continent. This will be a different kind of conference. At this conference, the activists will have access to the presidents and vice versa. And we will do a lot more than talk. International conferences always sound ambitious, but are rarely places where searching questions are answered. Too often, these sessions are glorified photo opportunities. Then it is business as usual the next day. That is simply not good enough. We need action.

That is exactly what we will try to get at CGI to address four critical challenges: poverty, religious strife, climate change and governance. All difficult – but all solvable. This conference is different because it asks everyone who attends to make a concrete commitment of one kind or another – a cash pledge, or a promise of service or some kind of specific executable plan.

As the conference begins, we have already received some important commitments, including a $100m (£55m) pledge from the Hunter Foundation to support holistic approaches for development; a study by McKinsey, Oxfam and Tufts University on the private sector's role in disaster response; and a public -education campaign to increase -awareness of the UN Millennium -Development Goals led by Bob Rubin and Don Evans.

As the world moves rapidly and -inexorably towards being more and more interconnected, I think a more open conversation between the world's "haves" and "have-nots" will benefit both. We need to move forward together.

To do so, we must answer some hard, troubling questions. Why is capitalism so robust in some places and failing in others? Why are countries rich in -mineral resources often so poor in -democratic resources? How can we stimulate economies in developing nations and contain environmental damage at the same time? What simple legal and political steps can we take to harness the tremendous energies of the world's billions of poor? When we have some answers, we have to act on them to make change.

I do not claim for a second that this initiative will solve all of these -extraordinarily tough questions, but one thing is clear – the vast majority of us, from all religions and races, all political views, all walks of life, want a better world. There is more that unites us than separates us.

Getting all hese people in one place to focus on these critical problems with a commitment to what each of us can really do to change them is an important first step, and this week it is a step that hundreds of us – activists, presidents and chief executives from every political party and religious affiliation – are taking together.

Fox Promises Electoral Order In 2006 (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

The past five years have been tough political sledding for Mexican President Vicente Fox, the first non-Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) president in 70 years. But his sixth and final year in the job may yet prove the most challenging.

The reason is the looming July 2006 presidential elections. Election year instability in Mexico was avoided in 2000 but over time it has tended to be the rule rather than the exception. In an interview Wednesday at the Mexican Mission to the United Nations in New York, Mr. Fox emphasized the country's established 10-year record of fiscal stability and political reform that he predicts will guarantee a smooth transition of power.

His facts are straight. But still, there is the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD) and its candidate, Mexico City mayor and leftist firebrand Andres Manuel López Obrador, to worry about. This hard-charging, demagogic socialist with overt authoritarian instincts conceivably could win. Equally worrying are the stunts he might pull if he loses. He has a record of fomenting street violence when he doesn't get his way.

In an otherwise tame environment Mr. López Obrador might not seem so menacing. But his appearance on the national scene comes at a time when there is a frightening rise in organized crime -- a consequence of fierce competition among armed gangs to fill U.S. demand for illicit drugs -- in parts of Mexico, particularly along the U.S. border. Another factor is the weakness of the Mexican economy, largely because government policies haven't responded to the pressures of global competition. Modernizers view these failings with dismay. Mr. López Obrador sees them as an opportunity for populist rebellion.

Mr. Fox's sanguine view comes in large part from his confidence in the Federal Electoral Institute (IFE) and the tribunal that watches over it. The nation, the president assured me, has "not only reached full democracy, full liberty of expression, communication and information" but also has developed the "democratic, strong institutions" necessary for a successful election. Mexico, Mr. Fox asserted, has secured these gains over the past decade under the governance of two different political parties.

In 2000 the IFE acted impressively, ensuring fairness and transparency despite pressure from the PRI to preserve the status quo. Mr. Fox's predecessor, Ernesto Zedillo, earned high marks for his commitment to an independent IFE even though it led to a victory of the National Action Party (PAN) and Mr. Fox. Now Mr. Fox is pledging to be equally impartial, recognizing that Mexico's next six years will depend heavily on confidence in the rule of law. "I don't have any doubts that the process will go as it should be expected to go," he told me.

That Mexicans yearn for a continuation of the transparent, rule-based electoral process that IFE managed in 2000 is undoubtedly true. But that doesn't mean that "AMLO" will cooperate. Mexicans recall what happened when Mr. López Obrador lost the Tabasco governor's race in 1994 by a wide margin to PRIsta Roberto Madrazo. Deciding that his loss was due to Mr. Madrazo's exuberant spending, he led a blockade of oil wells. His supporters also organized a massive sit-in, camping out in tents in the Tabasco capital city's main square. Mr. López Obrador called it peaceful civil disobedience but as downtown Villahermosa began to smell like a bear pit, his opponents decided to strike back. Violence erupted before the whole thing was finally put to rest.

A year later, Mr. López Obrador led another, more serious, blockade of government-owned oil operations in Tabasco. It lasted 19 days, covered 60 wells and cost millions in lost output. In Mexico City, corruption scandals have plagued his government, but he counters by painting himself as a downtrodden outsider pledging to uproot the status quo. In truth, he most resembles the career politicians whose machine kept the PRI in power for so long, except that he has a stronger-than-average instinct for the jugular. With the vote still 10 months off, AMLO is already signaling to his machine bureaucracy in Mexico City that he believes the IFE is against him and that he's prepared to make a stink if he loses in a close race.

When I asked Mr. Fox about candidates who might not respect the rule of law, he told me he didn't want to get into names of individuals or parties. But he did say that he believes Mexico has learned from the past through pain and that Mexicans know that returning to authoritarianism, corruption, impunity, populism or demagoguery are dead ends. There is "no way back to the paternalism of controlling the poor through government programs," he said, and Mexicans know that. They are for "stability, the rule of law, discipline and order in public finance and against indebting the country."

In other words, the president believes Mexicans will reject the left-wing populism of Mr. López Obrador and vote instead for a continuation of his government's fiscal stability. Yet he may be underestimating the discontent generated by a sluggish economy, a factor that could produce a tight race.

Even if a pragmatic PRI candidate like Roberto Madrazo or a more long-shot candidate like the PAN's Felipe Calderon were to win, there is the question of AMLO's regard for the rule of law. Referring to what happened in Tabasco, Mr. Fox said, "That situation will not repeat itself in Mexico today because the system has proven for 10 years in a row that elections are respected."

Mr. Fox's commitment to the process is important. But enforcing the rule of law will take more. On security, he points out that his government has pacified Chiapas, modestly reduced crime and turned back the surge in kidnapping. And he remains convinced that the organized crime due to drug trafficking can be handled providing the U.S. makes it a joint effort.

Still the odds have to be in favor of the underworld, given the demand for narcotics across the border. Mexico has already admitted that law enforcement has been seriously corrupted by drug traffickers at some levels and the problem is not likely to go away. That won't help when it comes to dealing with any political instability that arises during an election year. Forewarned is forearmed and that's something not only for Mr. Fox to think about but also for his neighbors to the north to keep in mind.

Another U.N. Charade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 16, 2005

The United Nations world summit that has clogged Manhattan traffic arteries for the past three days has a way of clogging minds as well. So let's think carefully about exactly what, other than a commuter's nightmare, this latest exercise in global diplomacy has achieved.

On the plus side, the summit seems to have done no real harm: It has not further extended the authority and reach of the U.N., it has not foisted another "protocol" or "convention" for the Senate to consider, and it has not established another significant seven-letter acronym -- er, agency -- for U.S. taxpayers to pronounce, and especially to fund.

That may be a negative accomplishment, but it is certainly a real one, especially as Secretary General Kofi Annan had envisioned the summit as an opportunity to expand membership in the Security Council, expand his own powers and require rich countries to pony up additional billions in foreign aid, among other brainstorms. It took new U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton seven weeks of dogged negotiation to make sure none of that happened, and for this he deserves credit.

On the other hand, the diplomatic price the U.S. paid for a no-harm-done outcome was a no-reform result. It has not been 10 days since Paul Volcker delivered the devastating conclusions of his 847-page Oil for Food inquiry and his call for the complete overhaul of U.N. management practices. Yet already his report is being treated as a historical artifact of no particular relevance. In the U.N.'s strange universe, it's as if Oil for Food never even happened.

For example, the so-called Outcome Document to which world leaders agreed at the summit specifically "[commended] the Secretary General's previous and ongoing efforts to enhance the effective management of the United Nations." Yet Mr. Volcker's report found, among other things, that Mr. Annan and his staff knew of Saddam Hussein's kickback schemes in Oil for Food but never reported the problem, much less took steps to address it. If this is what the international community thinks is commendable behavior, imagine what sorts of management standards it believes are merely tolerable.

Equally unhelpful have been some of the comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who recently gushed to the New York Times that "I've never had a better relationship with anyone than I've had with Kofi Annan."

Assuming (we hope) that Ms. Rice is being insincere, her calculation seems to be that American diplomatic capital should not be spent seeking Mr. Annan's departure, and that U.S. interests at the U.N. are best served by a politically wounded, and thus presumably beholden, Secretary General. She might want to rethink that assumption in light of some of Mr. Annan's recent comments, such as blaming "spoilers" and "governments that were not willing to make concessions" for the failure of the summit. Chief among the governments not willing to "make concessions" was the United States, an implication lost on nobody.

The biggest loser here is the U.N. itself. We have never accepted the view -- increasingly common in some liberal precincts -- that America should conduct no foreign policy in the absence of U.N. benediction, much less that U.N. agencies and offices ought to take the lead role in maintaining international security and promoting economic development. But as long as the U.N. exists, we'd like to think that it can, in limited circumstances, be a useful instrument of U.S. foreign policy, provided the organization is politically credible and relatively effective. This was the original hope for Oil for Food; instead, it became the emblem of the U.N.'s incompetence and corruptibility.

What the outcome of this summit makes clear is that the U.N. patient will not heal itself. On the management side, the Volcker report vividly describes the organization's implacable resistance to reform, for reasons that are both cultural and institutional. Politically, Mr. Annan's original reform proposals were both overambitious and wrongheaded, and while their demise is nothing to be regretted, the fact that the member states could not agree to anything better casts doubt on the possibility that changes will be achieved through international negotiation.

We have a modest proposal of our own. The Bush Administration should insist that the U.N. bureaucracy be placed under a five-year trusteeship to implement the management reforms suggested by the Volcker report. The trustees should be a handful of real international worthies -- Mr. Volcker and his fellow commissioners Richard Goldstone of South Africa and Mark Pieth of Switzerland would fit the bill -- whose probity and good judgment are beyond dispute. The U.S. cannot dictate such terms to the U.N., but Congress has the power to withhold American funding until such a trusteeship is established. We hope it does so.

This is tough love, we know. But the people who should like this idea the most are those who claim to be fervent believers in the U.N. and its multilateral purposes. They can't possibly be proud of the spectacle on display at Turtle Bay during the past two weeks.

Jihad's Fresh Face (NYT)

By WALEED ZIAD

The New York Times, September 16, 2005

OF the many questions surrounding Egypt's presidential elections last week - Were opposition candidates unfairly removed from the ballot? Did the ruling party of President Hosni Mubarak cheat at the polls? - a more general query has gone largely unmentioned: Did this election, or the other recent democratic experiments in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere, really further American aims in the Muslim world?

The answer is troubling. The post- 9/11 prevailing wisdom has held that military force and exporting democracy are the West's twin weapons against terrorism. Islamic fundamentalism is the product of a "medieval" mindset, we are told, and if we can deliver elections to the Arab world, our enemies will cower before the spirit of the Enlightenment.

Yet the establishment of the first popularly elected governments in Iraqi and Afghan history has been followed by more suicide bombings and unabated violence. And nobody expects real change, in terms of political freedoms or human rights, any time soon in Saudi Arabia or Egypt. What are we missing?

While there is no doubt that elections are a worthy goal, we will not be able to change the Muslim world or dislodge the militancy until we gain a better understanding of the roots of the problem. While these conflicts are often painted as millennium-old, they are essentially modern phenomena, bred of postcolonial politics, social upheavals and territorial struggles.

And as we look at the causes of anti-Western jihadism, we tend to overlook one major contributing factor: the absence not just of democracy but also of grass-roots representative institutions like a free press and independent political, cultural and social-welfare institutions.

Today's jihadists - I call them "neo-fundamentalists," because they are a world apart from earlier fundamentalists - are not throwbacks to the crusades, nor are they, as President Bush unfortunately put it, just "a group of folks." They are a singular and recent byproduct of decades of oppressive rule.

Yes, the Muslim world had an unfortunate introduction to post-Enlightenment ideals, which came in the context of invasion, colonialism and exploitation. But the Arab philosophical and political movement that came out of that experience was not inherently anti-Western. In fact, in traditional Islamic thought the concept of violent resistance against an unjust ruler was virtually unheard of; for classical jurists, tyranny was preferable to the anarchy that accompanies revolt.

The first wave of modern Islamic fundamentalists, which crested primarily in Egypt in the late 19th century and included such figures as the Iranian-born reformer Jamal al-Din al-Afghani and his Egyptian disciple, Muhammad Abduh, opposed colonialism but saw no incompatibility between Islamic and Western philosophy, law or scientific method. These men called for political reform and the revival of free inquiry.

The big change did not occur until the middle of the 20th century. In states like Egypt, Iraq and Syria, colonial governments were replaced by military, Arab-nationalist, royalist or Soviet-sponsored socialist regimes. All deteriorated quickly into dictatorships, emracing the institutions of colonial subjugation.

A host of political parties and civic institutions were founded to challenge the autocrats; many combined Enlightenment concepts like public participation with Islamic ideals of popular consent and justice. Even Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood (founded in 1928) was not a militant revolutionary group; instead it promoted social-welfare programs, democracy and land reform on the Western model. When the mass movements became influential, however, they were answered not by reform but by persecution, ranging from the violent crackdown against the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt in the 1950's to the massacre of more than 10,000 dissidents by the dictator Hafez al-Assad in Hama, Syria, in 1982.

The story of Sayyid Qutb, the father of neo-fundamentalism, exemplifies what happened next. Qutb was an Egyptian teacher trained in the Western system. Contrary to the conventional wisdom, it was not his trip to America in 1948 that radicalized him. While he was shocked by some aspects of American culture, like women dancing in public, he returned to write about the importance of emulating the educational, economic and scientific achievements of the West.

BUT in the 1950's, he was jailed and tortured for speaking out against Gamal Abdel Nasser's autocracy, while scores of dissidents were executed. Only then did he decide that violence could be used against an unjust government. He spoke as a Muslim, but his rhetoric was grounded in Western-nationalist and leftist revolutionary principles. His call had great resonance, and thus was neo-fundamentalism born.

As persecution continued across the Arab world, the neo-fundamentalist rhetoric became more Manichean and xenophobic. With mainstream opponents silenced, ultraradicals became the loudest voices of dissent. In Egypt, for example, those who emerged from prison in the 1970's formed militant organizations, including Al Jihad, led by Ayman al-Zawahiri, who is now chief lieutenant for Osama bin Laden. These men were not thinkers or theologians; rather, many were disillusioned Westernized professionals, former leftists and nationalists.

This new wave of fundamentalism, unlike all the others before it in the Islamic tradition, is inherently anti-intellectual and reactive; it is more reminiscent of the anarchical movements of 19th-century Russia. This "Islamism" is nihilistic, expressing a lack of faith in all political systems, in history, and in all past social developments. The jihadists justify their actions by claiming that they are returning to "pure" Islamic sources to establish a "government of God." Of course, the paradox here is that the Koran does not lay down a mode of governance. What perhaps we in the United States do not understand is that in rejecting the status quo, these groups demonize not just the West, but mainstream Islamic culture and philosophy as well; they pose perhaps the greatest existential threat to 1,400 years of Islamic tradition.

So how does this history help us reverse the trend? It requires that we look at the jihadists not as an ancient foe, but as yet another contemporary terrorist group. Recent history - in northern India, Sri Lanka, Kurdish Turkey - has taught us that grassroots democracy and allowing the aggrieved group a public voice can be effective weapons against terrorism. A good strategy would be to support groups across the Muslim world, both secular and religious, that provide social services where the government falls short; they range from women's rights organizations like the Union for Feminine Action in Morocco to trade groups like the Lebanese Businessmen Association.

We must foster these organizations - along with a free press and educational and cultural institutions. At the same time, our corporations should guide local entrepreneurs to promote a free market, the backbone of democracy. If anything is going to come of the neoconservative hope of making Iraq into a beacon of our values, it will be along these lines.

It is vital, however, that we not be put off from helping organizations tied to Islam - faith-based parties calling for peaceful democratic reforms are emerging across the Muslim world as the main political opposition. They are the necessary counterweights to central governments, and without them, autocratic rule, and the neo-fundamentalism that it breeds, will remain the norm.

Linda,
when the FIRST meeting of this committee back in July, I believe we asked if the DAG could attend. it looks like he was on travel that day. can you check your email archives for me to see if we know who did attend this meeting? I'm thinking it was probably either a Principal Deputy AG or maybe someone from the Associate's office.

CHARTER FOR THE COMMITTEE ON THE MARINE TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM

I. Parties

The parties to this Charter are: the U.S. Department of Transportation, the U.S. Department of Commerce, the U.S. Department of Defense, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Department of the Treasury, the U.S. Department of State, the U.S. Department of the Interior, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the U.S. Department of Justice, the U.S. Department of Labor, the Environmental Protection Agency, the Office of Management and Budget, and the Federal Maritime Commission.

II. Authority

The authority to establish this Committee derives from a directive by the President in the U.S. Ocean Action Plan, issued, December 17, 2004, "Supporting Marine Transportation."

III. Purpose

A. To create a partnership of Federal agencies with responsibility for the Marine Transportation System (MTS) - waterways, ports and their intermodal connections – to ensure the development and implementation of national MTS policies consistent with national needs and report to the President its views and recommendations for improving the MTS.

B. The partnership established by this Charter, to be known as the Committee on the Marine Transportation System (CMTS), and its constituent sub-organizations described in paragraphs VI-VIII below, will be responsible for the following:

- improving Federal MTS coordination and policies;
- promoting the environmentally sound integration of marine transportation with other modes of transportation and with other ocean, coastal, and Great Lakes uses;
- developing outcome-based goals and strategic objectives for the safety, security, efficiency, economic vitality, environmental health, and reliability of the MTS for commercial and national defense requirements, as well as a method for monitoring progress towards those goals;
- coordinating budget and regulatory activities that impact the MTS; and
- recommending strategies and implement plans to maintain and improve the MTS.

IV. Organization

The CMTS is a Federal cabinet-level inter-agency organization that reports to the President and is supported by three sub-organizations: the Coordinating Board (CB), the Executive Secretariat (ES), and Integrated Action Teams (IATs).

A. The Committee on the Marine Transportation System

1. The Committee is comprised of the heads of Federal agencies, or their senior level designees. Through the Committee each member agency has a unique capacity to work collaboratively on MTS matters. The Committee will meet as appropriate, but not less than twice a year, to address nationally significant MTS issues. The Committee or any of its members can identify proposed agenda items.

2. Membership

The Committee will be chaired by the Secretary, Department of Transportation (DOT). The following Heads of Agencies, or their senior level designees, also serve as Committee members.

- Secretary of Commerce;
- Secretary of Defense;
- Secretary of Homeland Security;
- Secretary of the Treasury;
- Secretary of State;
- Secretary of the Interior;
- Secretary of Agriculture;
- Attorney General;
- Secretary of Labor;
- Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff;
- Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;
- Chairman of the Federal Maritime Commission; and
- the head of any other Federal agency that the Committee Chair, with the approval of a majority of the voting members of the Committee, determines can further the purpose and activities of the Committee

3. Ex-officio members of the Committee, who can participate as non-voting members include the:

- Director, Office of Management and Budget;
- Chairman, Council on Environmental Quality;
- Assistant to the President for Homeland Security;
- Assistant to the President for Domestic Policy; and
- Assistant to the President for Economic Policy

DOJ_NMG_0006379

4. Consultation

In carrying out its functions and activities under this Charter, the Committee will consult with the Marine Transportation System National Advisory Council (MTSNAC), Congressional representatives and staff members, the public, and other interested parties.

B. Coordinating Board (CB)

1. The CB will be comprised of senior-level representatives designated by each Committee member. The CB will assist Committee members in exercising their duties and responsibilities in accordance with this Charter. The chair of the CB will be rotated among the Commandant of the U. S. Coast Guard, the Chief of the U. S. Army Corps of Engineers, the Maritime Administrator and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Administrator. The CB will meet periodically to assist the Committee in formulating its recommendations and will report directly to the Committee.

2. The Coordinating Board is responsible for:

- creating and implementing the joint strategic plan for improving the MTS;
- coordinating and integrating the work of each IAT;
- recommending interagency procedures and mechanisms to achieve coordination of the partnering agencies' MTS activities and programs, including budget and appropriations requests, research and development studies and projects, and acquisitions for products and services;
- selecting lead agency for each IAT; and
- overseeing data acquisition and management for the MTS to support performance metrics.

C. Executive Secretariat (ES)

1. The ES is the staff body of the CMTS, made up of Federal employees from CMTS member agencies. The ES Director will be an employee of the Department of Transportation who reports directly to the Under Secretary of Transportation for Policy. The ES serves as a technical advisory body to the CB and the IATs. The Director shall keep the CB informed of all developments, including matters to be brought before the Committee, necessary for the CB to fulfill its responsibilities. The ES Director is the Executive Secretary to the CB.

2. The Executive Secretariat is responsible for:

- ensuring liaison, coordination, collaboration, and clear communications among member agencies, other stakeholders, and the CB;
- presenting consolidated agency interests to the CB on operational and policy issues;
- providing staff support to the CMTS; and

DOJ_NMG_0006380

- preparing a work plan and operating budget for implementing its responsibilities.

D. Integrated Action Teams (IAT)

1. IATs are responsible for the execution of the strategies developed within the joint strategic plan. An IAT will be created as needed, and could be either temporary or permanent in nature depending upon the issue or challenge that the team has been formed to resolve. The members of each IAT shall include representatives from the lead agency, member agencies and other organizations required to satisfy the mission of the IAT.

2. Each IAT lead agency shall:

- prepare an IAT action plan governing its work that aligns with the joint strategic plan. Each action plan shall include, but is not limited to, the following tasks:
  - Survey each Agency's MTS-related policies and programs including inter-agency and international agreements, and identify opportunities and methodologies for collaboration;
  - Facilitate inter-agency sharing and distribution of information;
  - Propose recommendations for interagency MTS research and development coordination.
- implement and manage the action plan, including oversight of the agencies involved in the effort; and
- provide status reports to the CB and the ES Director on the performance of its action plan, including technical, financial and schedule aspects.

V. Agency Responsibilities

Each Agency shall fund the costs of its own participation in the CMTS. Specific resources and funding commitments between member agencies shall be addressed in separate interagency funding agreements executed under the Economy Act (31 U.S.C. §1535) or other appropriate authority. Nothing herein shall derogate from the authority vested in any agency or other government entity by statute, executive order, presidential directive, or any other instrument.

VI. Other Provisions

A. Nothing in this charter shall be construed to require the obligation of any budgetary resources on the part of member agencies.

B. The terms of this charter will become effective on August 11, 2005.

C. This charter may be modified upon the mutual written consent of all Parties to this Charter, as specified in Paragraph 1.

D. The terms of this charter will remain in effect until terminated by the President of the United States.

Schedulers,

Can you please check your principal's calendar and let me know his or her availability for the next meeting of the CMTS? The revised Charter is attached for your information. An agenda and briefing book will be provided closer to the event. The meeting location will be the Cabinet Liaison Conference Room (Room 160) at the EEOB. I'd appreciate your input by COB on Monday September 5th. I'll let everyone know the following day, which date works best. In the meantime, I'd very much appreciate it if you could put a hold on both days:

Monday November 14th 2:00-4:00 PM
Thursday November 17th 10:00-12:00 PM

This was initially set up to be attended by the AG however, it was sent to Robert so he could attend. Robert was unable to attend and Neil attended in his stead. Immediately following the first mtg documentation was sent over regarding the Committee, it was addresssed to the Attorney General asking him to sign an accept the Committee's charter and also designate someone from DOJ to serve on the working group. That designee was Kelly Johnson, Acting AAG ENRD. Mr. McCallum prepared and forwarded back to OAG the response requested. Kyle Sampson in OAG would have all the particulars on this matter.

Thanks

DOJ Information:
NEW ADDITIONS TO THE DOJ/SEPS EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS WEBSITE

DOJ_NMG_0006390

The purpose of the DOJ SEPS Emergency Website is to provide DOJ employees and their families with the most current and accurate information that will help in preparing for any type of emergency. Located on the DOJ Intranet (<http://10.173.2.12/jmd/seps/emergency/index.html>), the links on the left column provide detailed information regarding overall readiness at home and in the workplace, including: DOJ Occupant Emergency Plans, shelter-in-place information, and Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) guidance. Listed on the right-hand side of the page are contact numbers for regional Federal Protective Service (FPS) offices around the country, as well as a real-time link to the Federal Government Operational Status website.

The recently updated aspects of the site include:

- I.C.E. (In Case of Emergency)
- Terrorism Knowledge Database
- "Soft Target" information
- Occupant Emergency Plan updates

The ultimate goal of this website is to supply an all-encompassing source of emergency preparedness information for DOJ employees, and to maintain an up-to-date news bulletin of the latest developments involving the Department and its efforts to thwart future terrorist events. If you have any comments or questions regarding the site's content or format, please feel free to reply to the "Feedback" address located at the bottom of the page, as we would appreciate any input you may have.

Theatre Offering:

AT FORD'S THEATRE, $25 TICKETS FOR NEW PLAY, LEADING LADIES

Leading Ladies runs September 23, 2005 - October 23, 2005.

Ford's Theatre begins their 2005-2006 season with a regional premiere by Washington's own Ken Ludwig, who took Broadway by storm 15 years ago with his hilarious farce Lend Me a Tenor - a play which continues to delight audiences. He's back in top form with the even more outrageous Leading Ladies. As a special season opener, all Tickets are $25 for the first three shows only!

- Friday, September 23, 2005, with a 7:30 p.m. curtain
- Saturday, September 24, 2005, with a 7:30 p.m. curtain
- Sunday, September 25, 2005, with a 7:30 p.m. curtain

For tickets call Ford's Theatre Box Office: 202-347-4833. www.fordstheatre.org <http://www.fordstheatre.org>

Synopsis: Leo and Jack are two down-on-their-luck Shakespearean actors touring the Moose Lodge circuit. Penniless and desperate, they hatch a wild plot that leads them to play the roles of their lives! Written by Ken Ludwig (who wrote Lend Me A Tenor) and directed by Mark Rucker. Filled with mistaken identities and side-splitting romantic comedy, this is a not-to-be missed show! The cast of this hilarious show includes: John Astin, Charlotte Rae, JD Cullum, Daniel Frith, Ian Kahn, Patrick Kerr, Lacey Kohl, and Karen Ziemba.

Future Events:

THE FIRST DUKE ELLINGTON JAZZ FESTIVAL, SEPTEMBER 28-OCTOBER 2

The first Duke Ellington Jazz Festival, a celebration of the Washington-born composer and an attempt to put Washington on the lucrative festival circuit, will premiere at multiple sites around the city from Sept. 28 to Oct. 2. The festival will spotlight the renaissance of Washington, D.C.'s U Street and the Shaw neighborhood and join other jazz festivals held in Chicago, IL, Portland, Oregon, Newport, RI, and Monterey, CA. Washington's events will be held at Blues Alley, Bohemian Caverns, Lincoln Theatre, the Kennedy Center Millennium Stage, True Reformer Hall, the Smithsonian Jazz Café at the National Museum of Natural History, and Sylvan Theatre at the Washington Monument.

Performers will include: pianist Arturo O'Farrill (who will lead a Latin jazz tribute to Ellington with two pieces commissioned by the festival); vocalist Stacey Kent; guitarist Larry Coryell; drummer Chuck Redd; and pianist Jean Michele Pilc. A number of international artists will appear, including the Fahir Atakoglu Trio of Tureky, PaulZauner Quartet of Austria, Aquiles Baez Quintet of Venezuela, Moutin Reunion Quartet of France and Antoine Roney's African drummers.

Tidbits:

NEW EXHIBIT in the LIBRARY OF CONGRESS' GREAT HALL

"Bound for Glory: America in Color, 1939-1943"

"It's a startling moment, of which there are many in "Bound for Glory: America in Color, 1939-1943," an exhibition of rare Depression-era color photographs at the Library of Congress. The 70-image exhibit, culled from the work of some of the best photographers of the era, opened Thursday and runs through November 26 in the Great Hall of the Thomas Jefferson Building." When these images were taken, color film had been introduced only a few years earlier and was only just beginning to give people the idea that their world could be duplicated: not just the shapes and shadows, but the colors that filled their everyday lives. Today, the photographs are some of the earliest images of the dyes used in women's dresses in rural Mississippi, the faded red of a barn in Connecticut, or the twist of blue in a homesteader's dungarees in Pie Town, N.M. in 1940…

Quote of the Week:

"Our beloved America is the greatest country in the world. We must not take her for granted. There is a reason that millions of people - many of them of Hispanic origin - risk their lives to fulfill the dream of coming here. The story of America is a story of constant renewal and reaffirmation of our founding ideals and our enduring values - of faith, family, and freedom. These are values that demand the best of every American."

Today's Events In Washington 43

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 47

TERRORISM NEWS:

Virginia Man Told Saudis He Planned Bush Assassination Plot. The Washington Post (9/20, A14, Markon) reports, "A Falls Church man charged with conspiring with al Qaeda to kill President Bush told Saudi interrogators that he dreamed up the plot on his own but that it never got past the 'idea stage,' prosecutors say in court documents unsealed yesterday. 'I wanted to be the brain, the planner of the assassination, Ahmed Omar Abu Ali is quoted as saying. He likened himself to Mohamed Atta…according to the court papers, which quote from an FBI report detailing Abu Ali's interrogation by Saudi security officials while he was detained in the kingdom in June 2003." The Post notes, "The court filings were unsealed the same day as a federal judge in the District dismissed a civil lawsuit that Abu Ali's parents filed against the U.S. government last year" to press for his release from Saudi custody.

The New York Times (9/20, Lichtblau) reports DOJ said Abu Ali "represents one of the most dangerous terrorist threats that America faces in the perilous world after September 11, 2001: an Al Qaeda operative born and raised in the United States, trained and committed to carry out deadly attacks on American soil." The Times notes, "The case is a crucial test of the ability of American prosecutors to bring a case that relies heavily on intelligence gathered by foreign officials under disputed conditions."

Maryland Man Charged With Aiding Terror Group. The Washington Post (9/20, B4, Markon, Schulte) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Alexandria unveiled terrorism charges against a Maryland man yesterday, alleging that Ali Asad Chandia helped a foreign terrorist group acquire an electronic autopilot system and video equipment for use on model airplanes." Chandia "is also accused of shipping 50,000 paint balls to the group, Lashkar-i-Taiba." The Post notes, "The charges against Chandia…are an outgrowth of the 'Virginia jihad network' case, in which nine Muslim men have been convicted over the past two years of training overseas for holy war against the United States." The AP (9/20) adds, "Mohammed Ajmal Khan of Coventry, England, who prosecutors said is a senior official in Lashkar-e-Taiba, an Islamic rebel group fighting for independence in the India-controlled portion of Kashmir, is also charged. Mr. Khan is in custody in England."

The New York Times (9/20, Lichtblau) notes Chandia's lawyer, Marvin Miller, "declined to discuss the specific accusations…because he had not yet reviewed the indictment in detail, but he said the charges were groundless and amounted to 'a great case of guilt by association.' Mr. Miller said that Mr. Chandia was held as a material witness for several weeks in 2003 in connection with the Virginia jihad case but that talks to secure his cooperation lapsed when the government refused to offer him immunity."

Al Arian Defense Attorneys Fighting US Plan To Introduce New Evidence. The Tampa Tribune (9/20, Fechter) reports that at the terror-supporting trial of Sami al Arian "defense attorneys are fighting government plans to recall two computer experts to introduce evidence from an Islamic Jihad Web site called Qudsway .com. Assistant U.S. Attorney Terry Zitek said the FBI experts discovered new information after testifying in June. The evidence shows Salah Abu Hassanein, the recipient of many money transfers from" al Arian codefendant defendant Hatim Fariz, "used the Web page to communicate with Fariz and others. Agents also have determined that the Web site is based in Tehran, Iran, a country that provides the Islamic Jihad with the bulk of its funding." Fariz lawyer Allison Guagliardo "argued that the evidence is coming too late for the defense to prepare adequately. Their computer expert estimates needing four to six weeks to analyze the new material."

More Details Revealed In Possible Tennessee Terrorism Plot. WCPO-TV Cincinnati (9/19, Barry) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, "There is new information on an Egyptian college student being held under suspicions of terrorism in Tennessee. As 9News first reported on Sunday, it was a tip from a Batavia business that led the feds to" Mahmoud Maawad, "who is illegally in the country. … 9News uncovered items that seem to point to a far more extensive interest in aviation than first thought. … Besides a flight jacket and flight equipment that Maawad purchased, 9News found other items on the receipts, including aviation maps of his home airport in Memphis, Tennessee and cassettes on listening to control tower communications."

WLWT-TV Cincinnati (9/19, Hamrick) reports on its Web site from a story broadcast Monday, Hamilton County, Ohio, homeland security director Michael Snowden "said it's time to beef up safety measures at stores that sell pilot equipment." Snowden "said Maawad's case reveals carelessness in a system meant to protect American flyers after 9/11." Snowden noted, "Unfortunately, it's not that difficult to obtain identification, insignia badges -- those are all easily obtained."

Judge Orders Jordanian Terror Suspect Deported On Immigration Charge. WDTN-TV Dayton (9/19) reports on its Web site, an immigration judge in Monroe, Mich., on Monday ordered Jordanian Mohammed Obeid "to leave the country after being investigated for possible connections to terrorism." Obeid "was engaged to a Piqua (Ohio) woman when the FBI raided their home last summer, taking Obeid into custody. An immigration judge had ordered him jailed on accusations of marriage fraud. He'd been married to, then divorced from two different American women before meeting the Piqua woman. Authorities claimed he was marrying women just to stay in the country. The FBI claimed he was visiting terrorist related web sites at the couple's Piqua apartment."

In New Al Zawahiri Video, Al Qaeda Takes Credit For London Attack. CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Verjee) reported, "Osama bin Laden's top lieutenant, Ayman al Zawahiri, has appeared in a previously unseen videotape. It aired moments ago on the Arab news channel al-Jazeera. And al-Jazeera basically is reporting that al-Zawahiri plays down U.S. achievements in Afghanistan and he also claims responsibility for the London bombings." In the video, "al-Zawahiri appears to be being interviewed on this video and downplaying U.S. achievements in Afghanistan and claiming responsibility for the London bombing."

The AP (9/20, Michael) reports Al-Zawahri also "challenged the legitimacy of Afghanistan's parliamentary elections Sunday, saying they were held 'under the terror of the lords of war,' an apparent reference to the country's government. The election reference suggested the tape was made recently."

PATRIOT ACT:

DOJ Appealing Terror Probe Gag Order Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A13, Squeo) reports, "Even as Congress moves to renew much of the 2001 Patriot Act, a federal judge in Connecticut has set up a clash over one of the antiterror law's most contentious provisions. The Justice Department moved to block and is appealing a recent decision by U.S. District Judge Janet Hall that strikes down the gag orders imposed on recipients of so-called National Security Letters as part of a terrorism probe." The Journal notes, "In its appeals-court filing, the Justice Department cited the harm in 'alerting the target of the investigation that his activities are subject to scrutiny, and allowing the target to hide, move his activities to another provider, provide misinformation to the government or otherwise frustrate the FBI's investigation.'"

WAR NEWS:

Afghan Election Officials Estimate Turnout Was About 50%. USA Today (9/20, Wiseman) reports, "Turned off by the candidates, intimidated by the threat of violence and assuming a been-there, done-that attitude toward what had been the novelty of voting, hundreds of thousands of Afghans...sat out Sunday's elections. Vote counting begins today. Final results are expected in early October because some ballots are being delivered from remote regions. When the count is completed, the turnout is expected to come in well below that of last year's presidential election, in which 70% of eligible voters cast ballots. Chief electoral officer Peter Erben said Monday that early results suggest 6 million Afghans voted, about 50% of registered voters and well below expectations.

Provincial Afghans Frustrated By Lack Of International Aid. The New York Times (9/20, Gall, Sengupta) reports, "With widespread frustration over the pace by which the central government in Kabul is distributing reconstruction aid to the provinces, diplomats and election observers said, the test of credibility for the new Parliament will be its ability to deliver on the peace dividend, from roads and bridges to law and order. Speaking to reporters on Monday, the United States ambassador, Ronald E. Neumann, acknowledged that citizens' expectations for internationally financed reconstruction projects were running high, for everything from public works to a functional justice system. … The chief of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, Jean Arnault, said that to maintain their credibility, the executive and legislative branches would have to answer to a public increasingly frustrated about the lack of visible improvements."

The Washington Times (9/20, Gentile) reports, "Early returns show a lower-than-expected voter turnout for the embattled nation's widely anticipated parliamentary elections, electoral officials said yesterday. … Terrorist attacks early Sunday might have hurt turnout, even though the day passed relatively peacefully. Several polling stations visited by The Washington Times in Kabul late Sunday were devoid of the long lines seen earlier in the day. U.N. and Afghan electoral officials, working together in the elections, reported that polling stations in other provinces were packed all day and even stayed open past the 4 p.m. cutoff time to get those in line to vote."

Pakistani Crackdown On Islamists Seen As Mostly Ineffectual. USA Today (9/20, Wiseman) reports on a raid of an all-girls madrassa in Islamabad "meant to be a dramatic example of Pakistan's commitment to cracking down on Islamic extremism and religious schools that promote it. But the July 19 raid turned into a debacle. Caught without their veils, the teenage girls screamed — and then rallied. Grabbing mops, brooms, stones and knives, they drove the commandos out. … No one was arrested, and police even missed a chance to nab one of the mosque's top clerics." According to USA Today, "So goes Pakistan's campaign against homegrown religious extremism: considerable drama, few results. President Pervez Musharraf has taken huge risks…to hunt down al-Qaeda fugitives. … But his government has been reluctant to go after its former allies: the Taliban in Afghanistan and groups that have fought a proxy war against Indian troops in disputed Kashmir. It also has been slow to crack down on madrassas that teach intolerance and glorify jihad, or holy war. As a result, Pakistan is still turning out young militants burning to kill and die for their extreme interpretations of Islam."

British Troops Attack Basra Police In Bid To Free Inmates. The New York Times (9/20, Tavernise) reports, "Two British soldiers working under cover were arrested Monday in the southern city of Basra and then freed as a British armored vehicle blasted through the wall of their jail after an angry crowd began rioting outside, an Interior Ministry official said. The official said that the soldiers were undercover officers dressed as Iraqis and that Iraqi police officers had arrested them after the men fired at a traffic police officer." A British military spokesman "confirmed that 'two U.K. military personnel' had been detained early on Monday 'in a shooting incident' and that troops had used an armored fighting vehicle 'to gain entry' to the police station to release them." He "said…the police inside the station had refused to obey orders from the Interior Ministry to release the men. The incident came a day after British forces in Basra arrested three members of the Mahdi Army."

The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Knickmeyer, Finer) reports, "An Iraqi official said a half-dozen armored vehicles had smashed into the jail, the Reuters news agency reported. The provincial governor, Mohammed Walli, told news agencies that the British assault was 'barbaric, savage and irresponsible.' … In London, authorities said the two commandos were released after negotiations. But the BBC quoted British defense officials as saying a wall was demolished when British forces went to 'collect' the men." The Post adds, "Iraqi police cars circulated downtown, calling through loudspeakers for the public to help stop British forces from releasing the two. … Witnesses said they saw Basra police exchanging fire with British forces."

British Action Incites Rioters In Basra. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Daragahi) reports, "Violent street clashes erupted Monday between Shiite militia and British soldiers in the southern city of Basra, after British tanks stormed a local jail where two of their troops were being held. The daylong violence in Iraq's second-largest city raised troubling questions about the relationship between British forces in charge of security and their Iraqi counterparts, in what once was considered a relatively safe area of the country. … Two Iraqis were reportedly killed in the clashes, and several British soldiers were wounded. Television images of the street fighting showed Iraqis firebombing a tank, and a British soldier emerging with his uniform in flames."

NYTimes Employee Killed In Basra. The New York Times (9/20, Worth) reports Fakher Haider, "an Iraqi journalist and photographer working for The New York Times in Basra was found dead early Monday after being abducted from his home by a group of armed men wearing masks and claiming to be police officers, relatives and witnesses said."

Haider "had worked for The Times since April 2003 and had recently reported on the growing friction and violence among Basra's rival Shiite militias, which are widely believed to have infiltrated the police. He did part-time for work for other news organizations, including Merbad TV, a local Basra station, and for publications including The Guardian of London and National Geographic. But his principal affiliation was with The Times." The Times notes, "Haider is the second journalist to be killed in Basra in the past two months. In August, Steven Vincent, an American freelance reporter who was writing a book about the city, was abducted along with his Iraqi interpreter, and he was later found dead."

Lynndie England To Fight Abu Ghraib Abuse Charges. The AP (9/20, Badger) reports, "Army Pfc. Lynndie England will abandon her earlier courtroom strategy and fight charges that she was a key participant in detainee abuse by guards at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, her lawyer said." England "was to go on trial Tuesday at Fort Hood, Texas, on seven counts of mistreating prisoners. She will be the last of a group of junior enlisted soldiers charged with Abu Ghraib abuses to have their cases resolved. Two have been convicted at trial, while six others made plea deals and received prison sentences of up to eight years."

Bush Urged To Take Responsibility For Iraq War Mistakes. In an op-ed for the New York Times (9/20) Nathaniel Fick, former Marine captain who led infantry platoons in Afghanistan and Iraq, writes, "President Bush's speech last week accepting responsibility for the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina was commendable, if overdue. … Consider the positive effects that would follow a similar presidential assumption of responsibility for American missteps in Iraq. By declaring that the buck stops at his desk, President Bush could begin a top-down rethinking of our military and political strategies since the 2003 invasion. He would also establish a standard of personal accountability for everyone in the chain of command, much as his statement last week prompted Gov. Kathleen Blanco of Louisiana to follow suit. And it just might galvanize enough bipartisan support to break the ideological gridlock that has limited changes in Iraq policy to marginal tweaks rather than a full reassessment."

National Guard Said To Lack Adequate Communications Systems. USA Today (9/20, Moniz) reports, "Hurricane Katrina exposed serious weaknesses in the National Guard's communications systems, particularly a shortage of high-tech radios and satellite communications gear, the Guard's top general said Monday. If it's going to protect the USA while also fighting overseas, the Guard needs better equipment, Lt. Gen. Steven Blum, head of the National Guard Bureau, said in an interview with USA TODAY. … Much of the Guard's best communications equipment was being used by troops fighting in Iraq and wasn't available for units helping Gulf Coast states recover from the hurricane, Blum said."

Army Halts Plan To Borrow Funds Dedicated For Improving Armor In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A4, Rogers) reports, "The Pentagon reversed a plan to ease the Army's year-end cash crunch by borrowing from funds dedicated to buying better armored vehicles for troops in Iraq. The $300 million-plus transfer had met strong behind-the-scenes opposition in Congress over the past week. The skirmish underscores the budget pressure on the military, given the tempo of operations in the war, rising fuel costs and competing priorities like the Hurricane Katrina recovery. … 'They're desperate. They're under tremendous pressure,' said Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) a Marine veteran and senior member of the House Appropriations Committee, who had a heated telephone conversation last week with Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, about the request."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Top Tyco Executives Sentenced. ABC World News Tonight (9/19, story 9, :25, Gibson) reported, "Two former top executives of Tyco International were sentenced today for their roles in one of the nation's major corporate scandals. Former CEO Dennis Koslowski and former finance chief Mark Swartz faced identical prison terms of 8 1/3 to 25 years, and a state judge ordered them to pay $422 million in fines and restitution."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 13, 0:30, Schieffer) reported, "Kozlowski, former CEO of Tyco, was convicted of stealing $150 million from the company to, among other things, throw lavish parties and furnish an apartment, including that infamous $6,000 shower curtain."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 9, 0:30, Williams) reported, "It was the extravagant spending, stealing, and lying to shareholders at Tyco that got former CEO Dennis Kozlowski in trouble."

The AP (9/20, Maull) reports, "L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former CEO of Tyco International, was sentenced Monday to eight and one-third years to 25 years in prison Monday for stealing hundreds of millions of dollars from the company." The AP continues, "His codefendant, former Tyco finance chief Mark Swartz, received the same sentence, which means they will be eligible for parole after eight years and four months. … The judge also ordered them to pay a total of $134 million in restitution. In addition, Kozlowski was fined $70 million and Swartz $35 million." The AP adds, "The sentences end a case that exposed the executives' extravagant lifestyle after pilfering some $600 million from the company including a $2 million toga birthday party for Kozlowski's wife on a Mediterranean island and an $18 million Manhattan apartment with a $6,000 shower curtain. … Kozlowski, 58, and Swartz, 44, were convicted in June after a four-month trial on 22 counts of grand larceny, falsifying business records, securities fraud and conspiracy. It was their second trial - the first ended in mistrial after a juror said she received threats following reports that she made an 'OK' signal to the defense team."

The New York Law Journal (9/20, Lin) reports, "In the course of their three-year-long prosecution, the two men, particularly Kozlowski, have become symbols of corporate greed and excess. But the judge put the case in straightforward terms in imposing sentence. … Despite many unusual characteristics and complications, he said, 'the heart of the case is basic larceny.'" The Journal adds, "First indicted in September 2002, the two executives were convicted in June on several counts of grand larceny, securities fraud, conspiracy and falsifying business records. The judge issued separate sentences on the other counts but said those would be served concurrently with the grand larceny sentence. … Justice Obus also ordered Kozlowski to pay $97 million in restitution to Tyco and $70 million in fines. Swartz was ordered to pay $37 million in restitution and $35 million in fines. … The restitution amounts were tied to the amounts of bonuses the two men were found to have stolen. The defense had maintained throughout the trial that the bonuses were legitimate and fully approved by Tyco's board of directors." The Journal notes, "Though tough, Obus' sentence was less than that requested by the prosecution. Assistant District Attorney Owen Heimer had asked the court to impose the maximum sentence of 15 to 30 years 'to send the signal that, here in the financial capital of the world, we will not tolerate theft ... no matter who you are.'"

The Financial Times (9/20, Bowe) reports, "After sentencing, Mr Kozlowski, 58, and Mr Swartz, 45, were led from the courtroom in handcuffs. They immediately began their sentence of eight years and four months to 25 years in state prison, depending on the decisions of parole officials." The Times adds, "Before the sentencing, Mr Kozlowski asked the judge to be 'as lenient as possible', while Mr Swartz asked to be quickly returned to his family. … But Manhattan prosecutor Owen Heimer said the men had committed theft and fraud on an 'unprecedented and staggering scale', the largest ever in the state."

The New York Times (9/20, Sorkin) reports, "The sentencing follows a parade of other substantial terms imposed on former chief executives convicted of white-collar crimes, most notably Bernard J. Ebbers of WorldCom, who received a prison term of 25 years, and John J. Rigas of the cable operator Adelphia Communications, who was sentenced to 15 years. Those sentences - in federal courts - were seen as sending a message to deter huge corporate frauds in the future. … The Tyco sentencing may be the last high-profile corporate misconduct before the most prominent one of them all: the trial next year of Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling of Enron."

USA Today (9/20, Mccoy) reports, "The former executives were taken to the jail adjoining the courthouse for initial processing, said Thomas Antenen, a spokesman for the New York City Department of Correction. … The prison terms Obus imposed fell short of the 15-year-to-30 year maximum sought by prosecutors, but far higher than the one-year-to-three-year minimum sought by the defense. John Coffee, a securities law expert at Columbia University Law School, said the two would have fared worse in federal court. … 'They will serve far less time,' Coffee said, 'but it will probably be more painful time. There is no Club Fed in the New York State Correctional system.'"

The Washington Post (9/20, D1, White) reports, "Prosecutors and many shareholder groups say long sentences are necessary to deter future abuses and restore investor confidence. But some defense lawyers question the extent to which a few high-profile cases will deter bad behavior at smaller public companies that present less tempting targets for prosecutors. 'Officers and directors of major corporations, multinational corporations, clearly get the message,' said defense attorney Jacob S. Frenkel. 'The question is whether the message has been conveyed thoroughly to officers and directors at small and mid-size companies.'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Maremont) reports, "Both defendants have said they will appeal. Mr. Kozlowski's lead attorney, Stephen Kaufman, said immediately after the sentencing hearing that he will be applying for bail for his client pending appeal. Charles Stillman, the lead attorney for Mr. Swartz, said he will be 'pursuing appropriate remedies for Mark's situation.' In New York, defendants can choose to bring bail applications before any judge, and often try to choose judges known for their leniency."

USA Today (9/20, McCoy) reports, "Before their convictions, former Tyco executives Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz were known for reaping multimillion-dollar corporate salaries. .. Within weeks, they'll have to get used to earning $1.05 a day in a maximum-security state prison. … 'They will be assigned a job, and that's what they'll earn,' said Linda Foglia, a spokeswoman for the New York State Department of Correctional Services. … 'Every prisoner must work, in the laundry, in the kitchen or somewhere else.'" USA continues, "Lawyers for Kozlowski and Swartz hope to avoid that outcome for at least a while by seeking bail pending appeals of their clients' convictions. … They have a low chance of succeeding, because New York appeals courts generally 'are less willing to let individuals stay out,' said Ronald Blum, a former Manhattan prosecutor who is now a partner at the law firm Manatt Phelps & Phillips. … Unless defense lawyers prevail, the former executives would be transferred within 10 days from city custody — where they were to spend Monday night — to the state correction system. Foglia said Kozlowski and Swartz would likely first be sent to the Downstate Correctional Facility, roughly 60 miles north of New York City, for four to six weeks of processing and classification."

Editorials Praise Kozlowski, Swartz Sentences. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/20) calls the sentences imposed on "Tyco felons Dennis Kozlowski and Mark Swartz," the conclusion of "one of the sorrier chapters in U.S. business history. And while it took a while -- the first Tyco trial ended in mistrial -- the outcome strikes us as just. Not because of their greed -- there's no law against lavish living yet -- but because of their crimes."

The New York Times (9/20) says the sentences are "no cause for celebration. Their lives ruined, they face hard jail time. But that does not change one fact: they deserve it and they should serve it. … The persistent myth that a robber in a suit and tie instead of jeans and a T-shirt deserves a prison with better amenities should be put to rest for good."

AIG Shaped Corporate Haven In "Risk Capital" Bermuda. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Simpson, Francis) reports, "When insurance tycoon Cornelius Vander Starr came ashore (in Hamilton, Bermuda) just after World War II to set up the overseas operation of the company now known as American International Group Inc., this British colony 900 miles off South Carolina was a remote trading post primarily inhabited by descendants of colonists, slaves and shipwreck survivors. … Over the next half-century, AIG executives helped island officials shape a legal landscape that made Bermuda what it boasts is 'the risk capital of world.' Some of these laws and regulations have helped AIG in particular; others have favored insurers generally. Together they transformed the 21-square-mile island into the global center of the offshore-insurance industry, claiming more than $200 billion in assets." The Journal continues, "AIG has profited handsomely in its custom-built corporate haven. Now the question is whether the company, even after helping to create a business nirvana, crossed the line of legality to obscure its activities there." The Journal adds, "In May, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer sued AIG and its former chairman, Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, alleging that for many years, the giant insurer improperly used affiliates in Bermuda to burnish its financial results -- either by hiding losses with the affiliates or claiming their gains as its own. In some instances, the suit alleges, AIG failed to disclose its relationships with Bermuda companies, as required by American law. … AIG is in preliminary settlement talks with Mr. Spitzer's office, people familiar with the situation said. Mr. Greenberg's lawyers have said that he has done nothing wrong and will fight the civil allegations. The most prominent figure in his industry, Mr. Greenberg, 80 years old, was forced out of AIG in March amid regulatory inquiries that go far beyond the company's activities in Bermuda. … Also at the center of the Bermuda storm is a Greenberg subordinate named L. Michael Murphy. A former lawyer for the Internal Revenue Service, Mr. Murphy used to reach his AIG office in Hamilton by rowing a small boat from his elegant home across the turquoise waters of a narrow harbor. Since the 1970s, he had helped write local laws and lobbied for Bermuda in Washington -- all to AIG's advantage. … But in March, the New York-based company fired Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0006405

Murphy for allegedly refusing to cooperate with AIG lawyers gathering information for investigators from New York and the Securities and Exchange Commission. In his suit, filed in a New York state court, Attorney General Spitzer says that Mr. Murphy tried to destroy evidence in Bermuda potentially relevant to a pending investigation of the company's accounting."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former White House Official Arrested In Abramoff Probe. A former White House budget official was arrested yesterday as part of a Federal probe involving GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The story received no coverage from the networks, but is being reported widely on print media, including front page stories in this morning's New York Times (9/20, A1, Shenon, Kornblut) and Washington Post (9/20, A1, Smith, Schmidt). The Times says David H. Safavian, former head of procurement policy at the Office of Management and Budget, resigned "abruptly last week." Yesterday he "was arrested…on charges of lying to investigators and obstructing a federal inquiry involving Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist who has been under scrutiny by the Justice Department for more than a year." The arrest "was the first to result from the wide-ranging corruption investigation of Mr. Abramoff, once among the most powerful and best-paid lobbyists in Washington and a close friend of Representative Tom DeLay, the House majority leader."

The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Smith, Schmidt) notes that at OMB, Safavian "set purchasing policy for the entire government." Like Abramoff, adds the Post, "Safavian is a veteran Washington player. He is a former lobbying partner of anti-tax crusader Grover Norquist and previously worked with Abramoff at another firm. Both he and Abramoff have represented gambling clients and Indian tribes with gambling interests."

The AP (9/20, Sherman) says Safavian allegedly "concealed from federal investigators that Abramoff was seeking to do business with GSA when Safavian joined him on a golf trip to Scotland in 2002, according to an FBI affidavit and the officials." At the time, FBI agent Jeffrey A. Reising said in an affidavit, "a lobbyist -- identified separately as Abramoff -- had enlisted Safavian's help in trying to gain control of 40 acres of land at the Federal Research Center at White Oak in Silver Spring, Md., for a private high school that Abramoff helped establish and supported." Safavian "edited a letter the lobbyist was preparing to send to GSA, and arranged and attended a meeting involving a GSA official, the lobbyist's wife and others to discuss leasing the property, the affidavit said." Abramoff "told his wife to use her maiden name at the meeting because Safavian sought to play down Abramoff's involvement, the affidavit said, citing an e-mail from Abramoff." The Dallas Morning News (9/20, Mittelstadt, Hillman) adds that "while the 13-page affidavit refers only to 'Lobbyist A,' a government official, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that Mr. Abramoff is the lobbyist."

The Hill (9/20) says "Safavian and Abramoff worked together at Preston, Gates and the two traveled with Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and others" on the golf trip to Scotland. The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Roche Jr., Neubauer) reports "Ney has said he had been told that the trip was paid for by the National Center for Public Policy Research. That group, however, has denied financing the junket to the famous St. Andrews golf course." According to the complaint, "'Indian tribal funds' paid for the trip."

Roll Call (9/20, Bresnahan) adds "Brian Walsh, a spokesman for Ney, said the Ohio Republican had no comment on Safavian's indictment other than to say that Ney himself has not been contacted himself by any of the handful of federal agencies or grand juries that are looking into Abramoff's business dealings." House Democrats "immediately pounced on this latest indictment as further evidence that Ney needs to be voted out of office in November 2006."

The Federal Times (9/20, Gosier) reports, "Safavian was arrested Monday, the Justice Department said in a release. Deputy OFPP Administrator Robert Burton is serving as interim administrator, said Alex Conant, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, OFPP's parent agency."

Government Executive (9/20, Palmer) reports, "Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at OMB, convened a meeting Monday morning to inform agency employees of Safavian's arrest, according to a government source who asked to remain anonymous. Johnson told staff members to support Safavian's family, and cautioned them against responding to him should he attempt to contact them, the source said. … During his confirmation hearings for his position as OFPP chief, Safavian said he worked as a lobbyist and consultant for a variety of organizations, including the Embassy of Pakistan, Microsoft and several Native American groups. … Safavian also has strong ties to Capitol Hill. Before joining GSA, he served as chief of staff to Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, and also has worked for former Michigan House members William Schuette and Robert Davis, both Republicans."

FBI Recruiting Agents For Porn Squad Detail. The Washington Post (9/20, A21, Gellman) reports, "The FBI is joining the Bush administration's War on Porn. And it's looking for a few good agents." The Post continues, "Early last month, the bureau's Washington Field Office began recruiting for a new anti-obscenity squad. Attached to the job posting was a July 29 Electronic Communication from FBI headquarters to all 56 field offices, describing the initiative as "one of the top priorities" of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and, by extension, of 'the Director.' That would be FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III." The Post adds, "Mischievous commentary began propagating around the water coolers at 601 Fourth St. NW and its satellites, where the FBI's second-largest field office concentrates on national security, high-technology crimes and public corruption. … The new squad will divert eight agents, a supervisor and assorted support staff to gather evidence against 'manufacturers and purveyors' of pornography -- not the kind exploiting children, but the kind that depicts, and is marketed to, consenting adults. … 'I guess this means we've won the war on terror,' said one exasperated FBI agent, speaking on the condition of anonymity because poking fun at headquarters is not regarded as career-enhancing. 'We must not need any more resources for espionage.' … Among friends and trusted colleagues, an experienced national security analyst said, 'it's a running joke for us.'" The Post notes, "Public corruption, officially, is fourth on the FBI's priority list, after protecting the United States from terrorist attack, foreign espionage and cyber-based attacks. Just below those priorities are civil rights, organized crime, white-collar crime and 'significant violent crime.' The guidance from headquarters does not mention where pornography fits in. … 'The Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation's top priority remains fighting the war on terrorism,' said Justice Department press secretary Brian Roehrkasse. 'However, it is not our sole priority. In fact, Congress has directed the department to focus on other priorities, such as obscenity.' … At the FBI's field office, spokeswoman Debra Weierman expressed disappointment that some of her colleagues find grist for humor in the new campaign. 'The adult obscenity squad . . . stems from an attorney general mandate, funded by Congress,' she said. 'The personnel assigned to this initiative take the responsibility of this assignment very seriously and are dedicated to the success of this program.'"

Gotti Jury Signals Possible Deadlock On Racketeering Charge. The AP (9/20, Hays) reports, "A federal jury deliberating the case of John A. 'Junior' Gotti, the scion of the Gambino crime family charged with attacking a radio show host, indicated Monday that it was deadlocked on a racketeering charge against the son of the late mob boss." The AP continues, "In a note to U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin on the seventh day of deliberations, jurors asked what they should do if they were deadlocked over the question of Gotti's so-called withdrawal defense. … Gotti, 41, claims he quit the Gambino organized crime family before July 22, 1999, meaning the five-year statute of limitations would have expired on racketeering charges." The AP adds, "The judge told lawyers she planned to read the jurors a charge that would encourage them to keep deliberating until they reached an unanimous verdict. … Prosecutors allege Gotti ordered his Gambino crew to give radio personality Curtis Sliwa a severe beating in retaliation for Sliwa's on-air rants against his father, John Gotti."

US Charges Three In Army Kickback Scheme. The AP (9/20, Sherman) reports, "A civilian Army employee and two business owners were arrested in a kickback scheme to supply furnishings at a new Pentagon-run hotel in the Bavarian Alps that is used by troops on leave from Afghanistan and Iraq, the Justice Department said Monday." The AP continues, "Steven G. Potoski, 45, former contracting director at the Edelweiss Lodge and Resort in Garmisch, Germany, accepted more than $350,000 in bribes in cash, home renovations, trips, computers and tickets to such events as Oktoberfest and the Indianapolis 500, assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said. … Potoski, who lives in Garmisch, was arrested Friday, along with Alvan Vance McQueen, 56, of Shelbyville, Ind., and Ellis Abramson, 39, of Merrick, N.Y." The AP adds, "McQueen, owner of Flat Rock Furniture in Waldron, Ind., paid Potoski $45,000 in cash and other items as part of an agreement to inflate the cost of furniture for the hotel and split the extra money, according to a criminal complaint filed against McQueen in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis. … Abramson, president of Bramson House Inc., had a similar arrangement with Potoski for draperies and guest room bedspreads, according to a criminal complaint filed against Abramson in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y. … If convicted, the three men face up to 35 years in prison."

Three Sentenced To Prison For New Jersey Corruption Convictions. The Trenton Times (9/20, Knapp) reports US District Judge Garrett E. Brown Jr. on Monday "sentenced former MCIA Executive Director James R. Lambert Sr., 44, and Washington Township businessman Alex J. Abdalla, 52, to five months in federal prison, five months of house arrest with electronic monitoring, three years of probation and $6,000 in fines each for their guilty pleas to charges of mail fraud and conspiring to bribe former Ewing Mayor Alfred W. Bridges to use his influence to steer a private demolition contract in the township. Hamilton businessman and contractor Michael Maurio, 69, was sentenced to 23 months in federal prison and three years of probation for his part in the conspiracy to defraud the MCIA by submitting false statements in connection with the performance of a demolition project contract in Trenton." The Times notes, "U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie yesterday praised local FBI agents, special agents of the Internal Revenue Service criminal investigation unit and Assistant U.S. Attorneys David Bocian and Jeffrey S. Chiesa for their work in the case while deploring the corruption of defendants in the probe."

Probe Of Allegations Prosecutor Interfered With FBI Probe Cost County $107,000. The Asbury Park Press (9/20, Rizzo) reports, "The Monmouth County Board of Freeholders spent $107,000 for lawyers to represent nine members of the Prosecutor's Office in a federal grand jury investigation that went nowhere, according to the county counsel. Malcolm V. Carton said Monday that he concluded…that the grand jury probe into whether the prosecutor's office interfered with an FBI bribery sting fizzled out in June. 'It went no place,' Carton said. 'There was no indictment, just a lot of threats.'" The APP notes, "Meanwhile, state Attorney General Peter C. Harvey is conducting his own investigation into whether former Prosecutor John Kaye's office interfered with the federal probe. John Hagerty, a spokesman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, said the report has been completed and determinations are being made."

Former, Current New Mexico Treasurers Plead Not Guilty To Kickback Charges. The AP (9/20, Fonseca) reports, "The New Mexico state treasurer and his predecessor pleaded not guilty Monday to federal racketeering charges involving kickbacks of cash, cars and expensive tickets to political fundraisers. Robert Vigil and former Treasurer Michael Montoya, both Democrats, are accused of steering state business to an investment adviser in exchange for nearly $700,000. … 'Mr. Vigil, from day one, has attempted to clean up this office, and that's what he has done,' said Vigil's attorney, Sam Bregman, who blamed the allegations on disgruntled former employees." The AP notes that "an FBI affidavit describes a wider scheme and says Vigil accepted an envelope stuffed with cash as recently as last month. … On Monday, Lt. Gov. Diane Denish urged Vigil to immediately take administrative leave while the case is pending."

The Washington Post (9/20, A2) also reports on the pleas in "Nation in Brief"

New York Mayor Accused Of Internet Sex Charge Released On Bond. The AP (9/20, Kates) reports, "Although a judge accused him of having 'deviant sexual urges,' Oswego Mayor John Gosek was released Monday with a set of conditions that include electronic monitoring, a curfew and other restrictions." Gosek "was arrested Friday at a Syracuse hotel on a charge that he used a cell phone to solicit sex from a minor." US Magistrate George Lowe "ordered Gosek to post $10,000 bond" and "prohibited Gosek from using cell phones and ordered him not to have contact with any minors. Gosek also must undergo counseling a condition Gosek requested, said his attorney James Eby."

Philadelphia Imam Sentenced To Prison For Corruption Probe Conviction. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/20, Anastasia) reports, "Imam Shamsud-din Ali, convicted earlier this year of racketeering charges that were part of a broader City Hall corruption probe, was sentenced today to 87 months in prison. … Considered one of the most influential Muslim leaders in the city, Ali declined to make any comment during the hearing or as he emerged from the courthouse later in the day. He will remain free on bail pending an appeal." The AP (9/20, Loviglio) notes that Ali's was "the latest in a string of convictions stemming from the FBI's sweeping probe of municipal corruption."

The Philadelphia Daily News (9/20, Caparella) adds that Muslim response to Ali's sentencing was mixed, with one

"disgusted Muslim, upset that Ali is out on bail" saying, "Ali 'has one more year to con people out here." But "Ali loyalist, Asim Abdul Rashid, head of the Majlis Ash'Shura" said, "It's a travesty. If there's any fairness, he will win on appeal."

More Than 100 Gang Suspects Arrested By Florida Task Force. The Tampa Tribune (9/20, Morelli) reports, "A sustained assault on street gangs in northwest Hillsborough County by a task force made up of federal agents and county deputies resulted in the arrest of more than 100 suspected gang members and the seizure of nearly $1 million in property. They didn't get everyone, though. As Sheriff David Gee announced the results of the sweeping six-month investigation Monday afternoon, workers at Morgan Woods Elementary School scrubbed bright orange gang graffiti off the walls and sidewalks. Undaunted by the graffiti…Gee said the sweep was a big blow to the street gangs in northwest Hillsborough because many of those arrested were leaders." The Tribune notes, "The gang task force included Hillsborough sheriff's deputies, FBI agents and U.S. attorney's office investigators, as well as an undercover Pasco County sheriff's detective who infiltrated one gang."

Philadelphia FBI Agents Played Role In Art Theft Sting. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/20, Smith) reports, "It was a helluva heist -- and a helluva sting that recovered a stolen Rembrandt painting worth $36 million. But the FBI says we'll have to wait a couple weeks to learn exactly what role one of its Philadelphia-based agents may have played in the end to one of history's most sensational art thefts. … 'The Philly connection has to do with the sting,' local FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said yesterday, teasing an Oct. 4 press session when reporters will be able to get the whole story. 'Let's just say maybe somebody here was involved in it, and they can talk about it.' … 'The task force was able to introduce an FBI undercover agent with substantial knowledge of art to pose as the buyer/broker for the stolen Rembrandt,' the FBI's Los Angeles field office said. Federal investigators at Philly are known for expertise in stolen art and cultural artifacts. They hosted a new national FBI task force on stolen art this year."

Swedes Expect Suspects Will Be Extradited This Week. The AP (9/20, Olsen) reports that the four suspects "will soon be extradited to Sweden where they will be prosecuted, officials said Monday." The AP notes, "The arrests last week were the result of a multinational operation that included several U.S. law enforcement agencies, including the Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation. … In Sweden, Prosecutor Ronnie Jacobsson said he hoped the men would be handed over this week."

Tennessee Couple Plead Guilty To Bilking Elderly In Ponzi Scheme. The Knoxville News (9/20, Satterfield) reports, "A Morristown couple pleaded guilty Monday to bilking dozens of people, many of them elderly, in a multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme." Gary Lee Von Oesen and Geneva Retha Houston "admitted their respective roles in a host of financial crimes spanning 1996 to 2003 at a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greeneville before federal Judge J. Ronnie Greer." The News notes, "Von Oesen and Houston were nabbed last year after a probe led by FBI Agent Lane P. Rushing into allegations including mail fraud, securities fraud and money laundering."

Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Attempted Extortion. The Tyler Morning Telegraph (9/20, Knaupp) reports Kirkpatrick Lenord Moore of Tyler "pleaded guilty in federal court Monday to attempting to extort $120,000 from a local woman." Moore "admitted to receiving proceeds of extortion on Dec. 29 after he had left several threatening notes and phone calls to the woman." The Morning Telegraph notes, "FBI officials said they believe the woman had information regarding a felony suspect wanted in Smith County. Moore threatened to inform the FBI of the woman's knowledge and to accuse her of committing an offense regarding the information, according to a FBI affidavit."

Rapper Lil' Kim Reports To Philadelphia Detention Center To Begin Perjury Sentence. The AP (9/19, Matheson) reports, "Rapper Lil' Kim began serving a 366-day prison sentence at a federal detention center Monday for perjury and conspiracy stemming from a 2001 shootout outside a Manhattan radio station." The AP continues, "The 30-year-old entertainer, whose real name is Kimberly Jones, was whisked into the center past a throng of media, fans and passers-by at about 4:45 p.m. … Earlier, she had issued a statement saying she had 'unfortunately' been assigned to the concrete, high-rise Philadelphia facility instead of to a prison camp 'as discussed,' and added, 'I am not certain that this constitutes fair and equal treatment.' … Her lawyer, L. Londell McMillan, said a celebrity of his client's magnitude could be in danger in such a detention center, which he said was mainly designed as a temporary holding facility for inmates awaiting permanent assignment to a prison."

Psychologist Says Hinckley Should Be Allowed Overnight Visits. Psychologist Paul Montalbano, chief of pretrial services at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, testified yesterday that John Hinckley Jr., who tried to kill President Ronald Reagan in 1981, should be allowed to visit his parents and stay overnight with them at their home in Williamsburg, Virginia. The Washington Times (9/20, Wagner) reports that Montalbano said Hinckley's "mental state has improved since he shot President Reagan," and that he now "abides by rules and regulations. His rehabilitation would be increased if he were allowed to walk through the vast community around his parents' home, which includes six golf courses, shopping centers, a school and historical sites, the hospital psychologist testified." The Washington Post (9/20, A10, Cauvin) adds that Montalbano also testified that Hinckley "is lonely and longing for a close relationship." Montalbano said, "He wants to have a girlfriend. He wants intimate contact with a female." The Post adds that the "underlying question" at yesterday's hearings "appeared to be how Hinckley would handle courtship and respond to rejection out in the world, away from the structure and support of a hospital."

Jury Selection Begins In Trial Of Former Illinois Governor. Jury selection began Monday in the trial of former Illinois Gov. George Ryan, who is charged with racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud, tax fraud and lying to investigators. Reuters (9/20, Stern) reports, "Ryan, 71, is charged with steering state contracts to friends in exchange for free gifts, vacations, cash and loans to himself and his family while governor and, before that, during eight years as Illinois' secretary of state.'

The New York Times (9/20, Wilgoren) says the trial "caps a seven-year federal investigation that has led to 79 indictments and 73 convictions and is known as Operation Safe Road because of its roots exposing a scheme in which government employees traded commercial driver's licenses for bribes. Mr. Ryan's co-defendant is Lawrence K. Warner, a longtime lobbyist and close confidant."

The AP (9/20, Robinson) reports, "Jury selection for former Gov. George Ryan's racketeering trial got off to a slow start Monday with questions from defense attorneys focusing on possible bias resulting from media coverage of the scandal that has dominated state politics for seven years. … 'Because he was governor this is a highly unusual case,' Ryan attorney Dan Webb told the court. 'We should not end up with a jury that has people on it with biases against George Ryan.'" The AP continues, "Webb urged federal Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer not to put time limits on the questioning and she said she would wait until noon Tuesday before doing so to see if the pace picks up. … But she said it was necessary to get going." The AP adds, "After one day of jury selection, 14 of some 300 potential jurors had been interviewed and eight were placed in a pool for later consideration. Eleven of the 300 were dismissed for reasons ranging from health problems to job conflicts to blatant bias against the former governor."

FBI New Orleans SAC Laments High Rate Of New Orleans Political Corruption. Asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/19) about the Louisiana political corruption investigations, FBI New Orleans SAC Jim Bernazzani said, "As far from the FBI office, we have a tremendous working relationship with all government, whether it is state, federal or local, whether it is law enforcement or it's from the mayor's office or from the parish presidents. We have no problem with that. What we do have here, unfortunately, is a target-rich environment relative to select individuals who would abuse their office for personal profit. Within the FBI, New Orleans ranks 19th in size, but we are third in public corruption convictions. And the unintended consequence of public corruption is not only are they stealing from the people, but they are contributing to this violent crime landscape, in that companies from out of state will not invest in New Orleans, because they are sick and tired of the bribes and the kickbacks."

Police Say DC Dog Walker Killed in 'Face-To-Face' Encounter. The Washington Post (9/20, B3, Wilber, Henderson) reports police said yesterday that a man who was fatally shot while walking his dog in the Mount Pleasant section in Northwest Washington was killed in a "face-to-face" encounter with his assailant. The paper adds investigators said they had no motive or suspect in the slaying of Gregory C. Shipe, 34, a financial analyst for Ogilvy Public Relations. He was shot in the face about 10:40 p.m. Saturday in a crime that one top D.C. police official yesterday called

"bizarre." Although none of Shipe's possessions, including his wallet, was missing, investigators speculated that he most likely was the victim of a botched robbery, authorities said. Police and neighbors said several robberies have taken place in the area recently. Police are offering a reward of up to $25,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of a suspect.

FBI Searches Missing VCU Student's Car. The Washington Times (9/20, Cella) reports that Richmond Police investigating the disappearance of a 17-year-old Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Marie Behl spent yesterday investigating leads they got from an examination of her car. Behl of Vienna, VA has been missing since Sept. 5. An off-duty police officer found Taylor's 1997 Ford Escort on Saturday in Richmond, about a mile and a half from her dorm. The Times adds Police said that there were Ohio license plates on the car and that the original Virginia tags were missing. Police said the car was turned over to the FBI for forensics processing. The Times said the Richmond Times-Dispatch reported yesterday that Taylor's scent was one of two that a police dog detected in the car and that the discovery is leading police to think that she might have been abducted.

DOJ Settles False Claims Charges Against Office Depot. Federal Computer Week (9/20, Hardy) reports, "Office Depot has paid a $4.75 million settlement to the United States over allegations that the company sold products to government agencies in violation of the Trade Agreements Act." FCW continues, "The Justice Department, in announcing the settlement today, said Office Depot sold products from China, Taiwan and other countries that do not have reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, in violation of a provision of the company's General Services Administration schedule contract. … 'Federal contractors will be held accountable for their billing practices,' said Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general at Justice's Civil Division, in a written statement. 'This settlement is an example of the department's determination to ensure that federal funds are protected from fraud and abuse.'"

Reuters (9/20) reports, "Earlier this year OfficeMax Inc. agreed to pay $9.8 million to settle similar allegations."

FEC Sues Club For Growth Over Campaign Finance Compliance. The Washington Post/AP (9/20, Theimer) reports, "Federal election officials on Monday sued a political group to try to force it to comply with campaign finance limits, the first lawsuit of its kind to arise from controversial big-money fundraising during the 2004 elections." The AP continues, "The Federal Election Commission filed a complaint in U.S. District Court in Washington against the Club for Growth. The pro-Republican group spent at least $21 million in the 2003-04 election cycle. … The FEC contends the Club spent enough in federal races to require it to file with the commission as a political committee and abide by contribution and spending limits. It wants the court to fine the group and to order it to comply with campaign finance rules." The AP adds, "Club for Growth President Pat Toomey called the FEC lawsuit 'a bizarre interpretation of the Club's mission, the Constitution, the laws adopted by Congress and their own regulations governing nonprofit organizations.' … 'The Club's principal purpose is to advocate for and defend pro-growth policies,' Toomey said in a written statement. 'We have consulted with counsel every step of the way and have followed the law and regulations that govern our work.'"

The New York Times (9/20, Justice) reports, "The suit is the first major enforcement case to involve a '527 committee,' the independent political organizations that both Republicans and Democrats used to raise and spend hundreds of millions of dollars in the 2004 races. Commission officials describe it as a test case that could have a major impact on how future elections are financed. … 'This is one of the most important suits the commission has brought in the last decade,' said Michael Toner, the commission's Republican vice chairman."

The Washington Times (9/20, Dinan) notes that Club for Growth President Patrick J. Toomey "said yesterday's suit was part of a 'war on the First Amendment.' He said the FEC's suit was the result of a complaint by the" DSCC "that said the Club for Growth stepped over the line when it targeted Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat. 'The commission allowed it to lie inactive for nearly a year and a half and then resurrected it as a platform to seek to take away our members' rights and exact a huge civil penalty from the club,' Mr. Toomey said." The Times adds, "President Bush's campaign, key lawmakers who helped pass the 2002 changes and other political organizations sued the FEC last year for not enforcing its regulations on 527s. Those cases are pending in federal court."

New Georgia Law May Jeopardize Asbestos Cases. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (9/20, Pollak) reports, "Lawyers are gearing up for a constitutional challenge to a new state law that could remove nearly 3,000 asbestos cases from Fulton County dockets." The Report continues, "The law was designed to stem the tide of out-of-state asbestos claims being filed in Georgia, said its primary sponsor, Rep. David E. Ralston, R-Blue Ridge. … 'We were seeing a huge number of people that were nonresidents of Georgia and that had not been exposed to asbestos or silica in Georgia who were suing in Georgia courts,' said Ralston. 'That was a trend that was disturbing not only to me, but to others.'" The Report adds, "The vast majority of asbestos cases in Georgia have been filed in Fulton, with about 2,200 pending in state court before Judge Henry M. Newkirk and about 1,000 pending in superior court before Chief Judge Doris L. Downs, attorneys involved in the cases said. They estimated that out-of-state plaintiffs who were not exposed to asbestos in Georgia filed approximately 90 percent of those cases. … A lawyer defending the asbestos suits, E. Elaine Shofner of Hawkins & Parnell, noted that claims in Georgia courts have originated from Alabama, North Carolina, Wisconsin, Hawaii, Texas, Nebraska and Pennsylvania. … 'We became a dumping ground,' she said. … One plaintiffs' attorney, David P. Bevon of Motley Rice in Mount Pleasant, S.C., said out-of-state plaintiffs filed in Georgia because the law here was more favorable than in other states for injuries that occurred years or even decades ago. He also noted that some defendants, such as Georgia-Pacific, are based here."

Colorado AG Argues Against State Settlements With Tobacco Companies. Colorado State Treasurer Mark Hillman writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/20), "When politicians take campaign contributions from Big Tobacco, self-proclaimed watchdog groups yelp about impropriety. Yet for the past seven years, the industry has paid tens of billions of dollars to state governments to protect tobacco profits. Until recently, hardly anyone seemed to notice, much less care. Then, on Aug. 2, the non-profit Competitive Enterprise Institute filed a lawsuit arguing that the 1998 Master Settlement Agreement (MSA) between Big Tobacco and 46 state attorneys-general (AGs) violates the Constitution and establishes a cartel designed to circumvent antitrust law and quash competition. Hallelujah. I am a state treasurer and this suit could greatly reduce revenue to my state; and still I am enthusiastic. The billions generated by the settlement cloak the pernicious threat that activist AGs pose to the checks and balances on political power that govern our Constitutional system. Regulation and taxation policies are the rightful responsibility of the legislative and executive branches -- not the domain of states' chief law enforcement officers." Hillman adds, "The question facing the courts is not whether the MSA is good policy or whether tobacco companies are scoundrels. The larger issue is whether AGs can rightfully evolve into a law unto themselves, usurping the Constitutional roles of state legislators, governors, Congress and, ultimately, the voters themselves."

Carter-Baker Panel Suggests 87 Election-Reform Changes. Reuters (9/20) reports, "Electronic voting machines should have paper trails to keep track of votes cast and all voters should present photo IDs, a panel recommending ways to restore confidence in the U.S. election system said on Monday. The bipartisan Commission on Federal Election Reform, led by former President Jimmy Carter and former Secretary of State James Baker, made 87 recommendations for strengthening the integrity of a process shaken by voting controversies." Reuters notes, "The call for paper verification of votes on electronic machines drew praise from election reform advocates, but the call for photo identification was criticized as an invasion of privacy and something that would discourage some voters. That recommendation would require all prospective voters by the year 2010 to produce a photo ID card at the polling place -- either a driver's license or, for those without driver's licenses, an identification card issued by the state. The commission called on states to make distribution of the card simple and widespread."
